The conclusion to which these passages appear to me inevitably to lead us is that God is revealed to us not as the Father of the whole human race, but only of those who have individually received the Lord Jesus Christ as their Saviour; therefore the universal Fatherhood of God and brotherhood (in a similar sense) of man are, I believe, unscriptural, and therefore unwarranted terms.

One point I would wish to guard. There are some who appear to think that if belief in the universal Fatherhood of God were given up, their belief in the universal love of God to man must go too. This seems to me an entire mistake: they are in no way dependent on each other. The amazing love of God to man in his sins is shown us, not only in such passages as John iii. 16, but in their fulfilment on the cross of Calvary. There we have, in all its mighty fulness, the love of God to a sinful world—loving the sinner, whilst hating the sin, and giving his beloved Son to bear the awful load of sin, that the sinner who accepts Him as his Saviour might go free, delivered from the penalty and from the power of sin.

May I add, in conclusion, that all I would ask of those who do not agree with what I have written is that they would "search the Scriptures whether these things are so" (Acts xvii. 11).—Yours truly, Kendal. T. Crewdson Wilson.

P.S.—In order to avoid the possibility of misconception, it is better to add that (as I read the Bible) the Fatherhood of God and the consequent brotherhood of his redeemed children, are purely spiritual truths; and are, therefore, totally distinct from the truths of the Creatorship of God, and the common origin and "fellow-creaturehood" of mankind.

True Worship.

(John iv. 22, R.V.)

Gracious God, we worship Thee,
Reverently we bow the knee,
Jesus Christ our only plea,
Father, we adore Thee.

Vast thy love—how deep, how wide—
In the gift of Him who died;
Righteous claims all satisfied.
Father, we adore Thee.

Now enthroned by Thee on high,
Nevermore to bleed and die,
Through his precious blood made nigh,
Father, we adore Thee.

Low we bow before thy face,
Sons of God, O wondrous place!
Great the riches of thy grace.
Father, we adore Thee.

By thy Spirit grant that we Worshippers in truth may be,
Praise: as incense sweet to Thee,
Father, we adore Thee.

Nobler shall our worship be
When in glory we shall see
All thy love's immensity.
Father, we adore Thee.

Thus a chord of song we raise.
Note of deep adoring praise,
Now, and soon through endless days—
Father, we adore Thee.

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, September 16. Isaiah xiv.

ISRAEL cannot be forgotten by God, and though for her sins she has been put away during the Times of the Gentiles, she will yet be chosen and set in her own land. The restoration under Ezra and Nehemiah cannot have fulfilled the intention of the comforting words with which this chapter opens, and we must believe that in all their wealth they are still to be fulfilled.

The triumphal song of vv. 4-23 is one of the most splendid conceptions to be found in any literature. It leads our imagination into the realms of Hades, and depicts the monarchs over whom Babylon triumphed receiving the fallen monarch with astonishment and exultation. Even they had received the rites of sepulture, but he is cast out unburied on the earth. Surely, in some such terms as these, the Church shall one day exult over all her foes, and especially over the great apostate power of Babylon the Great, the City of the Seven Hills. And still more, over the cast out Prince of this world, of whom the King of Babylon and other princes of this world have been the types and representatives.

From the fate of Babylon, the prophet turns to that of Assyria and Philistia; and we are reminded of that memorable morning when Israel saw all her enemies dead upon the sea shore. So the day will come when the shores of time will be strewn by the remains of the mighty forces that have risen against our Saviour, but shall pass into oblivion. He shall put all enemies beneath his feet, and the last enemy, Death, shall also be destroyed. Sing to the Lord, for He shall triumph gloriously.

MONDAY, September 17. Isaiah xv.

In vision, the prophet now sees the destruction of one of Israel's ancient foes—the Moabites, a destruction which probably befell them at the hands of Sennacherib. Very suddenly the blow falls: but it is so disastrous that the whole land is filled with horror and lamentation. So bitter is its anguish that the prophet himself cannot restrain his grief (5). Finally the fugitives, as a last resource, carry what they can save across the brook, flowing into the Dead Sea, the boundary between Moab and Edom.

It is very noticeable that the prophet's heart cries out at the woes he predicts. We may ponder that lesson. Too often have God's servants spoken with dry eyes and hard voices of the doom of the ungodly; and have only made them more obdurate and determined. We never need so much brokenness of spirit as when we utter God's judgments against sin. In his autobiography, Finney says, "Here I must introduce the name of a man whom I shall have occasion to mention frequently, Mr. Abel Clary. He was the son of a very excellent man, and an elder of the church where I was converted. He had been licensed to preach; but his spirit of prayer was such, he was so burdened with the souls of men, that he was not able to preach much, his whole time and strength being given to prayer. The burden of his soul would frequently be so great that he was unable to stand, and he would writhe and groan in agony. I was well acquainted with him, and knew something of the wonderful spirit of prayer that was upon him. . . The pastor told me afterwards that he found that in the six weeks I was in that church 500 souls had been converted."

TUESDAY, September 18. Isaiah xvi.

Continuing the prophecy of the previous chapter, Isaiah advises Moab to acknowledge the suzerainty of the House of David by sending tribute-lambs to Mount Zion. And this is followed by an appeal from Moab to Judah, that her outcasts should receive shelter from the merciless foe (4, 5, R.V.). Then, again, in the most prophetic language, the prophet bewails the prospect of Moab's fate, responding to the weeping of Jazer with his own bitter tears (9).

These are the men who prevail with men. In the early part of the sixteenth century there was a great religious awakening in Ulster, Ireland, which began under a minister named Glendinning. He was of very meagre natural gifts, but would spend many days and nights alone with God, and seems to have been greatly burdened with the souls of men and their state before God. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that, under his pleading, multitudes of hearers were brought into great anxiety and terror of conscience. They looked on themselves as altogether lost and damned. They were stricken into a swoon by the power of God's Word. A dozen in one day were carried out of doors as dead. These were not women, but some of the boldest spirits of the neighbourhood, "some who had formerly not feared with their swords to put the whole market town into a fray." This revival changed the whole character of northern Ireland. Would that God might lay on our hearts a similar burden for our churches and our land!

WEDNESDAY, September 19. Isaiah xvii.

This prophecy is directed against Damascus, and includes Samaria. Their cities and strongholds were to be destroyed, and only a remnant of their inhabitants would be left; and the result would be that the people would turn from their idols to God.

It is well when a man no longer looks to the works of his own hands, but to his Maker; and if this result is achieved by his affliction, he may count it good to have been afflicted. When we forget God, and live unmindful of the Rock of our salvation, though we are most careful and sedulous in planting slips, the harvest is always disappointment, always grief and desperate sorrow, always despair (vv. 10, 11).

The world is full of people who are engaged in planting their slips. Fortunes, luxurious homes, great reputations—such are some of the slips; but what disappointment succeeds—"desperate sorrow." The egg turns out to be rottenness; the fair landscape a Sahara, from which the mirage is gone; the beautiful globe of changing colour, only a drop of dirty soap-and-water. We remember the story of Faust, who sold himself to Satan, but the day of bitter reaping came. We remember the cry of Byron over his wasted years; of Laurence Oliphant, the bright versatile son of Piccadilly, who in his varied career had tasted life in many of its brightest aspects; of Solomon, whose Ecclesiastes is one long record of slip-planting. Nothing less than God, our Maker, can suffice the souls which He has made. Apart from Him life may at first promise well, but the end, inevitably, will be desperate sorrow. When He smiles on the life, the merest slips which we have planted in tears and pain become harvests of joy, which drop their seeds through all coming time.

THURSDAY, September 20. Isaiah xviii.

This prophecy is addressed to Egypt and Ethiopia, described as the lands "shadowing with wings"—an expression which is variously interpreted by commentators. It would appear that the ambassadors of these peoples, described, as in R.V. as a people "tall and smooth" (this is preferable to "scattered and peeled") are bidden to bear to their own people the account of the invasion of the Assyrians, described in the closing verses of the previous chapter (12-14).

Then suddenly our attention is turned to Jehovah, who is represented as taking his rest. It is as though He were quietly looking on, and permitting the Assyrians to do their worst. So far from arresting them, He seems even to favour their plans. He is to them, as the dew to the growth of plants. But before the bud is formed, He arises to cut them off. This probably refers to the fatal blow which overwhelmed Sennacherib's army in a single night. The gratitude of surrounding nations for so great a deliverance would cause them to bring sacrifices to Jehovah's Temple (v. 7). How striking are those secret words, whispered by God to his favoured servant, "The Lord said unto Me." It was as though He had called Isaiah aside, and spoken to him confidentially of matters which must not be uttered to uncircumcised ears. It was thus that God spake of old to Abraham and Moses. And in modern days it is remarkable, in reading the Journals of George Fox, to find how conscious he was of similar confidences reposed in him by his ever-present and faithful Friend. Oh, for the opened ear, attent and receptive to the least whisper of God's voice.

FRIDAY, September 21. Isaiah xix.

Egypt had often been the refuge of Judah in her mortal conflict with Assyria, but here her judgment is predicted under the image of the drying up of her Nile, of which it is said in verse 6, "The streams shall become putrid, the canals of Egypt shall be emptied and dried up, so that the meadows by the river's brink would become dry."

The prophet foreshadows a time when Egypt would speak the language of Canaan and adopt the worship of Jehovah. We cannot forget the vast settlement of Hebrews there, which took place in the centuries preceding the birth of Christ—so much so that the Septuagint was composed in Alexandria. We are also led on to the time when Egypt, Assyria, and Israel, shall be united in a holy alliance under the blessing of Jehovah. These are mysterious words, which certainly have not been fulfilled. There was a partial fulfilment of them on the day of Pentecost, when we learn that Medes, Parthians, Elamites, together with dwellers in Mesopotamia, joined with those of Egypt, Libya, Cyrene, and Judæa, in acknowledging the power of the exalted Saviour, and the mighty baptism of the Holy Spirit. But just beyond the veil which hides the immediate future, we are doubtless destined to see greater things than these. In any case, we may take the prophet's words as illustrating the truth, that none are beyond the pale of Divine mercy; that God can change persecutors into apostles, and that the elements that make men bad will, beneath converting grace, be the constituents of strong and holy lives. God rejoices to take those who have been strong in the service of Satan, and make them lowly and devoted servants of the Cross.

Judah, alarmed by the capture of Samaria, and the rapid extension of the Assyrian invasion, looked for assistance from Egypt. And the aim of this brief chapter is to recall king and people from any such reliance, by the announcement that the King of Assyria would shortly prevail against Egypt, and lead into captivity multitudes of prisoners. This event is afterwards described by Nahum (iii. 3).

In order to make his words more emphatic, the prophet was commanded to strip off his outer garment, and for three years went to this extent, naked. It was an habitual practice with the Hebrew prophets, in obedience to the word of the Lord, to take some such means of impressing their words on the minds of their contemporaries; and it suggests a very solemn reflection.

Ought not we, who profess the deep truths of the speedy return of Christ, to be very much more careful in our daily behaviour and expenditure, so as to convince those around us that this is no mere rhetoric, but the deliberate and all-moulding conception of our own lives? Those who preach the speedy return of Christ should live consistently with that expectation. Those who are wont to insist on our pilgrim life should live as pilgrims and strangers. Those who believe in eternal punishment should surely urge men, with more vehemence than we are wont to see exhibited, to flee from the wrath to come. Oh for the consistency of this old Hebrew prophet, whose example affected the thought of the whole of the coastland—not isle (v. 6).

Salisbury Conference.—Rev. E. N. Thwaites, Rector of Fisherton, has issued a notice of the twenty-sixth Salisbury Conference. The meetings will be held in the Maundrel Hall, September 24-28. On the evening of the first day a special service will be conducted in Fisherton Church, and Rev. H. Lindsay Young, Vicar of St. John's, Portsea, will preach the Conference sermon.

Other Lands.

Missionaries in China.

In a letter from Tientsin, dated June 26, Rev. Thomas Bryson (L.M.S.) writes:—

"We are all very happy and well, and our minds and hands kept constantly employed. I have never known once what fear was, trusting in our God, that if for further service here or there, his will was best. The hospitality and kindness of Mr. Cousins (head of Jardine, Matheson, and Co.), to missionaries and Chinese Christians alike, no words can describe. There was a great unwillingness on the part of many to allow the Christian refugees to come into the settlement, and even after we had come the military authorities considered the question of turning them out, but this was graciously prevented. Mr. Cousins wrote a strong remonstrance to the British Consul, pointing out how invaluable their services had been, and telling him that if the Christian refugees were sent out the missionaries would assuredly go with them. Now everyone is praising the work the Christians have done.

"The saddest sight since the war began was witnessed on the Victoria Road this morning. I shall never forget it—the sight of burning houses and homeless people. Even the awful spectacle of dead and mutilated bodies, was not so full of pathos as that of our army returning with their wounded carried on stretchers—a long, silent procession of nearly 200 wounded men, mostly British bluejackets and marines.

"Our houses [outside the foreign settlements] are standing as yet, though we have daily expected to hear they were fired and looted. The Russian soldiers have been looting even in the British settlement, and have broken into Mr. Leese's house. Some Cossacks, it is said, have already been shot for these misdemeanours.

"Mr. Grant (of the L.M.S.) was wounded in the leg while on duty as a volunteer helping to make the barricades one night on the Bund. The Lyceum and Club are turned into a hospital. Mr. Grant has been there for some days, but is recovering, and will soon be well again. I believe Mrs. Grant and baby have been with many other ladies and children in the Gordon Hall. The Pei-taiho people have been taken off in a gunboat, and have gone, I think, to Shanghai. Mrs. Cousins and the children have left for England. You need have no fears for me. I am wonderfully well, and astonished that I can keep up and do as much work."

A China Inland Mission circular states:—A Shanghai telegram, of September 3:—"Dr. Millar Wilson's last letter received was dated June 6. Hospital destroyed. Coombs killed June 27.

"F. H. Dreyer writing you by next mail. All Kiang-si workers safe.

"Mr. E. C. Smith and Mr. C. H. Bird have arrived here safely. All well."

The China Inland Mission.

In order to facilitate the dissemination of information regarding work in China, arrangements has been made for the organization of deputation attendance in connection with the China Inland Mission. At the present time of turmoil in the great Empire of the East, more missionaries than usual are detained in England, and in the circumstances there is special interest in them and their work.

The deputation department has been placed in the hands of Mr. F. S. Joyce, for several years a worker in connection with the Mission. Communications to him should be addressed (marked "Deputation"): China Inland Mission, Newington Green, London, N.

Soldiers in South Africa.

In a letter from Orange River Colony, Mrs. M. S. Osborn-Howe refers to the distribution, especially among the wounded, of Mrs. Anna Shipton's books. She says:—

"They are being read by the young converts, and also by the workers; some copies are circulating in the hospitals, and carrying messages of strength and comfort. I told you I had sent a copy of 'Tell Jesus' to a non-commissioned officer in hospital at Bloemfontein. I had a pencilled letter from him, saying: 'Thank you very much for "Tell Jesus." I am sure that its teaching will prove a blessing to me, and, I trust, to others who may read it.' Since then he has passed through to Cape Town on his way to England. I had a few minutes' conversation with him at the station. He said another was deeply interested in the book—one of the colonial troops lying in the hospital at Bloemfontein. I am hoping that nurses and orderlies will read the copies in the hospitals.

"One of the patients, who now has one of the books, was brought out of the death and darkness of Roman Catholicism a few days ago. Our young Jewish worker had visited him several times, whilst he was lying in such extreme weakness that it was very doubtful whether he could take in what was said to him; but the messenger, relying on the power of the Word when used by the Spirit, simply repeated texts of Scripture each time, and never conversed. The last time he went, the man fixed his eyes on a little badge which the Jew wears, and inquired, 'Has your Superior blessed that?' 'Oh, no,' was the reply. 'It was given to me by a dear friend; only God can bless, He has blessed me in giving me his Son who died for me, and has saved me.' The tears began to roll down the sick man's face as he said, 'I want to find God—to find God.' Subsequently he was led to Christ.

"I have posted a copy of 'Asked of God' to the wife of the manager of one of the Camp Homes. She is in very bad health, and may never be strong again. She and her family are refugees from Johannesburg, where her husband had excellent employment. She is a Christian, and the book will cheer and strengthen her.

"How busy the enemy is where the Lord is sowing. I said to-night to one of the converts who yielded only last night: 'Well, I hope all is quite clear?' 'I can scarcely say quite. There is a verse in John,' he replied, searching in the moonlight through his tiny Bible. 'Come in,' I said, 'to the light of my lamp; now, what was it?' He read, 'That they that see not might see, and they that see might be made blind.' 'Go on,' I said. He read to the end. 'Well,' I explained, 'those were Pharisees. You are not a Pharisee, but a man whose eyes have been opened. Do not trouble yourself about the Pharisees, but praise the Lord for opening your eyes!' He is an intelligent soldier-telegraphist, and went away saying, 'I know nothing whatever about my Bible; I have never yet read it!'"

Mrs. Osborn-Howe's address in South Africa is, care of J. Storrs Lister, Esq., King William's Town, Cape Colony.

Pirie Kaffir Mission, Cape Colony.

Recently a wave of blessing has been passing over this district, and, as a result, numbers have been gathered in from among the heathen. Great zeal on the part of many of the believers has been manifested, and it is matter for gratitude that their labours, with God's blessing, have not been in vain. In all fifty-eight souls have during the past three months declared themselves for the Lord, and publicly surrendered themselves to Him. Sometimes for a whole week we held forth night and day among the villages, only resting a few hours between times.

Notwithstanding the prolonged drought, beer-drinking prevails among the "Reds" to an unlimited extent, and is the great obstacle to our work. Much want prevails, and most of the available men have gone to the towns for work. Our church funds have suffered greatly, and will not rise till rain and a good season come. (Rev.) David A. M'Donald.

Conversion of an Anarchist.

The sympathy of the civilized world has been recently aroused on behalf of Italy by the assassination of good King Humbert, while the unhappy Anarchists are regarded as the outcasts of society, and with feelings of horror. But even they are not beyond the reach of God's grace and mercy, as the following fact will show:—

About two years ago, a noted and "dangerous" Anarchist in Pisa had been marked by the Government for deportation to the "domicilio coalto," when somehow a Bible fell into his hands and did its blessed work, leading him to attend an evangelical church, and finally to embrace the Gospel.

When the time came for his trial, he boldly declared his change of views, and said: "No evangelical Christian could be an Anarchist." The Court of Justice was so impressed by this testimony that the man was absolved, and he has ever since been leading a Christian life, and earning an honest living.

Is not this fact a call to show practical sympathy with Italy in her sorrow, by endeavouring to reach some, at least, of these unhappy men who are a terror to society? An ex-Italian officer, now an evangelist residing in Pisa, has had such a work much laid on his heart since the above conversion took place, and more especially since the assassination of the King. He is also desirous to utilize two rooms belonging to his church as reading-rooms for the many infantry and artillery soldiers who are always stationed in Pisa, but his hands are tied by lack of means. For nearly forty years I have longed that something should be done for the soldiers there, and now the way seems opened, but the pressing claims of my schools prevent me from being able to assist, as I should wish, in carrying these plans into effect, as a sum of not less than £750 is required annually to keep up the work in its present state of efficiency, while the income from all sources last year fell short of this sum by £120. Instead, therefore, of being able to take up fresh work, I often fear that, after thirty years of arduous labour to build up the work, I may be constrained to close some of the schools and thus cause the enemies of the Gospel to triumph and rejoice.

During my stay in England I should be thankful to receive contributions for any of the above objects, and especially annual subscriptions to replace those lost year by year through the death of old friends of the Pisa schools. (Miss) S. H. Carruthers.

Y.W.C.A. Holiday Home, Simla.

This year, a Y.W.C.A. Holiday Home has, through the generosity of a friend, been opened up here in Simla, where women and girls who, for eleven months in the year, live in the plains, can have at least a month of rest and peace in this comparatively cool climate. It has been a great boon, and already we have received grateful letters from those who have left to go back to their work in the plains. None but those who have been in India can realize the burden of an Indian summer to those who cannot afford the luxuries that make it bearable. The rent, which is £80 per annum, has been paid this year by a friend. We hope, God willing, to be in the position to buy the premises the year after next, but in the meanwhile we are in a difficulty for our next year's rent.

Amongst those who have been with us this year are several assistant missionaries (Eurasians), for whom no hill allowance has been provided, and who, except for our Home, would have been unable to get the change they so badly needed. They have gone back strengthened to spread abroad amongst the heathen the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Communications may be sent either to Miss B. Picton-Warlow, Evening Priory, Bridgend, Glamorgan, or to the Hon. E. Kinnaird, 115, Mount Street, London, W.

Simla. Edith Picton-Warlow.

Foreigners in London.—The London City Mission has fourteen missionaries to foreigners and Jews in the Metropolis—one to the French, two to the Germans, one to the Italians, one to the Spanish, Portuguese, Italian, and French sailors, one to Scandinavians, one to Asiatics and Africans, and seven to Jews.

The Indian Famine.

FOOD SUPPLIES.

A FURTHER supply of foods for the famine-stricken is being sent out this week per s.s. Clan Ronald, the owners, Messrs. Cayzer, Irvine, and Co., generously taking the goods freight free. The consignment includes a quantity of oat flour from Messrs. A. and R. Scott, Ltd., of Glasgow, a ton of biscuits from Messrs. McCall and Stephen, Glasgow, a similar quantity from Messrs. John Walker, Ltd., Glasgow, and about two tons from Messrs. Gray, Dunn, and Co., Glasgow. Messrs. Wm. Watson and Co., of 7, Waterloo Place, London, are, as before, rendering valuable service in connection with the shipment of these goods, which will be consigned to their Bombay house and distributed among the missionaries in the affected districts.

NOTES FROM WORKERS.

Mr. E. M. De Monti, of Calcutta, writes in appreciative terms of the work of Rev. W. P. Byers, of the American Methodist Episcopal Mission at Assansol, Bengal. Mr. Monti refers to the famine waifs who have been collected in the Gujarat and Bheel districts. Some of the little ones were in a very neglected condition, and had to be cleansed with kerosene and mustard oil by Mr. Byers and his co-workers. It is hoped to rescue 250 children, who will receive support and training.

The officer in charge of the Salvation Army operations and Famine Relief Works in Central India (Lieut.-Col. Nurani) details the principal needs of the famine sufferers as:—(1) Advances to help them to cultivate their fields; (2) food and grain to keep them alive while cultivating. They have now left the relief works, where they earned a little money, and as the crops will take several months to grow, they cannot live without some help in this way. The Government undertakes to give loans to those who are registered landholders under the Government, but there are thousands of others who hold land, not Government property, who are not eligible for this assistance. It is here that private enterprise is so valuable. Lieut.-Col. Nurani adds:—"We have from villages where the people all own fields, but for want of a little monetary assistance are unable to take advantage of the rains now falling. In addition to the large number of persons in thirty-three villages to whom we have advanced money for this purpose, we last week distributed 3,000 rupees to the poor Bheels. Three or four days later we again distributed for the same purpose in the Anand Division, the same amount to fifteen villages. In regard to the food, we are hoping to continue our cheap grain shops for the next three or four months, and even to increase them, and also the grain given to day-school children. Clothing, which is a great need in these heavy rains, we are also distributing, and hope for increased means for doing the same. It is very shocking to see really big children of eleven or twelve absolutely without clothes. The men and women are also in a terrible condition in that respect."

In the second monthly report of the Americo-Indian Relief Committee it is stated that "Good rain has now fallen over practically the whole of the famine area, almost ensuring that when the early crops are reaped a few months hence, the famine proper will be at an end. But till then many legitimate and urgent objects of relief will have to be considered. For the present, the most urgent seem to be in getting their fields sown, clothing to people whose suffering is increased by rain, damp, and cholera, and the support of orphan children, whose numbers are very large and are increasing, as cholera carries off adults. In their tour of observation, the chairman, executive secretary, and assistant secretary were satisfied that in general the agencies in the districts visited, to whom this Committee has entrusted money for administration, have used their trust faithfully and wisely. A vast amount of distress has been alleviated in a judicious and economical way. As in the first month, the larger part of the money has been administered by some form of missionary agency."

From Poona, Rev. Edmund J. Jones writes: "Just now the people are feeling the famine worst, for while the rain has fallen, it has been so heavy that not only are some of the crops being destroyed, but outdoor work is at a standstill."

Mrs. M. A. Haig, of the Christian Literature Society, Ahmednagar, reports that needed rains have fallen. "We are very hopeful, but there is not yet much reduction in the price of food. We are selling corn at a reduced rate. Great crowds come to buy. We are now supporting a number of boys and aged people, and have distributed a large amount of clothing."

In the district of Ahmedabad the intense anxiety has happily been relieved, and have visited this sorely-afflicted province. Much of the money contributed is being spent in rehabilitating the cultivators by supplying them with seed grain, ploughing cattle, &c. Dr. George P. Taylor writes:—"We still have 140 women and children sheltered in our mission compound, and the care and oversight of these constitute no slight task. It is only through generous help and kind assistance that we have been enabled to carry on our work of mercy. We trust that by October or November the acuteness of the famine will be over. Its effects, however, will tell adversely for years to come. It is impossible for us to overestimate our indebtedness to those readers who have so generously remembered us in this time of sore affliction. Unfortunately the rainfall has not been general. The loss of their cattle is a most serious disaster to the inhabitants, for when rain comes they will have to face the problem of tilling their land without bullocks."

A FAMILY OF 450.

Although cholera is raging in the district, the inmates have not suffered from the dreadful scourge. Relief is also given from the Home to the villagers by providing work. In one village seven-eighths of the cattle have perished. All that has been done by Government and Christians at home is small compared with the urgent needs of the villagers.

American Notes.

THE Ocean Grove Camp meeting is now in full swing in the world-renowned village of tents and cottages on the shore of New Jersey. Every day, from 5.45 a.m. till 10.30 p.m., the incense of prayer and praise and voice of preaching and exhortation goes outward and upward as a mighty force for good, whose influence is only bounded by the confines of "the great globe itself."

Two of the most popular of the daily meetings are the Young People's Meeting, from 9 till 10 o'clock, and the Twilight Service, from 6 p.m. to 7, conducted by C. H. Yatman.

Yesterday morning Mr. Yatman announced, after the opening hymn and prayer, that his sermon would be delivered in song. On the platform were about fifty singers, whose voices were supported by a small organ, a grand piano, two cornets, four violins, and a flute. The congregation numbered probably 1,500 people, of whom perhaps from a quarter to a third were men. After two hymns came a

"SONG WITHOUT WORDS"—

"Safe in the arms of Jesus," by the Bradford trio (two violins and a flute). This latter form of presenting a hymn Mr. Yatman frequently introduces in his meetings with great effect. At that particular point he directed all the preachers present to gather all their people together on their return home and proceed to inaugurate a song sermon night as a regular weekly institution in their churches, assuring them that not only would the congregational singing be improved, but that unconverted people would be attracted to the Sunday services, many of whom would be converted through coming to hear the Gospel.

From "Safe in the arms of Jesus," we proceeded to "When the Roll is called up Yonder," and "Will you go? Will you go to that beautiful land with me?" and another song without words, "Hiding in Thee," by two cornets and piano. Then a little talk from the leader, gathering together the messages of the various songs and presenting them in a forcible appeal to the bad to be good, and

THE GOOD TO BE BETTER.

From music to an object-lesson. Mr. Yatman produced a praying wheel (for holding in the hand) that he had obtained at Darjeeling, in India. When the owner wanted to pray, he just took hold of the spindle, gave it a twirl, and round went the drum or wheel at the top, which duly presented the prayer written on a long strip of paper inside. The speaker said that prayers of the same mechanical kind were not unknown in some American churches. The Buddhists sometimes bring the prayer slip out on a post. When there was wind to blow the strip out, there was prayer, but no wind no prayer. That also was a phenomenon often seen here. Passing on to another point, he announced his intention to form a syndicate for the benefit of the famine sufferers in India, and that he would invoke the aid of two dolls that had been given him in Australia to help forward mission work in that land. One was a black-haired doll, with a pale-blue dress, that had been given him by a little girl in Melbourne; and the other, with flaxen hair, wore the uniform of the hospital nurses at Newcastle, New South Wales, who had dressed and donated it for the same purpose. Two young ladies carried these dolls to the front of the platform, and within ten minutes over fifty dollars had been given to the dolls by members of the congregation.

A MARTYR TO PAIN.

Yesterday I met at Ocean Grove Mr. John Jaeger, superintendent of the Mission of Living Water in Christie Street (east side slums), New York. He is, perhaps, the only preacher in that city who has for six years preached the Gospel while suffering severe pain during all his waking hours. His complaint is palsy, following an attack of grippe. He continually suffers a dull, throbbing pain, as if the parts affected were "being crushed between two millstones." He has "tried everything" without obtaining relief, and has been told by several specialists that there is no cure for him. Fortunately, the pain stops when he is asleep, and he can go to sleep within half-an-hour at any time he wishes; he admits that but for this he would have gone mad before now. The complaint took hold first of his left foot, extended gradually up the whole left side, and has now reached the right arm and hand. When I asked him if he thought he would have to give up preaching on account of this affliction, he simply smiled again, and said, "No, I will stand and preach till I drop!" And in manner and demeanour he is as bright and cheerful as the most healthy Christian could be; there is not the slightest thing about him to suggest even murmuring, much less martyrdom, such as he must really suffer. He is a striking example of the truth, "The joy of the Lord is your strength."

Life's Changes.

Our lives are full of changes
That take us by surprise;
Tho' all things He arranges
Who only is All-Wise!

'Tis sin that mars the beauty
Our lives would oft display,
If in the path of duty
We walked from day to day.

A tangled skein we find it,
As from that path we swerve;
Nor can our skill unwind it
While self alone we serve.

The bells on high are ringing
Sweet tunes we may not hear,
While to our idols clinging,
Forgetting God is near.

The light of glory streaming
From heaven we may not see,
While we are idly dreaming
Of what may never be.

Nor will the mere profession
Of creeds that live and die
Ensure us the possession
Of true nobility.

In Christ alone is centred
The glory we may find,
When, on his service entered,
We leave the world behind.

The Christian's joy increaseth,
Tho' years may changes bring,
And when earth's music ceaseth,
The bells of heaven still ring!

Countess Schimmelmann.

At the Noon Prayer Meeting of the Aldersgate Y.M.C.A. on Wednesday week, a warm reception was accorded to the Countess Schimmelmann. The life of this devoted Christian is a familiar story, and one which gathers to itself deeper interest year by year, as God abundantly owns the efforts of his servant in seeking the lost and winning souls to Himself.

The Countess, in the course of her address, gave a vivid description of her travels since she last spoke at the Noon Prayer Meeting. She is now on her way back to America to resume her evangelistic labours. During the past year she has journeyed some 60,000 miles in her yacht, and nowhere has the anchor been cast without manifest tokens of God's presence and power to save being realized.

In recording her experiences the Countess recognises the hand of God directing her movements, and speaks from a grateful, overflowing heart. Her visits to Chicago and New York were no less remarkable for the attendant than the support given by those from whom opposition was naturally expected. On one occasion a troupe of theatricals had arrived in the city to perform "Hamlet." The services to be held by the Countess were announced, and during the week of her mission not a single ticket for the performance could be sold; and eventually the play hall had to be closed. Where there is no sympathy with the object of her gatherings, the Countess commands esteem. The manager of a theatre promised, if she would appear at the playhouse, the actors should give place for her meeting. Needless to say, the offer was accepted, and a memorable service was held. At another city, where the Countess was announced to hold a mission, a council of German anarchists met to discuss whether the meetings should be permitted. The threatened opposition was overcome, and the anarchists were invited to attend the gatherings. At one of the meetings, when the hall was crowded, the invitation was given for all who wished to be saved to rise to their feet. Everyone in the hall immediately rose. Thinking she was misunderstood, the speaker repeated the invitation, and again the vast assembly rose to know the way of salvation. The most fashionable young lady in another town was brought under deep conviction while listening to the pleadings of the Countess. One by one the diamonds which adorned her fingers were removed, and she surrendered herself wholly to Christ. The following day the carriage of the young lady was placed at the disposal of the Countess, as no hall was sufficiently large to accommodate the crowds who assembled to hear the Gospel from the lips of this faithful witness.

A note of gratitude to God rings through the recital of her experiences, and the earnest, stirring appeal of the Countess at the meeting, for the prayerful sympathy of God's people with her in her arduous labours, will not be readily forgotten. It is to be regretted that the prospects of this work are not particularly promising, for it is probable that, through lack of funds, it will be found necessary to abandon the ship which has served so useful a purpose in the activities of the Countess and her co-workers.

A Puritan's Call to London.— We are expecting the time when the Spirit of the Lord is to be poured forth more copiously, more generally, and in a greater measure, than hitherto; and what an honour will be it that shall be put upon London, if that shall be made a luminary to so great a part of the world besides, as such a city can fall under the notice and observation of! Instead of shame, here will be glory. Do you glory (instead of being ashamed) to bear your part in so noble a design, to revive languishing religion in our land, and in London, and in our age. John Howe (1694).

Mr. E. Tennyson Smith.

TEMPERANCE REFORMER.

Among temperance reformers widely known throughout the country and in the colonies, Mr. E. Tennyson Smith, founder of the "Temperance Ironsides," occupies a prominent position.

A native of Birmingham, he comes of pious parentage, and was converted to God while a young man. On hearing the famous J. B. Gough, he espoused the temperance cause for his life work. In a very short time the force of his speaking, and the dramatic style of his delivery, earned for him the title of "the second Gough." By dint of hard work he won a position in the ranks of temperance lecturers; and after ten years of successful labour, during which he visited most of the leading cities in England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, with great success, he started on a Colonial tour. This was in 1890, and in Australia and New Zealand he was much used in stirring up public opinion and securing wider attention to the great evils of the drink traffic. He travelled over 50,000 miles, delivered over 1,500 lectures, &c., and secured over 32,000 pledges.

In 1895 Mr. Tennyson Smith returned to England, and was accorded splendid receptions in London and Birmingham. Since that time he has been almost continuously at work, and in 1896 travelled in England and Wales over 5,000 miles, delivered 351 lectures, and secured 14,000 pledges, and in three years secured 27,000 pledges. In almost every town visited, whether in the Metropolis or the provinces, not only have the largest halls been packed, but hundreds turned away from the doors.

There is something unique—one might say audacious—in the methods of this temperance advocate. He is wont to visit the offices of local breweries, and having furnished himself with copies of shareholders' lists, he reads out, to astonished audiences, the names of the partners in gigantic drink concerns. From time to time the particulars come as a "revelation" to the general public, leaders in Church and State appearing in the unpleasant light of supporters of the degrading drink business, which in turn is shown to support them by fat dividends.

Another specialty with Mr. Tennyson Smith is his practical reproof of inconsistency on the part of Christian churches in regard to the traffic. As the result of careful investigation, he has charged Christians with being blood-guilty in this matter. He found liquor-sellers holding office in churches and devoting of their income to the support of Christian work. He denounced this "complicity," and called upon the churches to wash their hands of the traffic. He gave publicity to several startling cases, in order, as he said, to awaken the Church on the subject, and has persistently continued the agitation.

The voice thus raised has at length been heard in the councils of the churches. There is, however, much yet to be done before the reproach can be regarded as "taken away." Such work has, of necessity, involved its promoter in considerable controversy. Not all societies and institutions set for the propagation of temperance principles have agreed with his methods or adopted his course of procedure. Yet from point to point Mr. Tennyson Smith has pushed his attack, and when denied the co-operation of influential societies he has found warm support in popular opinion.

In 1896 he started a monthly paper, entitled The Temperance World, to advocate his views with reference to the Christian Church, and a more aggressive policy in temperance reform. He also founded the society called "Temperance Ironsides," which has achieved marked success. We trust that these agencies will help on the good cause, and that an ever-growing measure of blessing will attend our friend's efforts on the platform and in the press, as well as through the instrumentality of his "Ironside" confederates.

Protestant Reformation Society.

Many who have noted with sympathy and interest the persistent stand Rev. R. C. Hallowes, M.A., of Arklow, Ireland, took upon the question of the right to preach the Gospel in the open air in Romish centres, will be interested to hear that Rev. Dr. Wright has been giving him some assistance. Dr. Wright has preached at the morning and evening services for the past two Sundays in that town.

Mr. W. A. Limbrick, the secretary, who is resting awhile at Gorleston, attended and briefly addressed a Protestant gathering there last week. This little fishing town, which is rapidly becoming a favourite summer resort, has no Church of England service save that provided by Rev. Forbes Phillips, who gained such unenviable notoriety a short time since by his defiance of the Bishop of Norwich, and his pugilistic display against Mr. Kensit. As an adjunct to "Morning Prayer" in Gorleston Church, there is a procession with four acolytes in scarlet cassocks and white cottas, who are apparently useful for nothing but show purposes. They are seated in the sacrarium. Coloured stoles, lighted candles in broad daylight, and other "points" in the Romanizing plan of campaign, are observed.

A Memento from Northfield.

CONFERENCE HYMN, 1900.
(Tune, "Zion.")

Heaven's grace is still descending
On these hills, as oft before,
And the Holy Spirit's sending
His apostles as of yore.
Lowly bending,
Jesus Christ we do adore.
Love is lending
List'ning ears as we implore.

Gathered on this mount of blessing,
God's great mercy we extol.
Here we leave all grief distressing,
Here our burdens from us roll.
Sin confessing
Brings deep peace into each soul.
Christ possessing,
Heaven becomes our only goal.

Though we miss the inspiration
That hath led us long and well,
With such loving ministration
Mortal man may never tell,
His creation
Ever on these hills doth dwell.
From each nation
Songs of praise to heaven shall swell.

Still that loving spirit pleadeth
That we bow before God's might,
And his last brief utterance leadeth
Out into celestial light.
"Earth recedeth,
Heaven is opening on my sight.
Earth recedeth,
Heaven is opening on my sight."

THE LATE

Mrs. A. N. Somerville.

By Rev. THOMAS ADAMSON, D.D.,
Free Anderston Church, Glasgow.

It is our pleasure, from time to time, not only to describe the work of departed saints who were prominent in the cause of Christ, but to outline the careers of such as were eminently Christ-like. In this latter class special mention should be made of Mrs. Isabella Mirrlees Somerville, widow of the late well-known evangelist, Rev. Dr. A. N. Somerville, of Free Anderston Church, Glasgow.

She was one of four daughters in a family which gave signs of unusual literary talent. Their father, Mr. James Ewing, of Halifax, N.S., was married to Miss Marianne Mirrlees, of Glasgow. The subject of this sketch was their eldest daughter. Her father, who had settled in Glasgow, was awakened by reading that excellent, though now little-known work, Doddridge's "Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul," and was guided into light by Rev. Michael Willis, at that time minister of Free Renfield Church, and afterwards Principal of Knox's College, Toronto. When Mr. Ewing left for Bath, on account of his wife's health, he enjoyed the ministrations of the famous Rev. William Jay.

His eldest daughter passed through a great spiritual change when at school, under the influence of her teacher, Miss Mackean (the foundress of the Mackean-Bentinck Institution at Naples). An early interest in foreign missions was also roused in her by the great Dr. Duff, of Calcutta, when on one of his early visits to Scotland.

She was married in 1841 to the young black-haired minister of Anderston, Rev. Alexander Neil Somerville, (even then famous as the means of beginning the Kilsyth revival), the saintly Rev. Robert Murray McCheyne acting as groomsman. In her new sphere of work, she found even more extended opportunities of usefulness; the congregation was one well known for the number of its workers, and the activity of its agencies for saving the lost, and promoting the kingdom of Christ. She threw herself into the work with all her heart, and though the care of husband and children was a first claim on her, she found both time and means of helping in the more public work going on around her.

Even in his early days Mr. Somerville's activities were not by any means confined to the district in which he worked. They expanded throughout Scotland and the larger cities of England and Ireland—London, Manchester, Liverpool, Newcastle, Dublin, and Belfast—and spread into Canada and Spain. His wife bore nobly the grave responsibilities and the great strain occasioned by these frequent and prolonged absences. When, later, he was called away much more to other lands, the trial was even greater; but in 1864 an affection of the heart reduced thenceforth her active participation in many agencies which she had been accustomed to help, and she was left more at liberty to watch over his home interests. But her longing to help in the coming of her Lord's kingdom remained unchanged. And that soon showed itself.

In her early days she had been able to assist her husband much in his efforts to rouse the interest of his congregation and of the people of Glasgow, in the cause of Foreign Missions. She had been not only his sympathetic, but his zealous and untiring helper in the ordinary work of the district where the church was situated; she had not only taken part in its more ordinary branches, but had led the ladies of the congregation in aiding their minister in his crusade against vice, by inducing them to support him as he preached the Gospel in the streets at midnight to the degraded and fallen, and dealing with those who stood listening to what he had proclaimed.

Always, however, her decided preference was for the work she could do unostentatiously. So when her health broke down, and the old ways of activity were forbidden, she found new ones, suited to her strength, and consonant with her tastes. Though in some ways a permanent invalid, she was a constant and marked power for good over her servants; and she had no greater pleasure than that supplied by bringing young people to Jesus, or directing them early into his service. She had much faith in the power of the truth, and never failed to use all opportunities of tract distribution.

All this, be it remembered, implied no lack of moral courage. The faith which had been her support when, as a young wife and mother, she accompanied her husband in leaving home and salary, and beloved associations, at the Disruption in 1843, for Christ's sake, enabled her to do what many a physically stronger person would have shrunk from, if not shunned. She could reprove profane swearing and obtrusive public drinking with plainness as well as with tact; and it is reported that she called on a certain Roman Catholic priest (one of the few types of men which she disliked), who seemed to her to be negligent of his duties, that she might impress on him the responsibilities of his position.

Her husband's connection with missions in other lands made their home for long years to be a constant sphere of Christian hospitality. And many a stranger to the city and to our land found in her a "nursing mother," ever to be remembered with gratitude and love. In fact, all who knew her, especially in her own home, were impressed with the large-hearted love that embraced them, and the motherly care that was ungrudgingly extended towards them.

From Photograph by Lafayette, Dublin.

It was in these circumstances that the fine spiritual tone of her Christianity had opportunity of becoming apparent. Her religion was not unlike that of the sainted Samuel Rutherford, of Anwoth — that old Scotch Puritan, whose "Letters" are so well known wherever English is spoken and Christianity appreciated. For it had this mark — it breathed intense love to her Saviour. Its instinct was always towards what was spiritual and essential. It was so unconscious and humble, so filled with the spirit of unselfishness and meekness, that it attracted to Christ all who came in contact with it, and caused his people to love him better than ever. Spiritual things were ever present to her. Her conversation always breathed of them. Love to Christ filled her words as sunlight pervades the air. Her Lord had such a place in her heart that she was constantly trying to find Him in the same place in the heart of others, or to secure it for Him. When honours flowed in on her husband, as Moderator of the General Assembly of his Church, and as representing it at the Jubilee of Her Majesty the Queen, or as an evangelist of recognised power and world-wide activity, she found her sphere in praying day and night for him and the work. For fully the last ten years of her life, since her husband's death, she lay ripening in the sunlight of her Saviour's love, and her eyes constantly scanned the horizon with longings for any signs of the nearness of the better land.

When her Lord called her on July 3, to the communion of perfected saints, she had reached the advanced age of eighty-three, and was as a shock of corn fully ripe.

Points and Outlines.

Water for the Thirsty.

(Isa. lv. 1).

(I.) Are you thirsty? "Come" (John iv. 14).
(II.) Are you without money? "Come" (Rev. xxi. 6).
(III.) Are you now ready? "Come" (Luke xiv. 17). Thomas Heath.

Human Need.

As diseased creatures we need a physician; as wanderers, we need a leader; as blind, we want one to give us light; as perishing of thirst, we need the living spring, of which if a man drink, he thirsts no more; as dead, we require life. The sheep look for the shepherd, the children for one who shall teach them aright. Yes, all mankind cries aloud for Jesus, that its sins and wanderings may not issue in final condemnation, but that, delivered by Him from the pollution of sin, men may be gathered into the heavenly garner. Clement of Alexandria.

Be Strong.

(i.) Be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might (Eph. vi. 10).
(ii.) —— in the grace that is in Christ Jesus (2 Tim. ii. 1).
(iii.) —— in faith, giving glory to God (Rom. iv. 20).
(iv.) —— in the word of God (1 John ii. 14).
(v.) —— in your love (Song of Sol. viii. 6 Phil. iii. 8).
(vi.) —— in prayer (Heb. v. 7; James v. 17, 18).

J. P. Coster.

God's Love and Providence.

God's love is so boundless that all the legions of angels are sheltered by it even as you and I are. His justice is so exact that the appeal of no wronged slave or sempstress goes up to the Lord of Sabaoth unheard. His attention is so wondrous that there is not a bird in the air but he guides its flight and notices its alarm; not a lily in the field but his hand shapes its stalks and paints its petals, and shakes its fragrant censer in the wind.

Special Prayer for Israel

ON SEPTEMBER 29 (JEWISH SABBATH) IN ANTICIPATION OF THEIR GREAT DAY OF ATONEMENT, 1900, ON OCTOBER 3.

THE unbelieving world and Satan "the god of this world," would gladly get rid of the Jew if they could; the world, because, in the competitions of these closing ages, the Jew is the most formidable rival in all professions and in every branch of commerce; Satan, because the survival of this people, after ages of persecution and exile, is the great external proof of the truth of God's Holy Word, as well as an earnest of the coming victory of Him who is the incarnate Word, who came "to destroy the works of the Devil."

The Church of Christ to a very limited extent interests herself in the present sorrows of Israel, and manifests little anxiety for the hastening of the time when Israel will take her promised supremacy over all the nations of the earth. These nations being Gentiles, and such of them as are nominally Christian holding the Churches within their dominions in a quasi partnership in their ambitions, their wars, and their diplomacies, cannot look forward with equanimity to the day when their pretensions to be called "Great Powers" will be swept away, and Czars and Kaisers and Kings and Presidents shall be set aside; when "there shall be one Lord and His Name One." Multitudes in this country, I am well persuaded, including a good many earnest believers, would pronounce it exceedingly unpatriotic to desire the re-establishment of the Jewish monarchy if it involved—as it certainly will—the lowering of the proud position of the British Empire, not to say its total dissolution.

That violent and disastrous changes are speedily coming to pass in the earth no thoughtful and prayerful student of the Word of God can hesitate to believe. It is not only that the black and yellow races are beginning to assert themselves, and that Asia and Africa may not much longer submit to be exploited by the European peoples to their enormous material loss: this is a portent for future yea for present statesmen to consider, and one aspect is already visible in the crisis in China. But we are witnesses of something much more significant.

The Zionist movement, although derided, discouraged, and even opposed by the wealthy Jews in the capitals of Europe, by most of the leading Rabbis, and by the Press, which is now so largely under Jewish leadership, is making headway steadily—witness the fourth annual Congress recently held in London. The Zionists have a distinct aim, clearly avowed and eloquently expressed, namely the formation, in the Land promised to their fathers, of a modern Jewish State, by permission of the Sultan of Turkey, and with the recognition of the principal European Governments. Of a people so intelligent, so clever in acquiring wealth, so patient and so persevering, it is difficult to believe their aim can be frustrated excepting by Divine intervention; but have we not every reason to expect that this Divine intervention will be with them and not against them? Does not the prophecy of Ezekiel xxxvii. 1-14 point to the revival of national existence rather than to a spiritual revival; to the coming together of the widely scattered portions of the Jewish people and to the manifestation of their new-born aspirations for acknowledgment by all other nations—that they too are a nation, that they have a destined home, that they have a magnificent future? We must frankly own that there seem no indications that the present Zionist movement is influenced by any spiritual longings; its leaders give no sign of being animated by other than earthly and material considerations; all the more is their aim in accord with the conviction of Bible students that the people will return to their Land in disbelief of Jesus of Nazareth as their true Messiah.

But that is not the ultimate result of such a return; we look beyond to the fulfilment of a very different prophecy, that, namely in Zechariah xii. 10-14, xiii. 1-2; when the Jewish nation,—like the ten Apostles on the evening of the resurrection day, like Thomas eight days afterwards,—"shall look upon Him whom they have pierced." We sometimes forget that the Jewish people are God's earthly people, with great promises of earthly blessing, a people who walk by sight and not by faith; they think that "seeing is believing": but the Church of God is a heavenly people, with no promise of earthly blessing, but only of tribulation; the people who "walk by faith and not by sight." Not until the manifestation once more of Jesus Christ upon the earth, "in flaming fire taking vengeance" upon Israel's enemies, will that people be compelled to recognise in the Crucified One the long-promised Messiah whom their forefathers rejected; and "in that day," "the day of the Lord," they will mourn their age-long blindness and unbelief; and then indeed "a nation will be born (will be new-born or regenerate) in a day," and Christ will begin His reign of righteousness and peace.

What then are the subjects for prayer which may fitly be presented to God (at this time especially), through the gracious mediation of Israel's "Great High Priest who is passed into the Heavens"?

I. That during the coming winter and spring, whilst the nineteenth century is closing behind us and the twentieth century opens up before us, God would grant by the mighty working of His Word and Spirit a remarkable ingathering to Christ, through the instrumentality of all true Evangelical missions to the Jews; and that thus we may be gladdened and our faith confirmed that "at this time also there is a remnant according to the election of grace" (Rom. xi. 5).

II. That God would so over-rule and control the Zionist movement, that it may further His own great plan for the gathering of Israel to their own Land according to His promise—"I will plant them upon their Land, and they shall no more be plucked up out of their Land which I have given them, saith the Lord Thy God" (Amos ix. 15): for, inasmuch as we know He can make "the wrath of man to praise Him," so too we may well believe He can use as instruments worldly-minded and ambitious men to the advancement of Christ's Kingdom and the hastening of His return.

III. That in His great and tender mercy, God would restrain the spirit of hatred and persecution of the Jews, at present widely prevalent amongst many of the peoples of Europe; that He would incline their Rulers, especially in Russia and Roumania, to desist from the encouragement of violence and wrong doing towards the Jews, and lead these rulers favourably to consider the advantages of the Zionist movement.

IV. That the Lord would incline His own people in all the Churches to give more heed to the claims of Israel for their prayers and practical sympathy; and to make proof of God's faithfulness to His promise to Abraham, "I will bless them that bless thee" (Gen. xii. 3).

On behalf of the Prayer Union for Israel,
JAMES E. MATHIESON, President.

For full particulars of Jewish persecution in the present day, I would refer to the Jewish Chronicle of August 17, which gives a full report of the Zionist Congress in Queen's Hall last month.

On Saturday, September 29, there will be prayer meetings on behalf of Israel at 11 a.m., and at 3 and 7 p.m., in the Central Hall, Philpot Street, Commercial Road, E.

Protestantism in the Midlands. — The twenty-ninth annual report of the Birmingham Christian Evidence and Protestant Laymen's Association is a record which appeals to all concerned with the struggle for supremacy between the forces of truth and error. Cromwell Hall has been secured as the permanent centre of the various agencies of the society, and here a vigorous aggressive work is maintained. The Sunday services in the Lecture Hall, the Children's Protestant Mission, the library, with its 3,000 volumes, are the principal means whereby the dissemination of Protestant teaching is accomplished and the false pretensions and arrogant assumptions of the Romanizing clergy are exposed. The secretary is Mr. T. H. Aston, Cromwell Hall, Heath Green Road, Winson Green, Birmingham.

Mr. Sankey's Movements.

CONTINUING his brief tour in Ireland, Mr. IRA D. SANKEY visited Limerick on September 6, and gave his "Service of Sacred Song and Story" in Munster Hall, the meeting being arranged by the Y.M.C.A.

Long before the hour when the meeting was to commence, the hall was filled to its utmost capacity. The choir and congregation joined in singing many of the hymns from well-known sacred songs and solos. The meeting was opened with prayer by Rev. T. B. ROBERTSON, Rector of St. Munchin's; after which, the Chairman, Mr. THOMAS GRUBB, President of the Y.M.C.A., welcomed Mr. and Mrs. Sankey in a few appropriate words.

Mr. Sankey then conducted the service, of interest concerning the twenty-seven years that he and Mr. Moody were associated in evangelistic work. He also told the origin of many hymns, amongst them, "When the Mists have Rolled Away," "Saved by Grace," "My Ain Countrie," and "The Ninety and Nine." Mr. Sankey sang these and other hymns as they came in the story.

RELATING MANY INCIDENTS

Mr. Sankey's voice proved to be still full and clear, and the audience expressed their hearty appreciation of the address. Deep interest was felt, too, when Mr. Sankey recalled various

LINKS WITH THE Y.M.C.A.

He and Mr. Moody were members, and met as delegates at a Y.M.C.A. convention. It was a Y.M.C.A. secretary, too—at York—who was the first to invite the evangelists to hold Gospel meetings on their arrival at Liverpool, in 1873. The address was listened to with rapt attention, and the meeting throughout was of a profitable and interesting character.

Mr. Sankey also visited Waterford, where the service afforded spiritual stimulus and pleasure to many hearers.

Under the auspices of the Dublin Y.M.C.A., Mr. Sankey visited the Irish capital on Sunday last, holding two services in the Metropolitan Hall. The congregations were very large, and many were unable to obtain admission.

Mr. Sankey expressed the joy he felt at being spared to come back again to the old country after so many years, but this time he came alone. They all felt sad at the absence of one who used to be such a tower of strength and such a blessing to many friends in that city. But he had finished his work, and finished it well, and had entered into his rest. Mr. Sankey said that he had just come from Northfield, the home of his departed friend, where, before sailing, he had the privilege of singing in the Convention, and he had great pleasure in bringing good tidings of the Northfield work.

A number of well-known hymns were sung by Mr. Sankey, including "What shall the harvest be?" which was given with much expression and feeling. Resuming his discourse, Mr. Sankey said he hoped that this and other hymns would continue their ministry of blessing, and that the Gospel might be preached and sung with greater power and devotion, for there was nothing that could lift a world from the slavery of sin but the glorious Gospel of the Son of God.

The London reception to the veteran worker, arranged for to-night (Thursday) at Exeter Hall, promises to be a remarkable occasion. Many hallowed memories of the great "Moody and Sankey" campaigns are aroused by the visit, and very many who received blessing during those glorious revivals rejoice at the prospect of taking part in this Metropolitan welcome. A report of the proceedings will appear in our next issue. Other engagements of Mr. Sankey's are—Sunday, Sept. 16, Trinity Presbyterian Church, Hampstead; Wednesday, Sept. 26, New Court Chapel, Tollington Park, N

A Public-house Story.

FOR more than a century the house in which I now live was kept by my forefathers as a Public-house. In 1881 it came into my possession, and I still continued the wine and spirit trade. I never liked the business, and rarely ever touched any alcoholic liquor myself. It was a good business from a worldly standpoint.

My brother lived with me, although he had no share in the business, and about 1894 he was led by the Holy Spirit to give his heart to God. We both attended our church regularly—were baptized in the church; we led what the casual observer would call a good life—gave to the poor and to charitable institutions, and thought by these outward acts we were safe.

My brother was the first to see the error of all this, the first to grasp the meaning of Matt. xviii. 3, "Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven." He saw that baptism was not regeneration, that there must be the baptism of the Holy Spirit, and the trustfulness of the child, that there must be a full consecration of his life—all put upon the altar.

There was soon a great change in his life, and I saw it. For three years he prayed for me. I did not know this at the time; if I had I should no doubt have thought I did not want his prayers, as I, according to my own views, Pharisee like, was good enough.

Just at this time I had a severe illness, and God plainly showed me that I was building upon a sandy foundation. I became troubled about my soul, and I promised God that if I got well my life should be given to Him. I got well, but I could get no peace. My past life weighed heavily upon me, and I could not cast the load upon Jesus, as He wanted me to. I kept thinking I must do something—

MUST GET BETTER FIRST.

In November, 1896, I was in London. I had been there a great many times, and had spent every night at theatres or music-halls, and really thoroughly enjoyed them; but I had lost all interest in these things. I did not know where to spend the evening, and intended, after my business was over, to go to my lodgings and read. As I rode up the Strand on a 'bus, I saw the words, "Young Men's Christian Association" over the entrance to Exeter Hall, and I made up my mind to spend the evening there. Consequently, at 7.30 I was there, and asked what was doing. I was told there was a prayer meeting in one part of the building, and that Mr. Reader Harris was speaking in another part. I was at once prompted to hear Mr. Harris, as I had heard my brother (who owed his conversion to the League) talk much about him.

At the end of the meeting I knew there was a change in me. I felt as peaceful and happy as a child. I waited with many others to have a private interview and some prayer with Mr. Harris, and I left that building happy.

Did I doubt before the existence of a devil? I could not do so now. If any man doubts the existence of a devil, let him get converted and he will soon feel Satan's power. All my besetting sins were hurled upon me with a tenfold force, but, God be praised, He had not saved me to let me fall. I was not to return like the sow to her wallowing in the mire. I found in Him my Keeper as well as my Cleanser, my Saviour from the power as well as the guilt of sin. It was a struggle, but I thank God He has preserved me from my old sins which I used to love, to long for, to look forward to. Now I positively hate them, and the things I once cared nothing for—the things of God—are now my greatest delight.

Little by little, the Holy Spirit revealed things in my life which I must give up. At length it was shown me I must if I wanted God's blessing. Here was a terrible test. "Ye cannot serve God and mammon" kept ringing in my ears. I asked God to give me a message direct from his Word to guide me, and I got this: "To him that knoweth to do good and dooth it not, to him it is sin" (James iv. 17). "For if we sin wilfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sin" (Heb. x. 26).

I fully decided to give up the business, and made arrangements with a gentleman to come and look through the books with the intention of selling him the goodwill. He came, took all the notes he required, and was to come again in a few days' time to make final arrangements. On the morning of the day appointed, I received a letter from him saying he could not come for a few days, and appointed the time. The night before he was to have come, my brother had wished me "Good Night," but in about ten minutes returned to my room and said: "The Lord has shown me you must not sell the goodwill of the business, but give it up."

I went to bed, but not to sleep; I prayed God to guide me right, and these were the words I had: "A little that a righteous man hath is better than the riches of many wicked" (Ps. xxxvii. 16). "Have not I commanded thee? Be strong and of good courage; be not afraid, neither be thou dismayed; for the Lord thy God is with thee whithersoever thou goest" (Joshua i. 9.) I was quite satisfied, and when the gentleman came I told him all, and he looked surprised, and I daresay said in his heart, "What a fool!" But God gave me strength to withstand the bellowing of the golden calf.

I gave notice to all my customers that in one week the business would be closed, and the house so long carried on as a public-house would be turned into a private residence.

When the week was up, up went the shutters, never more to be removed to let God's sunlight in upon the old scene. The devil had said I should be ruined and

BE CALLED A FOOL.

In the latter he was right, I was called a fool on all sides, but God whispered, "In the world ye shall have tribulation—but be of good cheer, I have overcome the world," and as I claimed my identification with Him, I too overcame all these jeers, and when people saw that none of those things moved me, they ceased.

As to being ruined, I can say that our good Father has not let me want, and I know He never will. I would not go back to the horrible trade again for any amount of money. Every day I am more thankful that I do not hear the cry of the women and children who suffer from this terrible curse, husbands and fathers spending in drunkenness what they should have for food and clothing.

There was one thing more in my business which I was shown after I had shut up the "Spirit Trade." It was this:—I used to sell

A LOT OF APPLE TREES.

One day I was preparing some lists of names of apples to send out to my customers, when something seemed to strike me like a sledge hammer, and said "stop." I wondered what it meant. I went down on my knees and said, "What is it, Lord?" and I heard the whisper, "What are the apple trees for?—To grow apples? And the apples?—To make cider? And the cider?" I saw it in a moment. I stopped the lists, and have not sold a tree since. Some said: "Oh, but the apples may have been eaten." They may have been, but their destiny, I knew, was cider. You may say this is straining out a gnat. That is just what I desire. I want every gnat strained out of my life. It is wonderful what pain a gnat can inflict on the body. On the soul it may mean eternal destruction. At all events, to me it was wrong, and we are told to "Abstain from everyform of evil." I do pray God to deliver me from all that He sees wrong in my life, and to make me more like Jesus, no matter how the process may hurt—a chip here and a bit added there until I shall be what He wants me to be.

"My Pride Won't Let Me."

A CABBY'S STORY.

"MORNIN', sir," said Gentleman Jem, as I mounted to my chosen seat beside him. I always took Jem's cab when I could, for he knew the ins and outs of London driving better than any cabby I knew, and was very kind to his horses.

Many an interesting talk we had had, for both of us had knocked about the world a great deal, and Jem enjoyed talking about "furrin parts." There were traces of far-off refinement and gentle up-bringing still clinging to him, traces that had earned for him his nickname.

To-day he was unusually taciturn until, as we turned into a quieter street, he suddenly said, "I had a fare yesterday morning, whom I drove from one place to another for two hours, and if I'd just turned and said four words to him it would have been worth more'n a thousand pounds to me!"

"What do you mean?" I asked in astonishment.

"I don't know why I seem to want to tell you, sir," he replied; "but my heart is full to-day, that's a fact, and you're a gentleman, and have always been friendly to me.

"I was born and brought up in a beautiful home. My parents were rich and aristocratic, and I had every advantage they could give me, or that money could buy. But at Oxford I got mixed up with bad company, gambling, and the turf, and from that it wasn't far to the money-lender's hands. I became desperately involved, and to get free I did something that would have brought me inside a prison. To escape that, I left my country and lived a wild, harum-scarum life at the ends of the earth. I knew that at home my mother would be breaking her heart about me and that my father's grey hairs would go down with sorrow to the grave. For years, in English and Colonial papers, there were advertisments begging me to come home, and saying that all was arranged and forgiven.

"At last I got so tired of my prodigal life, and had such a longing for the old country that I worked my passage back, and then, as I had always been fond of horses, I hadn't much trouble in getting a job as driver.

"I had let my beard grow, and hot suns and hard living, to say nothing of shame and sorrow, had altered me so much that nobody would have recognised me as the stripling that ran away. I changed my name, and talked as the other fellows talk to make the disguise sure. And all these twenty years nobody has known me, though I have known many. But that gentleman, who was my fare yesterday and sat by my side so long, was my twin brother.

"I knew him in a moment, and it made my hand shake on the reins more than once as he chatted to me. And if I had only said, 'How are you, Will?' it would have been all right there and then. But I never said a word!

"Yes, my mother's gone to rest years ago, but father is alive, and there's love and forgiveness, and a fortune waiting for me still, if only I'd go home; but I can't—my pride won't let me. I shall live and die a cabby, and nobody be any the wiser."

I pleaded with him to alter his decision, but I used my utmost eloquence in vain.

"No, sir, it's no use, I can't go back; my pride won't let me, and, besides, I'm too old to alter my way of life now. No, you must excuse me, I cannot give you the address. But this is the place you wanted; three and six, and thank you." And then, signalling to another fare, and touching his hat to me in true cabby fashion, he whipped up his horse and drove off.

I was summoned away from town soon afterwards, and never saw him again. But he kept to his stubborn and misguided resolve to live and die a cab-driver. A few more months of toiling in all weathers on the box, and then came pneumonia, and he, the heir to thousands, died in a workhouse hospital, unwept and unknown.

"Oh the pity of it!" men and women will say in reading his story. "The pity and the folly of allowing pride to come between him and all that love and life could give!" But the true pity is, not that one man should so perversely stand in his own light, but that Satan has so darkened the eyes of thousands.

For sin-worn, toiling souls, groping and struggling afar from God, there is love and forgiveness and rest to be had for the asking, and an inheritance compared with which the richest fortune on earth is but the bauble of an hour.

But pride, or that other stumbling-block so often used by the arch-enemy, "I'm too old to alter now," keeps them back from God.

And though Jesus, the great Saviour of mankind, comes near, yearning to make peace and reveal Himself in all his fulness of grace and power, they deliberately, and of set choice, turn away, locking heart and lips against Him, and "never say a word." May this true story show to some starving soul the folly of silence and rejection, and open the way back to Him and wealth, and all the fulness of blessing included in at-one-ness with God!

Welsh Notes.

ACCORDING to the statement of a prominent Nonconformist minister in North Wales, the Roman Catholics are continuing their efforts for the conversion, or rather, perversion of the people of Flintshire. Referring to the Asaph Valley, in particular, he speaks of Roman Catholicism as stretching forth its cords and enlarging its institutions. A large portion of the land and houses in the Valley is in their possession. In addition to their educational establishments there are Sisters of Mercy at work, endeavouring by every possible means to entice the children into Roman Catholic schools.

Increasing attention is being paid by Welsh Nonconformists to the spiritual needs of their countrymen who have emigrated to other countries. A few years ago the Welsh Calvinistic Methodists sent a deputation to make inquiries in South Africa as to the desirability of providing ministrations in the Cymric tongue for those who preferred it to the English language. The Colonial Missionary Society of the Congregationalists is keeping the same object in view, and has recently settled a minister in Newfoundland, who will be able to preach in their own tongue to the Carnarvonshire quarrymen who have emigrated to Ramdan Bay in that colony.

A movement is on foot to present Rev. W. Morris, F.R.G.S., of Treorky, Glamorganshire, with a substantial token of the appreciation of the services he has rendered as secretary of the Welsh Baptist Union for a period of twenty years. This year Mr. Morris fills the Presidential Chair of the Union.

In Wales, with its virile Protestantism and forceful Evangelicalism, there is not much scope or need for what may be termed irregular Christian work. Occasionally, however, instances are to be met with of work of this kind being signally successful. Such is the case with the mission carried on by Rev. Oscar Snelling in Swansea for a period of thirty years. Mr. Snelling preaches in the Albert Hall of that town every Sunday, and the evening congregation frequently numbers 1,500 people.

The difficulty which has arisen in Bangor, with regard to the adjustment of workhouse services so as to meet the wishes of both Anglicans and Nonconformists, has also made itself felt in Newport, Mon. There it has been solved by the appointment of three salaried chaplains — Anglican, Nonconformist, and Roman Catholic. This arrangement is also in force in at least one of the Welsh asylums, and is said to be completely satisfactory.

An Evangelists' Conference.—Many Gospel workers will recall the Evangelists' Conference held last autumn at the Y.M.C.A., Aldersgate Street, E.C., which proved to be an occasion of spiritual refreshment and stimulus. In compliance with a widely-expressed wish, arrangements have been made for another Conference, on similar lines, which will be held at the same place, on Monday next, September 17. The meetings will commence at 11, 3, and 7. A number of leading evangelists are expected to speak.

For Convalescent Soldiers.

A SOLDIERS' HOME has been opened at Brockhurst for the benefit of convalescent soldiers arriving from the seat of war.

Miss E. Sandeman, who has the oversight of the work, writes: "The South African convalescents are entrained—many hundreds at a time—from the arriving troopships to the forts. They are allowed out from four p.m. until rather late hours, but may not cross the harbour to Portsmouth. Public-houses line part of the thoroughfare which they have to traverse between the forts and Gosport. This road, including Gosport High Street, is about three miles long, and I had been advised that efforts should be made to keep the men nearer to the forts, and away from the temptations and the drink.

"A compact house, with small garden, stabling, &c., has been rented to be a resort, in a homely way, for these men. A horse and waggonette would be a great boon; the caretaker — a gunner from India and a devoted Christian—would drive the invalided men into the country. Gifts of fruit, books, &c., would be appreciated in proportion to the hardships through which the sufferers have passed. Tea is provided free of charge, but the wants of such a family recovering from enteric fever or wounds, are manifold; both moral and physical needs are great. My aim is to help the three devoted ladies who have been visitors at the forts for years, but whose Soldiers' Home at Gosport is somewhat out of the way for the present purpose. Ours is not intended as a soldiers' institute, but rather as a 'Home from home.' The rent of the house is but a little more than £30, including taxes. Funds will be needed for efficient working."

Miss Sandeman's address is Shaftesbury Villa, Brockhurst, near Portsmouth.

Convalescent Home for Railway Men.

ENCOURAGED by the success and blessing which have attended the Railway Mission Convalescent Home at St. Leonards on Sea, the committee of the Mission have established another Home at Southport, which will supply a need among railway men in the North of England.

The new Home, which occupies an excellent position in the centre of the promenade facing the sea, will accommodate thirty patients. The formal opening took place on Wednesday last week. The Mayor of Southport presided over a crowded gathering in the spacious sitting-room, and expressed hearty sympathy with the Home and its objects, commending it to the support of the people of Southport.

Mr. R. Nixon, general secretary of the Railway Mission, pointed out the great need for Convalescent Homes for railway men, of whom 3,000 are injured every year in the United Kingdom, in addition to a large number constantly on the sick list, owing to exposure while on duty by day and night in all kinds of weather.

Miss Dolby, hon. superintendent of the St. Leonard's Home, gave interesting results of the work there. Last year fifty-eight men professed to accept Christ as their Saviour during their stay at the Home.

Mr. S. G. Sheppard, treasurer of the Mission, appealed for contributions to the furnishing fund of the new Home, and also for annual subscriptions. A letter of admission for a patient is given for every guinea subscribed.

Canon Denton Thompson welcomed the Home to Southport, and said it would be a proof to all who saw it as they passed along the Promenade that the Spirit of Jesus is still living and caring for those that are sick. Rev. Dr. MacFarlane, late of New Guinea, and Mr. Edward Holden also took part in the meeting. Information concerning the Home will be given by the secretary, the Railway Mission, 1, Adam Street, Strand, London, W.C., or by the superintendent, 40, Promenade, Southport.

The Spiritual Assassins of King Humbert.

By Rev. Cav. ALEXANDER ROBERTSON, D.D., Venice.

THE shudder of horror that ran through all Italy at the dreadful crime committed against its beloved King at Monza has hardly had time to subside, when the whole country has been anew horrified and roused to righteous indignation by the gratuitous and insolent action of the Pope and the Vatican in the promulgation of

THE FOLLOWING SHAMEFUL STATEMENT:—

Not a few in Italy, and still more in other lands, having seen the ecclesiastical funeral honours offered to the memory of King Humbert, and a certain prayer offered for his soul, have complained against the chief ecclesiastical authority, as if it had receded from the most holy laws of the Church. It is necessary to explain that the chief ecclesiastical authority has tolerated the funeral ceremonies of the dead King, not only as a protest against an execrable crime committed against his person, but also, and much more, out of considerations personal to him, as latterly he gave not doubtful signs of religious sentiment, so far even as to desire, we may say, to reconcile himself with God by means of the Sacraments during this Holy Year; and we may presume that in the last moments of his life he may have implored the infinite mercy of God, and that if only he had had the opportunity, he would not have hesitated to reconcile himself with God.

One can hardly bear to write of the heartlessly insolent insinuation contained in the last clause of this nefarious document. "If he only had had the opportunity, he would not have hesitated to reconcile himself with God." That is to say, reconciliation with God can only be secured through the medium of the offices of the Papal Church, and that the good, the beneficent, the Christian King Humbert, not having that opportunity, died unreconciled. That is the claim of this Church, and that is its insinuation. Italians see that the claim is too monstrous, too blasphemous to be entertained by any honest thoughtful mind. It is a reflection on the character of Almighty God to think that He who loves us with an everlasting love, and sent his Son to die for us, would to Him, but through the portals of the most worldly, the most unscrupulous, the most mischievous institution that affects humanity.

Every day fresh proofs are coming to light of the good works of the late King Humbert—the outcome of his Christian faith.

Only to-day a letter appears in the Italian newspapers from Commendatore Cariolato, an old Garibaldian, and an intimate friend of the King, which tells us that during a long series of years he was employed by King Humbert for the distribution of his private charities, so that not only the public, but not infrequently even the recipients, might not know who their benefactor was. Part of this letter runs as follows:—

The acts of generosity of the King were innumerable, and his charities which are known are as nothing compared with those of which the public know nothing. He reserved 150,000 francs a month (£6,000), of which sum no trace was ever found in the accounts of the Minister of the Royal House. This large sum was all given away in secret benevolence, and especially to families who had consecrated their substance and lives for the creation of Italy. When the King gave me these moneys, he took no receipt, and used to say almost always these words, "Thus the curious will know nothing of that which I do."

As I said in The Christian of August 16, the Vatican, in its anti-monarchical and anti-national spirit and action, must take its share of responsibility, in common with the Anarchists and Socialists (too often its allies), for the assassination of King Humbert. But now, not content with the assassination of the body of this Christian, though excommunicated, King, it deliberately proceeds to attack his moral character and his soul. Our Saviour has said, "Fear not them which kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do, but fear rather Him who is able to cast both body and soul into hell-fire." The Pope professes to be such a one! Let us thank God that his power to hurt the body has been taken from him. He regrets it to-day, as his tirade against Protestantism in Rome, just issued, shows. And let us also thank God that millions in Christendom, and the vast majority of the inhabitants of Italy, now know that the soul's salvation is by no means dependent on the Pope's will and action, nor on the rites and sacraments of his church.

Looking Back.

"Look unto the rock whence ye were hewn, and to the hole of the pit whence ye were digged" (Isaiah li. 1).

THE temple of Solomon was built of hard limestone, hewn from the royal quarries at Jerusalem. Close by the Damascus Gate—as may be seen to this day—lies the entrance to the huge caverns whence were drawn the materials for the building said to have been one of the seven wonders of the world. But gloriously beautiful as that structure was, with pillars finished in lilywork, and stones cut and polished after the similitude of a palace, its pinnacle, tipped with gold, rising to a height so great, that persons looking down from it on the valley beneath became giddy with their elevation, it was yet always in sight "of the rock whence it had been hewn, and the pit whence it had been digged."

Nor were the Jews who had built that temple, and who pointed to it proudly as a measure of their greatness, allowed by their prophets to forget the lowliness of their origin, or the pitifulness of the condition from which they had been called. Abraham and Sarah had been nomads of the desert, idolaters in their worship like the heathen around them; and but for the grace of God they had never risen out of that obscurity and degradation, nor become the parents of the race, and founders of the religion of Israel. "Hearken to me, ye that follow after righteousness, ye that seek Jehovah; look unto the rock whence ye were hewn, and to the hole of the pit whence ye were digged."

But neither ought we, who have been called under the Gospel from darkness to light, to forget the condition in which Christ found us, and the

from which He has raised us. We were children of the first Adam, born in natural manhood, all of us "of the earth earthy." We had neither the inclination nor the power to keep the laws of the spiritual kingdom, or to serve God with acceptance. "The natural man perceiveth not the things of the Spirit of God," and "the carnal mind is enmity against Him." It is purely by the grace of God that we are what we are. Let us not forget the rock whence we were hewn.

But there is also to be remembered "the hole of the pit whence we were digged." We were deeply sunk in trespasses and sins. We were under the condemnation of Divine law, the curse of its infraction, wounded under the stings of an awakened conscience, and lying under sentence of death. From this "fearful pit" we were rescued through the redemption that is in Christ, in virtue of his atonement for sin, through faith in his righteousness. More than this, He has given us life, the new life of the regenerated, the "eternal life" of the Gospel. He has called us into his Church and service, made us living stones in his temple, a habitation of God through the Spirit.

It is from this height we are called upon to look back, in gratitude and humility, to the hole of the pit whence we have been digged. It was for this that the sacrament of the Holy Supper was instituted. It was for this that the Gospel to the perishing has been entrusted to the rescued. And it is for this the song of the redeemed of all nations is sung through all ages in heaven: "Unto Him who loved us, and washed from our sins in his own blood, and made us kings and priests unto God and his Father, be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen."

The Y.M.C.A.

CARRICKFERGUS Y.M.C.A. has just opened the new building, the gift of an old friend of the Society, Colonel Craig. Many years ago, when Colonel Craig was stationed in Carrickfergus, he took a warm interest in the work of the Association, and as a token of goodwill to the town of his birth, bought a house in the Main Street, and handed the title deeds over to the Y.M.C.A.

Mr. Ernest Carus-Wilson, late of Ceylon, and a well-known worker in connection with the C.M.S., has been appointed a deputation secretary of the National Council. Mr. Carus-Wilson possesses in a marked degree the ability to present Scriptural truth to audiences of young men. His sphere will be chiefly in the southern and eastern counties.

The pressing need for work among native students in Bombay, and for the proposed new building to accommodate it, is shown by the fruitfulness of the efforts of Mr. Frank Anderson, M.A., in temporary premises which he has secured, pending the acquisition of land in a suitable situation, and the completion of the larger scheme. Negotiations for a site are being actively pursued. Meanwhile, of the total sum of £8,000 required, £5,889 has been given or promised. Over 100 students daily are already attending the rooms, and unlimited opportunity is presented for personal work among young men.

The missionary tour of Mr. W. M. Oatts on behalf of the English National Council in the various Australian Colonies continues to be followed by gratifying results. In many centres the clergy and ministers of all denominations have been encouraged to meet, united missions have been held, and the work of the Y.M.C.A. has been either started or strengthened if already in existence. Effort is now being concentrated upon the appointment, by the Australian Inter-Colonial Council, of a first-class travelling secretary, who shall develop the work throughout the whole of Australasia. An officer, admirably qualified, is already in view, and it is earnestly desired, with the co-operation of British friends, to extend to him a definite call.

The monthly meetings of the National Council on September 7 were of particular interest. In the morning there was a conference of the secretaries of the various district unions to deal with questions relating to the commencement of the work of the autumn session. In the afternoon, in the name of the Council and in behalf of Association friends and workers all over the country, Mr. M. H. Hodder unveiled a portrait of Sir George Williams. The picture, which has been painted by Mr. H. S. Tuke, A.R.A., is a striking likeness of Sir George, and will be held in trust by the Council as a national memorial of the president's life-long and devoted work.

Mr. Robert McCann, who for many years has been secretary of the Irish Executive, and travelling secretary for Ireland, has accepted an invitation to become travelling officer for the East and West Ridings of Yorkshire, and the counties of Derby, Nottingham, and Lincoln.

The handsome new Institute, which is to be the home of the Motherwell Y.M.C.A., was opened on August 31, when a large and representative gathering took place. The Chairman (Mr. John Colville, M.P.) said the Institute had been erected to counteract the temptations which young men have to encounter, and to provide opportunity for the improvement of their minds and bodies. The hope of the promoters was that it would form a very real and direct means of stemming the prevailing tide of intemperance and indifference.

As honorary president of the Scottish Council, Lord Kinnaird formally opened the rooms, declaring his conviction that there never had been a time when the conscience of the nation was so fully alive to Christian duty as during the past few months. He looked forward to many a man coming and taking his part in Christian work in a way that had not been done before, now that it is realized how far the Church is behind the world in self-sacrifice and patriotism.

In the course of an interesting and practical address, Lord Overtoun said the institution was not intended for the purpose of coddling the young fellows of the town. "The more you do for some people, the less they would do for themselves; whereas it is the duty of every Christian to live not for himself but for others. Idleness, indifference, and gambling are the evils that to-day are facing young men all round."

Ex-Bailie Findlay presented Lord Kinnaird with a gold key as a souvenir of the occasion; and, later in the proceedings, stated that there was a debt remaining on the buildings of £1,800, an appeal which he made being liberally responded to. Other speakers were ex-Provost Russell (who had laid the memorial stone of the building), Mr. James Sinclair (chairman of the Scottish National Council), and Rev. John McNeill.

At one of our meetings in California, Mr. Elkanah Beard, who was many years a missionary in India, told the following story about a child in the city of Benares. He knew the child's father and mother, and believed God answered her prayer.

In that city lay a mother, sick. For months she had not left her bed, and all that she looked forward to was a slow death. Her daughter, eight years old, loved her mother, and was almost broken-hearted. She took the New Testament and read the promises of answer to prayer, and said, "Mother, can Jesus make you well?"—"Yes, my child, but it is not his will."

"Mother, why not? Have you asked Him to heal you?"—"Oh no, my child."

"But, mother, you pray to God, I know."—"Yes, darling."

"What kind of prayers, mamma?"—"Oh, my child, I'm in such agony I cannot talk to you, go and play." She dropped her head sadly, and went under a tree, where she sat and thought and prayed. Suddenly she returned to the bedside of her mother, and kneeling said, "Mamma, I am going to try Jesus once more. He says, 'Ask,' and I am going to ask Him. Now, mamma, pray with me.

"Oh, Jesus, dear good Jesus, I've no happy days since my mamma is sick these three months. She is so sick she cannot talk to her little girl. Make my mamma well. She loves you, and her little girl loves you." Suddenly she sprang to her feet, and clapping her hands cried, "He will, mamma, He will." At that very time the lady arose from her bed. She had not moved her limbs for months; but now she was able to go about and attend to her household duties healed and praising God. Her husband met her at the door that day and prayed God to make him worthy of the blessing that had come to his house. The little girl stood by him, exclaiming "Oh, papa, Jesus did it; Jesus did it."

There are sin-sick souls all around us in danger of the second death unless they come to Jesus. Are you praying for them? Are you trying to get them to come to Him? God will answer prayer.

A little girl went to a neighbouring town where special services were being held; she attended some of the meetings, and heard the story of the Cross, and gave her heart to Jesus. When she returned home she went to an aged man who was a Christian, and said to him, "Can't we have a prayer meeting?" "We?" said he. "I don't know another Christian in this district." "Well," said she, "you are a Christian and I am a Christian, can't we have a prayer meeting?" "Well," said the man, "I suppose we can." They did have a prayer meeting. The next day one or two more came. God answered their prayers and soon between twenty and thirty found the Saviour.

Scripture Texts on the Sands.

During recent meetings at Broadstairs, the practice of displaying Scripture texts on (or in) the sands, has been largely followed, and attended by much interest. Mr. Josiah Spiers, the well-known children's evangelist, writes to us:—

"Most of your readers will know that the Sand Services held in some fifty seaside resorts, all sprang out of the text, 'God is love,' which I wrote thirty-three years ago at Llandudno.

"At Broadstairs we have usually spent two or three afternoons a week making the texts, and the following nine were written, or rather printed in clear, bold block letters. 'What think ye of Christ?' (103ft. long); 'I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God,' (150ft.); 'Christ died for us' (65ft.); 'Lord, save me' (50ft.); 'I will love Thee, O Lord' (101ft.); 'In Thee, O Lord, do I put my trust' (145ft.); 'God is love' (55ft.); 'What shall I do then with Jesus' (165ft.); 'It is finished' (75ft.). This last was written on the farewell day, in extra large letters, measuring nearly 6ft. each; in the other texts the letters were 4ft. 5in. in size. They were all done so as to be read from the promenade at the top of the cliffs.

"The children, parents, and friends had to work hard in fetching large white stones to place in the outlined letters I had formed with an iron spade, and round the first three we put a narrow border of seaweed. The last six verses were entirely filled in with seaweed, which gave them the appearance, from top of the cliffs, of being written on a long strip of green carpet unrolled on the yellow sand.

"Many hundreds of people read these texts, which, in some cases afforded a valuable opportunity of telling out the Gospel message, notably so in connection with the question, 'What shall I do then with Jesus?' One lady on the promenade, asking what it meant, suggested that the question should have read, 'do for Jesus.' 'No,' I replied, 'it is quite right as it stands; everyone has to do something with Jesus, before they can do anything for Jesus.'

"Sometimes, when dark, the texts were illuminated with Chinese lanterns, while a 'Nicodemus meeting' was held, a very pretty effect being produced. Will all who read this pray that much fruit may be gathered from this text-writing, and that many others may go and do likewise?"

A Song in a Street Car.

"Jesus loves me, this I know."

Sweet and clear rang out the childish treble. It was on a horse car. A little girl, between three and four years old, had been out visiting with her mother, and being shy among strangers, had kept quiet till her little prattling tongue could stand it no longer. So as soon as the horses began to trot, and the bells to jingle, she began:

Jesus loves me, this I know,
For the Bible tells me so;
Little ones to Him belong,
They are weak, but——

The car stopped, so did the singer. Two or three passengers got in. Ding! ding! went the bell. Away went the car. Away went the singer:

They are weak, but He is strong.

A smile went round the car, but the little one, kneeling on the seat and looking out of the window, and therefore quite unconscious of it all, sang on:

Yes, Jesus loves me! Yes, Jesus loves me!
Yes, Jesus loves me! The Bible tells me so.

I do not know how many hearts were touched during that ride, which was quite a long one, and many passengers came and went. I do not know how many burdens were lifted; but I know that while the song lasted everyone on the car heard the Gospel message. Everybody listened; everybody smiled; there was not a frown, there was not a troubled look on any face. The simple story of Jesus and his love had driven them all away. At length the song ceased, the mother turned, the little head was resting against the window. The baby was fast asleep. She had "done what she could." Selected.

Christian Endeavour Topic.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 16.

THE BROAD WAY AND THE NARROW WAY (Matt. vii. 13, 14).

AT the beginning of life each soul stands before these two doorways, and at the opening of these two paths. In each of us the love of life is strong, and in each is the desire to get as much as possible out of the years which may be given. Amiel expresses this strong passion for life when he says, "A passionate wish to live, to feel, to express, stirred the depths of my heart. I was overpowered by a host of aspirations. In such a mood one would fain devour the whole world, experience everything, see everything, learn everything, tame and conquer everything."

In our early years each of us wakes up to the throb and pulse of strong natural impulses, and we are tempted to argue, "If God has given these strong desires, why should they not be gratified? Why should I not throw the reins on the necks of these fiery steeds, and let them bear me whither they may?" To do this is to go through the wide gate, and to take the broad way. The "many" go in there. It is the way of fashion, of society, of the majority. It is pre-eminently the way of the world. No one who goes in by these portals, and allows his course to be dictated by his strong, natural impulses, need fear that he will be counted eccentric or strange!

And it must be admitted that, in its first stages, such courses are eminently easy and, perhaps, rather delightful. The first steps in sinful self-indulgence are pleasant. The boat launched on the flowing stream is swept merrily and pleasantly along. The gradient of the road slopes so as to make the walking easy. The sun shines, the air is filled with odour, the sward is soft and bedecked with flowers. But after a while the sky becomes overcast, the rocks protrude through the grass, the wind rises to a storm, the stream is too rapid to allow of resistance, the declivity is too steep to permit of return—and at the foot of the dark beetling cliffs the corpse of the careless, thoughtless traveller lies torn and mangled. Of the life of self-indulgence, there is only one end—destruction.

There is a more excellent way. God has placed in our natures higher faculties by which to guide, restrain, and purify these strong impulses. They are known as reason, conscience, faith, and they are intended to rein in those fiery horses, and make them bear us steadily along the way of a clean and honourable career. "We have forces of restraint, as well as forces of energy; and it is only when our higher powers control and save these vital forces of impulse and desire, that we can really drain the most and best out of the cup of life."

It is a blessed thing when a young soul goes in at the narrow gate, and along the straitened way. It is too narrow to admit the trailing garments of passionate desire, too narrow for pride, and self-indulgence, and inflated self-esteem, too narrow for greed, and avarice, and the accumulation of the wealth for the sake of ostentation and display. And the path is not all easy. It is the way of the Cross. It does not only mean going without pleasant things, but involves the saying "No" to self, in all forms of flattery and vain glory. It implies that we shall say to ourselves perpetually, What would Jesus have done? What would He wish me to do? What is my duty? What is right? What is likely to help others most?

Whereas the other path gets always darker and harder, this gets easier, leads up to fairer views and purer air, till it breaks out finally on those uplands, where God Himself is sun. It leads to life—to ever-increasing, ever-abounding life. We all want to see life—and the remarkable thing is that those who expect to get most out of it by self-indulgence miss everything, whilst those who seem to curtail their lives win everything. Few find and enter it, is the lament of our Lord. Oh, let us put our hand in his, that He may lead us into it, so that we may be among those who ask life of God, and to whom He gives it, "even length of days for ever and ever." F.B.M.

C.E. NOTES.

Christian Endeavourers are not idle! The following notices appear side by side in a recent number of the official organ of the movement:—"Falkirk Parish Church juniors held a 'Jam Service.' The jam was forwarded to the East Park Home for Infirm Children, Glasgow."

The Belfast Evening Telegraph contained the following reference to the death of an Irish Endeavourer, who was killed in action at Lindley, whilst serving with the Belfast Yeomanry:—"Four troopers were wounded, and a young chap called McClure was killed. He worked in a shop in Royal Avenue. I think he was one of the few in the whole 500 who was prepared to die, and I can safely say he has led an upright life."

International S.S. Lesson.

September 23, 1900.

THE DUTY OF WATCHFULNESS (Luke xii. 35-46).

GOLDEN TEXT.—"Watch and pray that ye enter not into temptation (Matt. xxvi. 41).

INTRODUCTION.

OUR lesson and Golden Text give two views of watching. One is to watch for the coming of the Son of Man, the other is to watch against temptation; both are needed in Christian life

Key to Blackboard Plan.—The three sentences which begin with "L," taken together, mean "to be ready." The lamp alight and steadily burning is the Christian ready and waiting and watching. The word "blessed," which occurs three times in the lesson, is for those who watch.

READY.

To be ready for the coming of the Lord is to be living out verses 35 and 36.

"Loins girded." The picture is of the loose flowing robes caught in and tucked up to allow of no hinderance, the girdle round the waist to keep the long garment in its place. In Eph. vi. 14 we find there must be no laziness, no indolence, but, all alert, "stand," ready.

"Lights burning." This can be well illustrated from Matt. xxv. 1-13; plenty of oil (4) is wanted, and the lamps must not be allowed to burn low or get dim.

"Like men waiting" (see 1 Cor. i. 7), who are on the watch now for the second coming of the Christ, study 1 Thess. for more references on this subject and "be ye ready," be on the lookout (36), "open immediately;" no waiting to get girded, to light up, to say, "Who is it, I wonder?" but wide awake, and not half asleep.

HE IS COMING.

(38) The times of the different watches was as follows:—

First watch,	6 to	9 o'clock	(evening).
Second ,,	9 to	12 ,,	(midnight).
Third ,,	12 to	3 ,,	(night).
Fourth ,,	3 to	6 ,,	(early morn).

They are all four given in Mark xiii. 35. We do not know when He will come (Mark xiii. 32, 33), but we must learn the lesson that it may be any time, and prepare ourselves at once before it be too late. Matt. xxiv. 33—"It is near." "He is near" (marg.).

Find up the following verses, which teach us this great fact: 2 Tim. iv. 8; 1 John iii. 2, 3; Titus ii. 13; 1 Cor. xi. 26; Acts i. 11; 2 Thess. ii. 1, 2, 8; and 1 Thess. (whole epistle).

BLESSED THE WATCHERS.

There are numberless "blesseds" in the Bible, but this is one of the most beautiful: to be watching for Jesus will help to keep the whole life right.

(37) Blessed, for He will serve them, wonderful service.

(38) Blessed, to be ready at any time.

(48) Blessed for faithful service rendered for his sake.

Look at the sad opposite, to those who do not watch (45, 46, 47).

Are you ready? Are you watching? Do you long to see Him? Let your lamp be burning. Light up if you have not done so; and watch your Words (Matt. xii. 36 and 37),

Actions (2 Cor. v. 10; 1 Cor. x. 31),
Thoughts (Prov. xxiii. 7; Matt. xv. 19),
Company (Amos. iii. 3; Prov. i. 10),
Heart (Prov. iv. 23; Prov. xxiii. 26).

Irish Notes.

A LARGE number of towns in the south of Ireland have just been visited by the open-air workers, and in one of these over 600 persons listened to the preaching of the Gospel. Evidence is constantly accumulating as to the deep interest which is being taken by many, who would not otherwise hear the truth proclaimed, in the addresses delivered by the missionaries in the open air.

Ireland is on the verge of great changes. Under the provisions of the Local Government Act education is made compulsory in many parts of the country, and agricultural and technical education are also about to be brought in. Moreover, the National School system, which has done much for the education of Ireland during the past fifty years, is about to be greatly altered so as to embrace hand and eye training in addition to ordinary literary instruction. All this will mean a great awakening of the mental faculties of the people, and a breaking away of many from the spiritual despotism in which they have been so long held.

The Irish Mission to the Jews, which is non-sectarian and purely evangelical in its aims and methods, is doing a good work among the 5,000 Jews in Ireland. The chief centres of the Mission are Dublin, Cork, Belfast, and Derry, but the missionary also visits Armagh, Limerick, Waterford, and other centres. Over 3,000 New Testaments in Hebrew and Yiddish, and large numbers of specially prepared tracts, have been distributed among the Irish Jews, and with encouraging results. In Derry the Jews are most accessible and are beginning to take a deep interest in the subject of Christianity. The poverty of many of the Jews who have recently taken up their abode in Belfast is said to be appalling. It is also worthy of notice that the Jews are rapidly increasing in Ireland. In Cork alone, where only a short time since there were no Jews, there are now upwards of 500, and in nearly all the other towns and cities of this country, where formerly Jews were never to be seen, in these now Jews are living in considerable numbers.

The Blood of Sprinkling (Heb. xii. 24, 25).—The atonement of Jesus is the concentration of the divine glory; all other revelations of God are completed and intensified here. You have not come to the central sun of the great spiritual system of grace till you have come to the blood of sprinkling—to those sufferings of Messiah which are not for himself, but are intended to bear upon others, even as drops when they are sprinkled exert their influence where they fall. Unless you have learned to rejoice in that blood which taketh away sin, you have not yet caught the keynote of the Gospel dispensation. The blood of Christ is the life of the Gospel. Apart from atonement you may know the skin, the rind, the husk of the Gospel; but its inner kernel you have not discovered.—C. H. Spurgeon.

Hyde Park Services.

FRUIT FROM THE OPEN AIR.

WE are shortly closing our twenty-ninth year of the preaching of the Gospel in Hyde Park, and we desire to render praise for another year's labours amongst the masses of the people who congregate there.

The one great feature of these meetings on Sunday evenings is the vast preponderance of unconverted people; the godly, the thoughtful, and the converted people are in their respective places of worship, and the careless, thoughtless masses—in their tens of thousands—flock to this park of the West End to enjoy the fresh air, to listen to one of the celebrated Guards bands, or hire a boat on the Serpentine.

Possibly our choir, workers, and helpers, with the congregation of Hyde Park Hall, number something under 500; the greater proportion of the open-air congregation are the raw material (who never attend the means of grace), out of which God hath fashioned many a "vessel of mercy" to convey the "Water of Life" to thirsty souls both at home and abroad.

The crowd which has been gathered here for so many years are altogether ignorant of the simple Gospel, or of their own need and danger; but they are among the best hearers in the world. "The Old, Old Story" is to them both new and news; and the singing of a converted godly band has attracted thousands of such, and surprised some hundreds of them into the Gospel. The remarkable feature of the week-night meetings is that the congregations are made up mostly of men. Here comes the artisan for a walk after the labours of the day; with pipe in mouth and hands in pocket, he listens for all he's worth. Beside him is the young fellow from one of the large drapery stores near by; and at the close of a solemn address, and in the full blaze of an electric arc light they, with well nigh a thousand other men, will doff their hats and sing the Doxology.

But these open-air meetings are only a means to an end, and at the close of every one, an invite is given to Hyde Park Hall, and invariably we see souls converted to God. It has been my joy to write considerably more than 10,000 letters to anxious souls since our first meeting in Hyde Park in 1872. Said a gentleman to me on a recent Sunday evening: "I went home utterly unable to pray 'Our Father which art in heaven,' for you had shown me, by the Word of God, that I was no child of his, but a poor, wretched sinner." Another said: "I live quite the other side of London, but feel compelled to come to Hyde Park; the singing attracted me, the Gospel suited me, and the Lord has converted me."

The same evening two young girls were dealt with, and over the Word of God they mingled their tears of joy, for the Spirit had revealed Christ to them as the Bearer of their sins. Never a week passes but we are saddened, yet gladdened, by meeting with backsliders, and are thankful that they return to the "Shepherd and Bishop" of their souls.

I should long ago have given up this arduous work, but for the great encouragement I am continually receiving. Apart from the fact that for a quarter of a century we have gathered a congregation of between 2,000 and 3,000 in the Metropolitan Theatre—and maintained the meetings at Hyde Park Hall for a longer period than that, personally I have to thank God that my three daughters and my son, who are all working with me, were converted in the work, whilst my son-in-law was brought to Christ at one of the week-night meetings, and my daughter-in-law also is a child of the work.

Oh that all the Lord's servants who are fitted for it would become open-air preachers! There's no field like it, and from it shall be gathered many a shock of wheat for our Lord's granary. Will the readers of THE CHRISTIAN remember this work and myself in prayer? The Park meetings must soon close, and the question is, "Am I to take our large theatre again?" Some who have helped us are through losses, unable to do so this year, and I have hesitated to incur responsibility under the circumstances; yet am I thinking, "What will the people do who usually fill the theatre if it is not opened?" I have hitherto done the principal part of the preaching myself, but now find my strength will not permit me, and so I hope to get help if I again secure the building. I fear if I do not take it, one of the secular societies may do so. Some £200 is needed for the rent of the theatre.

Perhaps those to whom my name and work are known may help, and thus encourage one whose life has been spent in the aggressive work of soul-winning. CHAS. COOK.

The Metropolitan Tabernacle.

THE arrangements for holding the re-opening services of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, Newington Butts, are briefly as follows:—

Mr. Joseph will retur when the means are provided, but is anxious to ha opportunities of addressing public or drawing-roo meetings in the interests of the Haifa Mission. H may be addressed: 138, Clifden Road, Clapton, N.E.

Dangers of Paris.

IN a recent letter, Mrs. Ada M. Lewis writes:— "We are pained and troubled at the sad fate a young American girl of twenty-one—not t only one, within a very short space, of a lik nature. She was recently in one of our Homes, fro which she obtained a good situation through our Fre Registry, and upon one of our lady workers visitin her, said she was happy.

"But she had crossed the Atlantic to acquire Frenc in Paris—an acquirement which is probabl responsible for more lost souls than any othe in these modern days—so she decided to leave, an sought an engagement in a French family through a agent. One offered, but with a written agreemen binding for two years, which the girl was induced t sign. She showed it, however, to her mistress, an on being told that it was one of bondage, she des troyed it.

"The girl received a second agreement in Frenc with an English translation, signed by the 'gentl man' into whose family she was to be bound for tw years. She appears to have had some intervie declining to accept the place on the terms, an called at the Home asking for re-admission, which wa promised, the lady in charge advising her to remain i her situation.

"As she never returned, the thought that she ha remained was natural, as she had no luggage when sh called. A few days later, a body was floating on th Seine, the face and head terribly swollen. The hai had disappeared, and, but for her clothing and a receip in her pocket from the Home, showing that she ha defrayed her little debt, recognition would have bee impossible.

"Would to God that this sadly dark ending of young life might touch the hearts of wealthy wom whose life has never presented such harsh problem and who have yet to realize how great a debt they ow to the security of their surroundings of love and hom in contrast to their lonely sister, seeking her way wit weary feet through the pollutions of a crowded city."

Mrs. Lewis may be addressed, 77, Avenue d Wagram, Paris.

Evangelistic.

London Tent Campaign.

At the Tottenham Tent, opened on Sunday last on the site occupied two years since by the old American Tent, a large and attentive congregation assembled. In the evening the people attended in such numbers that the gates had to be closed and many hundreds turned away. Mr. G. R. Cairns spoke with power, and a large number of people stayed to the after meeting. One very touching incident occurred: A lady dressed in black rose and said, "I do trust Jesus, 'A little child shall lead them;'" and then she said, "The death of my little girl has led me to the Lord Jesus Christ." It brought the tears into the eyes of many. This meeting will long live in the minds of those who were present.

Mr. Klein's visit to the Notting Hill Tent has been the means of much blessing to the neighbourhood. Every night there were numbers dealt with in the tent with good results. Towards the close of the service, practically the whole space was turned into an inquiry room. On Saturday night the local workers had a prayer, praise and testimony meeting. After a number of bright testimonies, the secretary drew in the net, and some seven expressed their desire to follow Christ. Rev. J. T. Vine commenced a week's work here on Sunday last. He spoke on "The Great White Throne," and thirty or more who had entered the tent unconverted confessed that they had found peace with God through the Lord Jesus Christ.

The positions of the tents are as follows:—Lavender Hill (close to Clapham Junction, closes September 24); Notting Hill (St. Helen's Gardens, closes September 26); Tottenham (Bruce Grove); Hammersmith (Fulham Palace Road, closes September 30); Deptford (end of High Street, corner of Evelyn Street); Lewisham (Wearside Road); Kilburn (Willesden Lane); Leyton (near Town Hall).

On Blackpool Sands.

Rev. Charles Garnett writes:—"A series of evangelistic meetings, extending over several weeks, has been held on the sands at Blackpool, under the auspices of the Church worshipping at Her Majesty's Opera House, and of the Manchester Baptist College, the former being represented by its pastor, Rev. H. C. Wagnell, and the latter by Rev. A. E. Dearden. Services have been held twice daily, and large crowds have listened to the missioners' addresses. The results have been most encouraging."

Mr. Tennyson Smith at Brynmawr.

A ten days' Gospel Temperance Campaign was commenced at Brynmawr on Saturday last by Mr. Tennyson Smith. The missioner was welcomed at the railway station by a deputation of temperance workers, and a procession being formed, headed by a brass band, the town was paraded. Subsequently a meeting of an enthusiastic character was held in the Market Hall. After an introductory address from Mr. Richard Cory, Mr. Tennyson Smith made an earnest appeal in the interests of the temperance cause. On Sunday the large hall was crowded, and a deep impression was made, many pledges being taken at the close of each gathering.

Children's Seaside Services.

The question was lately asked in the columns of a daily paper, "Why not abolish these services? The children do not want them, and it is a hardship for them to attend them." I found the character of the services at Lowestoft (doubtless a sample of such services) a sufficient answer, however, to the criticism referred to. Meetings were held at 11 o'clock on the sands every fine morning (including Sundays), and if wet in a hall close by. The attendance averaged, I should say, between 150 and 200 each day. The bright and intelligent faces of the children, aglow with attention to the words of the speakers, made one marvel where the "hardship" came in. They had voluntarily quitted the delights of spade, pail, and sand-pit for a brief hour. Their knowledge of the Bible, and the alacrity with which passages of Scripture were found, did them credit. A large number had their own Bibles or Testaments. The two competent speakers (of the Children's Special Service Mission) engaged their attention in a happy way, and never ceased to interest them. The singing of Gospel invitations from hymn-sheets provided by the Mission was a prominent feature of each meeting, and on parting each child received a tract or leaflet of a suitable character. Prizes of illuminated texts were competed for, for finding Scripture passages on selected subjects. A large number of adults watched the happy scene with evident interest.

Ægean Sea.

The mission at Bath, just concluded by Mr. Gipsy Smith, was of a fruitful character. The meetings were powerful, and the building proved too small to accommodate the crowds that sought admission.

Under the auspices of the Friends' Home Mission, Mr. M. Baker (of Folkestone) has conducted a tent mission in the Fair Field, Kingston-on-Thames. It proved a refreshing season. Afternoon Bible readings have been held with profit, as also have children's services. Anxious souls have been dealt with, and, we believe, have accepted Christ. R. H. S.

In connection with tent services in Dublin many have been brought to think of eternal verities, and also to learn the preciousness of the Blood that cleanseth from all sin. Pastor McCracken, of London, has been much used of God, and Pastor Hugh D. Brown had the joy of addressing quite a number who professed conversion at these tent services. J. L. D.

Mr. Charles Barraclough has concluded a twelve-days' mission at the Seamen's Bethel, Old Gravel Lane, London Docks. There has been blessing among Christians, and also among the unsaved. At the temperance meeting pledges were taken, and at the children's services a "Blackboard and Chalk Talk" aroused deep attention. Prayer is asked for some who are under conviction.

The North Wales tent work has been much owned and blessed of God this season. The tent is now at Coedpoeth, a popular centre near Wrexham. The whole place has been moved, nightly the tent has been filled, and on Sundays crowded out. A number have professed conversion, the Christians quickened and encouraged. Mr. Bollard, who is working the tent, has been helped by friends from Liverpool, Birkenhead, and South Wales.

Rev. E. Payson Hammond has been conducting a series of united services at Lowell, Mass. He was much encouraged to find that many of the workers dated their conversion to his visit fifteen years ago. The previous week Mr. Hammond and Mr. Stanes, of India, held children's meetings at the Northfield Conference. Quite a number professed conversion. Mr. Hammond's book "The Conversion of Children," has been translated into the Tamil language, and has proved an incalculable benefit to workers in that country.

A mission to young people has been conducted at St. Andrew's Street Baptist Church, Cambridge, by the pastor (Rev. C. Joseph). In spite of various attractions in the town the meetings were well attended. Gospel hymns, duets, and quartettes were rendered by a number of Christian Endeavourers. On Friday last the missioner gave an earnest address on the texts which he had used on the five previous nights. The mission concluded on Sunday last, large congregations assembled, and Mr. Joseph spoke from Acts x. 21-24. Much good was accomplished through the mission. Truly the Lord was with us. A. E. S.

About Books.

W. Thomson Crabbe, F.R.C.S.E., Medical Missionary. We welcome this deeply interesting biography, written by Annie R. Butler. (9d. Partridge.) The life and labours of the lamented subject will long be remembered in Birmingham.

William J. Forster has given us quite a number of good books for the young. One of the best is New Fables, which has just appeared in a new edition. Suitably illustrated, this book will be welcome in the nursery, and useful in the hands of those who undertake the instruction of the young. (1s. C. H. Kelly.)

To Frances S. Hallowes we are indebted for a pathetic story of the siege of Ladysmith, under the title of The Wedge of War. The author does not attempt to justify or condemn the policy of either Government, but describes the harrowing results of the conflict upon domestic circles and the home life at the Cape of both Britishers and Boers. (3s. 6d. Elliot Stock.)

The Missionary Mail, to Faithful Friends and Candid Critics, by Moir B. Duncan, M.A., gives a very readable account of all-round Gospel work in Shen-hsi, China. (9d. Elliot Stock.) Though written before the recent outbreak of anti-foreign feeling, the pages take account of the well-known self-complacent conservatism of the Chinese, and will prove specially instructive to such as are unfamiliar with the ever-interesting story of the Celestial Empire.

All who are interested in the religious instruction of children will welcome Mr. Van de Venter's volume of illustrated Chalk Talks. The author has drawn from the treasury of the New Testament Scripture familiar subjects of parabolic teaching; and their presentation in diagram form invests them with new light and force. The reproduction of these diagrams cannot but prove a powerful means of using the eye as a gateway of knowledge, and cultivating a deep and abiding interest in Divine things among young people. (2s. 6d. Holness.)

An important contribution to the literature of the Evangelical Revival of the Eighteenth Century may be expected shortly from the pen of Rev. J. P. Gledstone—George Whitefield, M.A., Field Preacher. (Hodder & Stoughton.) The subject is of absorbing interest, and the author's exhaustive knowledge of the times of the great evangelist was fully demonstrated by his "Life and Travels of George Whitefield," published over thirty years ago, and long out of print. The new book is promised for the autumn.

The "Story of the Nations" series has already given to our language many volumes of great value. We welcome as an addition to the series A History of Norway, from the Earliest Times. By Hjalmar H. Boyesen. Ever since its original publication, this book has been much esteemed as filling a place too long vacant in English literature. It will doubtless enjoy an enlarged usefulness in its present form. A weird interest attaches to many of the earlier chapters. The concluding pages, giving an outline of the recent history of Norway, are by C. F. Keary, author of "The Vikings in Western Christendom." There are many illustrations, all of them valuable by way of illuminating the text. (5s. T. Fisher Unwin.)

All who read Mr. Robert Young's articles in The Mission World under the general title of "The Land of Fire" must have been impressed with the interest and force of the latest version of the pathetic story of the Fuegian and Patagonian Mission. It is a pleasure to welcome the articles amplified and cast into volume form, with the title, From Cape Horn to Panama: A Narrative of Missionary Enterprise among the neglected races of South America, by the South America Missionary Society. From the days of Captain Allen Gardiner down to the present time, the work of the S.A.M. Society is admirably outlined and described in this book, which is embellished with maps and many illustrations. (2s. 6d. Simpkin, Marshall & Co.)

A volume of timely importance is Liturgical Right and National Wrong: A Vindication of the Rights of the Church; and a Criticism of Wakeman's History and other books approved by Bishops and by the Fellows of the "Australian School of Theology." By Mervyn Archdall, M.A. Cantab., rector of St. Mary's, Balmain, Sydney, and president of the Protestant Church of England Union of New South Wales. (London: Church Association, 14, Buckingham Street, Strand.) As a repertory of facts and arguments on matters that are vigorously debated in regard to the ritual and doctrine of the Church of England, these pages are instructive and forcible. The book should prove of great service to those who would defend truth and justice in relation to the faith and practice of the Established Church.

Obituary.

REV. W. A. HOBBS.

A DEVOTED and zealous toiler at home and abroad has passed away, in the form of Rev. W. A. Hobbs. He entered upon his career in connection with the Baptist Missionary Society in 1859, and went out to India. The district of Jessore was the principal scene of his labours. He was a most efficient and successful itinerant preacher. After his return to this country he undertook the pastorate of the church at Minehead, Somerset, which he resigned in 1894 on account of failing health. He passed away at Burnham, where his son is minister, after a long and painful illness.

MRS. FEINSILBER.

Many are mourning the death of Mrs. Feinsilber, at Fünfkirchen, South Hungary, which took place on Wednesday of last week. Prior to her marriage, scarcely a year ago, she laboured in Hungary in connection with the Hebrew Christian Testimony to Israel. She resided for two years in the Mission House, Whitechapel, and was generally beloved and esteemed for her work's sake, her quiet, unobtrusive manner, and her zeal in the spiritual interests of the poor Jewish women. Since her marriage, last October, she has journeyed with her husband through Russia and Austria-Hungary. In April they settled in Fünfkirchen, and were looking forward to united service for Christ. But God willed otherwise. On August 14 a daughter was born, a few days later pyæmia set in, and after a brief illness our sister answered the call to rest. The cause of Jewish missions was ever dear to our sister's heart, and many will mourn her departure.

MISS HELEN BEYLAND, BOMBAY.

Many will hear with sorrow of the departure of Miss Helen Beyland, one of the party of three who sailed from England in October, 1896, to form the Missionary Settlement for University Women in Bombay. Supported by the Women's Colleges of Great Britain, to undertake educational and social mission work among the Parsi women in Bombay, the Settlement has engaged the earnest interest of Christian ladies in the United Kingdom. During the past four years many changes have come to the little band of Settlers. Three others have joined them, and one has been obliged to return home in bad health. Now one is removed by death.

Miss Beyland was from Ireland, and graduated at Alexandra College, Dublin. Her first work in Bombay was to take some of the elder pupils who came to the Settlement for English lessons and for Bible teaching; but latterly her special work was the care of the school for upper-class Parsi children, and into this she threw her whole energies. She taught brightly and vividly, and her pupils, young and old, always loved her and enjoyed learning from her.

A member of the Settlement writes: "We feel sure that the many prayers she offered on behalf of her pupils will be answered in God's good time, so that she may rejoice when, in the presence of God, she meets those to whom she was allowed first to bring the message of salvation. The loss of one from our band seems very grievous to us, and yet as we remind ourselves of our Lord's words about the grain of wheat, which, before yielding fruit, must fall into the ground and die."

The late Miss Catherine Hallam, of Godalming, whose departure we recorded last week, was, we learn, an unwearying worker for many years. A relative writes: "She began her Mothers' Meeting in 1867, two or three friends helping at the time. In 1876 Earl Cavan began evangelistic services, and in 1882 the Mission Hall was opened, being supplied weekly by preachers from the Evangelization Society. The Coffee Tavern was completed and opened in January, 1883. Miss Hallam gave active personal service until age and feeble health prevented, her last ministration, as her first, being to her 'dear mothers.'"

The Churches.

Church of England.

Rev. S. A. Selwyn, vicar of St. John, Boscombe, has accepted the vicarage of Holy Trinity, Hampstead.

Rev. Canon O'Connor, M.A., is to deliver the opening autumnal lecture of the Church Association on Monday evening, the 17th inst., under the presidency of Rev. Canon Woodward, D.D.

All Saints' Church, East Finchley, which has been a chapel-of-ease to Holy Trinity, East Finchley, has been made a separate parish, with Rev. A. W. Armitstead, curate of St. Wilfrid's, Kebworth, Leicester, as its first vicar.

On Sunday week the Bishop of Liverpool opened a new church hall at the Walton Workhouse, and conducted a service. The hall, which has seating accommodation for 550 persons, has been erected and furnished at a cost of £4,000.

At the conclusion of the Church Congress to be held at Newcastle-on-Tyne, it is proposed to hold a public meeting open to Churchmen and Nonconformists alike, with the object of promoting unity among the churches, similar to the meeting held two years ago at Bradford.

At the close of an open-air meeting recently held by the followers of Mr. Kensit, in West Hartlepool, the Vicar of West Hartlepool (Rev. W. F. Cosgrave) earnestly disclaimed all sympathy with the doctrines of Rome, but as a believer in the doctrines of Wycliffe, Luther, and Cranmer he objected to the speakers' arguments as conveying ideas contrary to the teachings of the Bible and of the Reformers.

In a letter to Mr. A. McLaren, hon. secretary of the Liverpool Fruiterers' and Fishmongers' Association, the Bishop of Liverpool says he is heart and soul with him in his effort to grapple with the growing evil of Sunday trading. "None, I am sure," the Bishop adds, "would welcome more heartily a scheme for universal Sunday closing than the majority of those who are now keeping their shops open for seven days in the week."

The Vicar of Okehampton (Rev. F. W. Saulez) lately announced that he was leaving, having accepted a living in Oxfordshire. A petition has been signed by 790 parishioners requesting him to reconsider his decision, and promising to help him with the stipend of a second curate. The vicar has intimated that he cannot alter his decision, and whilst expressing his appreciation of the kindness of the memorialists states that the responsibilities of the parish are becoming too heavy for him in his present state of health.

Congregational.

Rev. John James, by reason of continued ill-health, is relinquishing the pastorate of Crescent Church, Margate.

The new church which has been built at Seaforth, near Liverpool, at a cost, including furnishing, of £5,500, was opened yesterday week.

Sharpness Church (Rev. W. Bailey) has in hand £630 towards the new church, which is urgently needed, and which it is proposed to build next spring.

Rev. H. C. Newell, late of South Hackney Church, has accepted the pastorate of the Memorial Church at Port Elizabeth in succession to Rev. James Pritchard.

The new iron church, subscribed for as a memento of the 180th anniversary of Carr's Lane Chapel, Birmingham, has been ordered, and a site near the tram terminus at Sparkhill has been secured, on which it will be erected.

The scheme to erect a new church in the Four Lane Ends District, Blackburn, has taken definite shape. A plot of land has been secured at a cost of £318, and a sum of over £150 has been raised towards the cost of the building.

A communication has been sent to Rev. Charles Richardson, M.A., secretary of the Congregational Union of Scotland, by the chairman-elect (Dr. Parker) of the Congregational Union of England and Wales, proposing a united meeting of the two bodies in Manchester in October, 1901.

The Congregational Union Assembly in Jamaica has adopted a Twentieth Century scheme. The first object contemplated is to hold special missions in all the churches, with the view of raising the standard of spiritual life and service; the second a complete revision of the list of church members, and the printing in 1901 of a memorial volume; thirdly, a fund is to be raised.

Baptist.

Rev. J. Stephens, who had been in indifferent health since December last, has resumed his ministry at Highgate Road Chapel, after two months' absence.

Rev. John Bayliss, of Willesden, has accepted an invitation to the pastorate of Quainton Church, Bucks, and will commence his work there on October 7.

A new church and Sunday schools are to be built at the corner of Canterbury Road and High Street, Worthing (Rev. A. W. Leighton Barker). The first sod has been turned by the pastor. About £254 is in hand.

Rev. Archibald G. Brown has returned from his vacation, and resumed his ministry at Chatsworth Road Church, West Norwood. By the generosity of a family connected with the church, a handsome platform has been erected to replace the formerly existing pulpit.

The re-opening services at Walworth Road Chapel were held on Sunday week. Rev. W. J. Mills (minister) preached both morning and evening to crowded congregations. On Monday evening a prayer meeting was held in the chapel, at which Mr. Mills presided, and afterwards Rev. Dr. Pierson gave an address.

At Hornsey Road Church, London, N., a meeting was recently held in connection with the resignation of Pastor Edwin Smart. Several testified to blessing received during the closing ministry. Mr. Smart is succeeded at Hornsey Road by his son, Pastor Percy Smart, late of High Barnet. The prospects of this young church are very encouraging. The late pastor is open to supply vacant or other churches. His address is 92, Tollington Park, N.

Methodist.

Rev. F. W. Macdonald, ex-President of the Wesleyan Conference, preached for Dr. Kennedy in Callander Free Church on Sunday week.

The Mayor of West Bromwich preached in Cobden Street Primitive Methodist Chapel, Peterborough, on Thursday. There was a large congregation.

Professor J. G. Tasker, of Handsworth College, will deliver the next Fernley Lecture, taking as his subject "Spiritual Religion: The Outlook for the New Century."

The Allendale Primitive Methodist quarterly meeting has made arrangements for the holding of a Circuit Sunday-school Convention in October, to be conducted by Rev. Danzy Sheen, of Leeds.

Much improvement has been effected at Brunswick Wesleyan Chapel, Sheffield. The work, it is estimated, will cost from £1,250 to £1,500, and towards this amount the trustees have a considerable sum in hand. The re-opening services take place on Friday, September 14.

Blenheim Street Chapel, Newcastle-on-Tyne, is about to be closed as a Wesleyan place of worship, and the newly-acquired premises at Rye Hill will become the new centre of the Newcastle Mission. It is proposed to proceed at once with the Wallsend Chapel scheme, involving an outlay of £5,000.

Rev. Dr. Sims, of Melrose, Massachusetts, who has been occupying the pulpit of Paddington Chapel, London, during the holiday of the pastor, Rev. Ossian Davies, was formerly a Primitive Methodist. He was trained in the Old Theological Institute at Sunderland, and completed his course there twenty-nine years ago.

In connection with the reopening of Park Road Wesleyan Church, Newcastle, sermons were preached on Sunday week by Rev. Joseph Dawson. At the close of the evening service a resolution asking the licensing justices to refuse the applications that are being made for new licences in the neighbourhood was unanimously adopted.

New halls are being erected in Birmingham for Primitive Methodists, at a cost of not less than £6,000 or £7,000. The President has erected the Conference Hall, the Church of the Saviour has also been acquired, a new church has been erected at Sparkhill, and another is in course of erection in Birmingham First Station. New churches are also being built at Douglas, Sunderland, Sheffield, and other places.

It has been agreed to extend payments to the Century Fund of the Wesleyan Methodist Connexion to the end of 1901, and in this way it is hoped the 1,000,000 guineas will be secured. Up to the present 770,995 guineas have been promised, and the sum of £329,180 18s. 10d. has been actually received. A farther sum of 229,005 guineas is needed to complete, and this the district synods and circuits are likely to undertake.

Presbyterian.

A new church is being erected in Sunderland for the Millfield congregation. An anonymous donor has contributed £1,012 towards the cost.

A temporary iron church is being erected near the railway station at East Ham for the use of the working-class congregation which it is proposed to gather there. It is hoped that the building will be ready for occupation before the end of this month.

Rev. Robert Taylor, minister emeritus, of Upper Norwood, London, preached on Sunday week in Kirkurd Free Church, N.B., at both services. Mr. Taylor was ordained at Kirkurd in August, 1850, and the services were held on the jubilee of his ordination.

The hall in course of erection in South Croydon for the formation of a second congregation in that town is proceeding. It is not yet decided whether the new congregation will be worked in connection with Rev. A. N. Mackray's church, or whether a minister will be appointed.

The two Kensington congregations have been meeting together during the holidays. Throughout August the services were held in St. John's Church (Rev. C. Anderson Scott), and during the present month the united congregations assemble in South Kensington Church (Rev. Robert Milne).

Rev. J. B. Meharry's occupancy of the Woolahra pulpit, Sydney, having expired, Rev. W. M. Clow, of the Barclay Church, Edinburgh, has been appointed to succeed him. Mr. Meharry is expected to occupy his own pulpit at Crouch Hill on October 7, after his nine months' visit to Australia.

Fallen Asleep.

The death took place on August 21 of Rev. J. A. Chamberlain, at the age of eighty-seven. He entered the Congregational ministry in 1844. He retired in 1873, his last charge being at North Tawton.—Mr. William Henry Blow, one of the oldest Nonconformists in Lincoln, aged eighty.—The Congregational Church at Heywood mourns the death of Mr. John Crossley, aged seventy-one, who, up to recently, was a deacon, teacher, and member of the choir.—The Margate Baptist Church has lost one of its oldest members, and libera supporters, by the death, at the age of seventy-three years, of Mr. T. M. Ind, J.P.—Rev. Prebendary Henry Askwith, forty-eight, St. John's Vicarage, Upper Holloway.—At Eastbourne, Rev. Henry Hotham, in his eighty-sixth year.—Rev. G. W. Botham, at Anerley Rectory, aged fifty-eight.—Rev. Richard Cooper, seventy-one, for twenty-two years rector of Swayfield.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

☞ The Publishers request that all orders for THE CHRISTIAN by post, and remittances for same, be addressed to "THE CHRISTIAN" POSTAL DEPARTMENT, BOUVERIE HOUSE, SALISBURY SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

Cheques and Post Orders to be made payable to Messrs. John Haddon and Co. at that address. (For Subscription rates, see Page 1 of Cover.) Postcard or stamped envelope should be enclosed if receipt is desired.

Notes & Comments

THE appalling appeals which still come from India demonstrate the unrighteousness of our national abstention from larger relief to our famine-stricken dependency. Why should this enormous burden be thrown upon the missionaries and on those whom their pitiable stories move to co-operate with them? The whole nation, and especially the governing classes, profit by the possession of India, and the national funds should certainly be more liberally supplied to save these millions from famine, pestilence, and death. Nevertheless, Christians must not slacken their efforts in mitigating these dreadful sorrows.

Rev. Dennis Osborne has arrived in England again. He has but a short time to spend here. He is open to receive invitations to give information concerning the Indian famine, of which he has been an eye-witness, as well as one of the indefatigable helpers in distributing the foods which have been subscribed for by our readers.

In a recent note reference was made to the death-roll in South Africa, and, huge as that list is, it is to be feared that to its dread figures we must add those of a large proportion of the deaths due to the famine in India. For there can be but little, if any, doubt that, had it not been for the drain caused by the unhappy war, there would have been a national grant to India commensurate with our national wealth and the extent of her piteous needs. It is an unhappy point in the life of a State when its solemn duties come to be relegated to individuals or the public.

The terrible disaster caused by the recent hurricane in the Western States of America, involving the almost total ruin of two thriving young cities, and the loss of many thousands of lives, vividly illustrates the tremendous forces that sleep in the natural world, and brings home to us, in a way we in this country seldom realize, the wonderful balance in which they are held under ordinary conditions. When God, for inscrutable reasons, suffers these forces to run riot, as it were, for a time, we are made to feel how wise and tender is the guiding hand that holds them all in check during the times of their normal action. These occasions emphasize the truth that Nature is an "order" and not a chaos, and should quicken our sense of gratitude for those regular and even-flowing blessings that mark our daily life. At the same time, they are a vivid call to humility toward God, and to sympathy with those who suffer by these sudden calamities. "Lo, these are but the outskirts of his ways . . . and the thunder of his power who shall understand?"

Perhaps the most striking thing in the meeting of welcome to Mr. Sankey on Thursday last was the deep and heartfelt response of the congregation to the fervent prayer of Mr. Meyer, and to the expressed desire of Mr. Archibald Brown that a revival might soon come to "this perishing London." It was evident that this thought was uppermost in the minds of many of those present, and if that meeting may be taken as a gauge of the feeling which prevails in the best Christian circles we ought not to be far away from a new demonstration of Divine power. In 1875, as Mr. Brown remarked, referring to Messrs. Moody and Sankey's visit, "revival was in the air." And once more it seems to be "in the air." The great thing is now to seek to arouse lethargic Christians to a sense of what is needed at the present time. When the entire Church travails for souls, Zion will bring forth her children.

Our readers may like to know that some copies of the "Moody Memorial Numbers" of THE CHRISTIAN (price 4d.; post free 7d.) still remain. They contain a sketch of Mr. Moody's Life and Work; an account of his last days; Reports of the Memorial Services; Tributes and Reminiscences from eminent Christian ministers and workers; together with the Sacred Song, "Out of the Shadow-Land," specially composed by Mr. Ira D. Sankey, and sung by him at the New York Memorial Service. The numbers are embellished with portraits of Mr. Moody and Mr. Sankey, family groups, and views of Northfield, and are attractively bound in an illustrated cover.

Still further aggression is manifested by the National Sunday League in the way of its concerts on the Lord's Day. A "more varied" programme of music is contemplated for the winter season at the Alhambra (obviously in the non-sacred direction); and scenes from the Passion Play are also under discussion. It is evident that a firm hand is increasingly necessary to check the lengths to which this society will go, if permitted, in its progress to what even a society journal calls "the point of riskiness."

Lord Grey acquired the licence of a public-house at Broomhill, in which neighbourhood he is the principal landowner. Very shortly he found it was worth £10,000! Adopting the Gothenburg principle, he devotes the profits (less 10 per cent.) to schemes for the benefit of the inhabitants of the village; and has addressed the magistrates in various divisions of Northumberland urging them to give preference in the case of new licences to applicants who would adopt that principle. But there appear to us to be radical fallacies underlying such a proposal. What may succeed in a country village may be impracticable in a city. It is no use to benefit a community with one hand, if you demoralize it, from little children upwards, with the other. The scheme does not afford adequate safeguards against pushing the sale of drink as much as possible—which is one of the greatest attendant evils.

The Liverpool City Council is taking advantage of the powers already in its hands, and is borrowing a further sum of £200,000 for the purpose of purchasing and demolishing insanitary houses in certain streets of that city. The inhabitants have been protesting vigorously against the land so acquired being sold for purposes other than the provision of workmen's dwellings, and the consequent driving of artisans from the centre of the town. In any really satisfactory scheme, this latter point would not be overlooked; provision should be made for the erection of suitable houses in the locality in which the people had been dispersed. Liverpool, however, is setting a noble example in regard both to this matter and to that of the drink curse.

Piteous letters have been appearing in the Press as to the utter inadequacy of theatrical wages among the rank and file of the profession. "How can I live honestly?" asks a man; "How virtuously?" asks a woman. "Stage-struck" maidens and youths will do well to study the facts and figures set forth, which show that, robbed of its glamour, the life is but a sorry existence for the many. And Christians who attend the theatre may well ask themselves in all seriousness whether they are not obtaining their pleasure at a terrible cost, if it be provided at the expense of the honour and virtue of so many of its workers. The best defence that a theatrical company could adduce when a member of Parliament, a few years ago, overstated the case in the House of Commons was this—"fully a third of us keep straight!" What of the other two-thirds?

The presence of Dr. Pierson in London reminds us of his invaluable books. His appreciative and instructive "MEMOIR OF GEORGE MULLER" takes front rank in Christian Biography. We are glad to know that its circulation is large and continuous. Then come his excellent works on Foreign Missions: "THE CRISIS OF MISSIONS" (3s. 6d.), and "THE NEW ACTS OF THE APOSTLES" (6s. All of these issued by Nisbet & Co.). "IN CHRIST JESUS; or, The Sphere of the Believer's Life" (Funk & Wagnalls, 2s. 6d.), an admirable key to seven of Paul's Epistles, and a lucid exposition of the main thought of each. An enlightening and sanctifying book. And not least, "MANY INFALLIBLE PROOFS" (Morgan & Scott, 2s. 6d.), a manifesto of the truth of Scripture, which has been the means of the conversion of souls and of establishing and strengthening the faith of many of the host of the Lord.

We are glad to note that Sir James Henderson, President of the Institute of Journalists, joined his protest to that of The Times in the matter of the scandal which that newspaper is so splendidly exposing. Speaking last week at the annual meeting of the Institute, Sir James deplored the methods and tendency of the "new" journalism, which he declared was ruining the dignity and prestige of the British Press.

The fostering of a love for the sensational must be hurtful both to the public and the Press, and must tend to the weakening of the influence of the Press among the more intelligent sections of the community.

With our leading newspaper and the President of the Institute of Journalists alike reprobating the "yellow journalism" which is afflicting us, it is to be hoped that the offending papers will mend their methods. If they do not, the public must interfere, and refuse to buy these hurtful prints.

Amidst the many unpleasant and exciting things which we are at present compelled to read day by day, the new report of the British and Foreign Bible Society comes as a welcome change. Like most others, this venerable Society has felt the effect of the war, and its finances are behind. This matter, however, will certainly be put right by subscribers. The thing to rejoice over is that the total issues of the Scriptures for the year amounted to 5,047,792—more than half-a-million copies in advance of the previous year. Mr. Frederic Harrison and others of his school, who delight to inform the public that the Bible is a diminishing force, may profitably study the above figures.

No chain is stronger than its weakest link, and no testimony for God, nor any preaching of his Gospel, is stronger than the least truthful of its deliberate affirmations. There is a time for preaching the Gospel of God; and for the union of his people individually and of the Churches corporately in doing so. There is a time for testing our own views, and for sifting the opinions and deliverances of those with whom we are called to work.

The R.V. in Rom. v. 1 adopts the reading, "Let us have peace with God." But the Apostle is not speaking of our rising and falling experiences, but of legal principles, of judicial certainties, of decrees from the Throne. It is of no use to exhort a confessed convict to have peace with the law, unless he has peace, by his having paid or endured the penalty of his offence, in himself or in a substitute. It may be true that no human legislator can righteously accept a substitute to die instead of a criminal; but the Creator of the universe, and of the laws by which He governs his creation, can righteously descend from his throne, assume the nature of his deceived and fallen creature, and in his own person bear his penalty. "Shall the thing formed say to Him that formed it, Why hast Thou made me thus?" Shall the redeemed creature say to his Creator and Redeemer, Why hast Thou redeemed me thus? Dr. Handley Moule and other Evangelical commentators adhere decidedly to the A.V.

During the past year there has been an unusual number of ministers who have broken down in health, and whose work has been seriously interrupted in consequence. The question is becoming an insistent one whether this need be so, and on whom the chief responsibility rests. It is, of course, clear that if a soldier is to be commended for incurring disease and the dangers of battle for the sake of his country, there should be still higher commendation to the man who sacrifices his health on the altar of necessary duty in the service of the Kingdom of God. But there is legitimate room for doubt whether this is always so. Attendance at multifarious meetings of an unimportant kind, and a tendency to neglect the simple laws of health and exercise, account for a good many cases of breakdown in ministerial circles. Both these causes are removable.

A writer in a contemporary brings interesting evidence on this subject to show how some of our veteran ministers are able to outlast and outwork so many of their younger brethren. Dr. Maclaren has prolonged his career by resolutely declining to go beyond his strength, and he affords a striking example of how resources far from robust can be husbanded by careful management. Dr. Parker's ministry, which has always involved a heavy physical strain, has been made possible by the strictest attention to the laws of health, and his cold bath, simple diet, and regular hours are well known. Dr. Talmage is a great athlete, and when away from home and unable to undergo his daily routine of gymnastics, he carefully indulges in ten minutes' exercise every morning before leaving his hotel. Here are three prominent instances of what may be done to prolong life and usefulness by due regard to the conditions of physical well-being. It is time that ministers, and workers generally, paid more attention to them.

The new circular to Boards of Guardians issued by the Local Government Board certainly illustrates the value of persistency on the part of reformers; for its provisions include changes which have been proposed and advocated for years back by many who are interested in the well-being of the poor. That aged persons should not be urged to enter the workhouse at all, that every possible distinction should be made between the deserving and the undeserving poor, that the system of out-door relief should be extended, and that deserving inmates over the age of sixty-five should be very specially treated, are alterations which have been suggested so long that one almost ceased to hope for their adoption. With the wise interpretation of the terms of the circular, we should soon arrive at a period when the Poor Law administration should be regarded as a blessing and help to the poor, rather than as a part of our punitive system.

The Daily Chronicle continues its large correspondence upon the subject of Improvidence. A member of its staff, in view of the wide interest taken in the subject, has interviewed the secretary of the United Friendly Societies, with the result that some very significant figures are given. Fifteen millions of English people are members of societies, whose object is to render mutual aid in one way or another, and which have a capital of £130,000,000 sterling. Thus, more than one-third of the population has a direct interest in such institutions. A still more interesting fact comes to light. Last year in England and Wales there were 1,480,000 persons of an age greater than sixty-five. Of these 1,114,000 had made some provision for their declining years. In Ireland 282,000 people had passed that age, but only 37,000 of them had made provision of any kind for old age. These figures are sufficient to set our philanthropists thinking.

One correspondent, however, adduces some examples from real life which are fairly typical, and which go to explain much:—

In the manufactory I have, amongst many others, three typical British workmen who do exactly the same work and receive exactly the same wages, viz., 32s. per week. No. 1 is what I regard as an ideal character in a workshop—always to time, reliable, industrious. He is the "thrifty" man; he is a member of a building society, and lives in his own house, with a mortgage nearing the vanishing point; his home, which I have visited several times, is a veritable "little palace," with the garden running away from the back, and just now full of fruit, flowers, and vegetables for home use; his wife and children bright and happy.

No. 2 is of the "respectable" drinking class; most of his spare time is spent in the "smoke-room" of a certain hotel; home affairs conducted in the ordinary style, income regularly absorbed, not a sovereign in the world—a true type of the great mass of his class.

No. 3, alas, a confirmed drinker; home neglected, children poorly clad, wife (a most respectable woman), with pale face, fighting every inch of her way to provide what comforts she can for her children while the "bread-winner" is spending half his earnings in the taproom of a low public-house; he could never show a shilling after Tuesday, but runs a "score" to be met next pay day.

This is no overdrawn picture, but hard facts under my observation every day. No. 3 would have lost his situation long ago, but for the sympathy extended towards his poor wife and children.

Missionaries and their friends will read with great practical interest the admirable and fascinating lecture by Major Ross delivered before the British Association last week, upon malaria and mosquitos. Hitherto, malarial fever has been the dread foe of missionaries, and the many graves upon the Congo, in particular, bear sad witness to its ravages. Now the mysterious disease has been tracked to its source, and Major Ross showed in a most luminous manner how the mosquito transmits the scourge from man to man. This discovery has set the scientists to work, and it is confidently believed that very soon malarial fever will be within control. The chief problem is to invent a means of rendering the bite of the mosquito innocuous, and this, in view of many experiments, will not be such a formidable task as might be supposed. The new discovery will certainly further the interests of the Kingdom of God.

The brilliant young scientist, Nikola Tesla, has just made the religious confession that, after years of work at the fundamental problems of physics and human life, the answers as attained by him, are given in the "profoundly wise principles of the Christian faith," taught him in childhood—"peace, work, food." There is a sense, indeed, in which these three words cover the whole ground. Peace is the first watchword of the Gospel; till men are at peace with God, and with one another, they are helpless in service, and stunted in growth. Work comes next, for once we are in harmony with God and our fellows, we long to serve Him through them. But exhaustion soon follows service unless we recuperate our spent energies at the fountain-head of strength and life; and so spiritual Food is entirely necessary, and is neglected at the soul's peril. Harmony, activity, realization—the life that attains to these three principles is truly blessed.

The Pope has sent a strong letter to Cardinal Respighi, the Vicar-General, in which the growing alarm of the Vatican at the spread of evangelical principles is clearly shown. It is notorious that the Romish authorities have seldom bestirred themselves in the presence of almost universal scepticism within their own borders, but the slightest evidence of the spread of Protestant views at once rouses them. On this occasion, the words of the Pope are these:—

The hardihood of the enemies of the Catholic faith having redoubled, owing to the support it receives from outside, the evil, far from diminishing, has gone on augmenting, and especially of late.

What lies behind this outburst is the fact that Protestant views are spreading in Rome by leaps and bounds, new places of worship are being opened, and organized churches are being formed. The Pope bewails his own powerlessness to interfere with this movement by force, being compelled as he says "to watch the free and progressive development of heresy in this Holy City," without having the power to stop it. It is clear that if the "temporal power" were restored to him, he would make short work of religious liberty at Rome!

In the same letter, he proceeds to stigmatize Protestantism in these hot and biting words:—

It is now generally known that the design conceived by the heretical sects that are the multiform emanations of Protestantism is to plant the standard of discord and of religious rebellion in the Italian peninsula. After having, by their opposing and discordant systems, destroyed in their own countries the ancient and venerable beliefs which formed part of the sacred deposit of Revelation, after having spread in the souls of their adherents the glacial breath of doubt, derision and unbelief, these sects have now gained a footing in this, the Lord's elect vineyard, in order to continue there this fatal work of destruction.

This tissue of misrepresentations and falsities defeats itself in the eyes of those who know the facts; but they are calculated to create an entirely false attitude in the minds of ignorant Catholics towards Evangelical Protestants, who, so far from having "destroyed in their own countries the ancient and venerable beliefs which formed part of the sacred deposit of Revelation," have been the means whereby the "sacred deposit" has been rescued from utter oblivion under the accumulated "deposit" of the false doctrines and superstition of the Romish Church. If we desire to see the effects of "the glacial breath of doubt, derision, and unbelief," let us go into the countries where Catholicism is still the "representative" Christian Church—France and Spain.

In a recent note, attention was drawn to the excessively high murder rate in Italy and Spain in comparison with that of "Protestant England," and it may also be remarked as regards the criminal statistics of Britain that the Roman Catholic body—numbering only about 5 per cent. of the entire population—contributes in the districts in which Romanists congregate, no less than from 16 to 67 per cent. of the criminals and offenders. Startling, however, as such statistics must be, they point to the natural result of the teachings of Rome in reference to the nature of sin, its practical statement in its printed manuals that it is only a venial sin "to steal a little," or to commit a number of other specified offences, and to the assumption of sacerdotal power of forgiveness by the priest.

The Church Times has always identified the progress of true religion among the young with the maintenance of denominational teaching in the day schools. The Editor may be invited to read the following confession of the utter failure of that system to fulfil its end. The writer is a correspondent in the Church Review, and a "school-manager" in the city. He says:—

My personal experience as a school-manager, has been gained entirely in London, and it goes to show that the mass of children we educate at such a cost grow up indifferent to the church. But it is not only the case in London; only the other day I was told by an earnest Churchman, a professional man of many years' standing in a certain watering-place on the S.E. coast, where there is no School Board, that, in spite of their education at church schools, the vast bulk of the population there is composed of Dissenters.

The advice of the writer is to hand over the church schools to the School Board for secular education, since the money spent on them is largely wasted, and fails of its special purpose. The children would then get religious and moral teaching untainted with instruction that aims at making them churchmen, and in many cases only succeeds in making them the opposite.

Lord Strathcona, on behalf of the Canadian Government, has made an offer to English rural elementary schools to supply gratis a geography and atlas of Canada, with a view of quickening the sentiment for emigration, and so of supplying that immense Colony with the sufficiency of men they need. The steady exodus from our own rural districts into the towns makes the offer, at least in this form, of more than doubtful value. It is in the town and city schools that this offer should be considered. English farmers are at their wits' end for labourers. The real reason why they cannot command a supply is the miserable conditions of the lives of many agricultural workers, who prefer to take their chance of bettering themselves in the cities. If we wish to retain, or to regain, the rural labourer for the cultivation of the soil, his lot must be made more livable. Otherwise it is no wonder that he flees to the cities, and to our far-off Colonies, where he has so much more scope and opportunity of advancement.

Justification and Sanctification.

For whom He did foreknow, He also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that He might be the firstborn among many brethren. Moreover whom He did predestinate, them He also called: and whom He called, them He also justified: and whom He justified, them He also glorified (Rom. viii. 29, 30).

IT all goes together. We have been crucified together with Him, buried together, quickened together, raised together, made to sit together in heavenly places, glorified together; and if we suffer with Him we shall also reign with Him.

The fifth chapter of Romans is often conceived as relating to justification, and the eighth to sanctification. But sanctification is so indissolubly linked to justification that nothing in the eighth chapter goes beyond the first eleven verses of the fifth; though that which is merely stated in the earlier is developed in the later.

It is true that the Holy Spirit is not mentioned in the sixth and seventh chapters, and is the main subject of the eighth. But He has been already spoken of in the first chapter, where Jesus is "declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the Spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead;" and in the fifth, where "the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, who is given unto us."

There is no blessedness in earth or heaven, in time or eternity, in saint or seraph, nor ever will, nor can be, higher or further than the experience of Rom. v. 11, "We glory in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have now received the reconciliation." Observe the steps or stages by which the Apostle reaches the statement of this illimitable beatitude, which is not a "glimmering limit far withdrawn" where "God made Himself a glorious robe of dawn," but is a positive possession and experience, at least in germ, of every soul, immediately on being justified by faith and receiving peace with God. Even in the elder time Jeremiah had said, "Thy words were found, and I did eat them, and thy words were unto me the joy and the rejoicing of my heart."

1. "Being justified by faith in God, who raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead, who was delivered up for our offences and was raised again for our justification, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have now received the reconciliation." Rom. iv. 23; v. 11.

2. Through this crucified and risen Saviour we also "have access by faith into this grace wherein we stand," into this grace of the new birth, of justification, of peace, of acceptance, of sonship. The grace of having received the only begotten Son of God, who is the brightness of his glory and the express image of his person; the fulness of the Godhead bodily; in whom are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. The grace of possessing and being possessed and indwelt by the Holy Spirit, by whom we have been baptized into one body; who is the earnest of our inheritance; our Comforter; by whom we have been sealed as God's purchased possession, and anointed as his witnesses. Old Testament type and prophecy, and New Testament antitype and fulfilment, are full of the grace in which we stand.

3. "And glory in hope of the glory of God." For He is the God of hope; we are saved in hope; Christ in us is the hope of glory; and we glory, we rejoice, we exult, we boast, in the hope of God's glory. We have learned that the fallen rebel lied when he slandered God in the garden, and that he murdered us when he seduced us into his own sin of seeking to be as God. Now, having obtained repentance toward God and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ, we rejoice, we glory, in hope of the glory of God; for as we fell by defying and dishonouring God, we now delight ourselves in the Gospel of the glory of the blessed God, in the hope of his glory, through our Lord Jesus Christ, whom He has glorified.

4. "And not only so, but we glory in tribulations also, knowing that tribulation [by which we are tested] worketh patience, and patience experience, or proof, or approval; and approval, hope; and hope makes not ashamed."

Thus, tribulation forms character, by working in us patience, experience, and hope; and, therefore, we rejoice and glory in tribulation, because it fulfils the purpose for which we are predestinated—to be conformed to the image of the Son of God.

5. "Because God's love is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost who is given unto us," and not by any effort of our own, it comes to pass that patience, experience, and hope are thus wrought in us, and we are transfigured by the renewing of our mind, to know, and love, and do, the holy, acceptable, and perfect will of God.

6. "And not only so, but we also glory in God through our Lord Jesus Christ." This is the acme of Christianity; this is Christian perfection; this is the perfect love which casts out tormenting fear; this is the sevenfold blessedness which Jesus opened his mouth and taught his disciples; this is sanctification; this is holiness. All other apostolic expositions and exhortations tend, and are intended, to produce this result.

7. "Through whom we have now received the reconciliation." This brings us back to the point from which we started—peace with God. Being justified by faith we have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ,... through whom we have now received the reconciliation (chap. v. 1, 11). Being sinners, Christ died for us. Being ungodly, we were justified in his blood. Being enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son. Being reconciled, we shall be saved in his life. Therefore "we also joy in God, through our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom we have now received the reconciliation." The circle is complete. Mercy and truth have met together; righteousness and peace have kissed each other. Our justification and sanctification are indissolubly one in Christ Jesus our Lord.

Justification, truly and fully known, leads to glorying in God, which is sanctification in its highest form. There is no true sanctification which is not built upon justification. The teaching and reception of justification produces sanctification; but to teach sanctification apart from justification leads neither to peace with God, nor to holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord. It is to be observed with unfeigned thankfulness that there is a renewal of testimony to these important truths. M.

The Christian's Possessions.*

(1 Cor. i. 30.)

By Dr. A. T. PIERSON.

THIS passage indicates the commanding heights from which believers may look out and survey the whole field of their possessions in Christ, as He is made unto them wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption. These things follow the exact order of the experience of Christ Himself, in his career as the Son of Man. First, He appears as the Teacher, whose works were vocal with witness both to Himself and to the Father, his miracles of healing being illustrations of what He can do in the moral and spiritual sphere.

After Christ's vicarious work as Saviour, his resurrection and the subsequent new conditions of his life reveal Him as made unto us righteousness. In his ascension to the right hand of God, and by the descent of the Holy Spirit as his gift to the Church, He becomes sanctification to us; and He waits to be full redemption when He comes again in glory.

The same order is seen in the teaching of the Epistles, except the pastoral ones; and, indeed, in the contents of the New Testament as a whole. The four Gospels and the Acts are concerned with first, personally; and then, through the Holy Spirit. The whole burden of the Epistle to the Romans is righteousness founded in Christ. Various stages of sanctification are represented in the Epistles from Corinthians to Colossians; while the Thessalonian Epistles describe full redemption at Christ's coming, with the final overthrow and elimination of evil. This order is no accident, but it tends to show that a single text of Scripture may be the channel by which the riches of the Godhead are poured into our souls.

Taking the first point of wisdom, Christ, as our Teacher, corrects our errors, confirms the truth that we hold, and unveils to us further revelations of God. For example, the teaching of the ancients was revived in the memorable words, "Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time" (Matt. v. 21). Then, with regard to the types and shadows, ceremonies and symbols of the Old Testament, Christ completes our knowledge of things partially known, showing how all these things unite for their fulfilment in Himself. Again, like Nicodemus, we are instructed in things absolutely new to us. It was the office of our Lord to bring life and immortality to light. How little Old Testament saints knew of eternal life as revealed in the New Testament! Each of the four words with which we are dealing presents to us a boundless field of thought.

As to the righteousness which is of God, by faith, Christ stands between God and man as Mediator, taking man's sin and presenting it to God as pardoned and atoned for; taking and presenting it to man as conferred upon him and offered to him freely. Christ is the medium of the exchange. A great exchange, is it not—man's sin for God's righteousnes? Let us not forget the mediatorial position of Christ.

There are three things which Jesus Christ does for us, as made unto us Righteousness. First, there is the legal work of satisfying the penalty of the law, by Him who bore our sin in his own body on the tree, expiating our offence and removing our guilt. Then we have a judicial standing before God. "This grace wherein we stand" represents a permanence of position which is not affected by our feeling; for faith takes hold of fact, not feeling. Seen through the medium of Christ, we are transformed by God; and even if, to our shame, we are not as careful and as prayerful as we ought to be, yet God still numbers us among his children. Thirdly, we are maintained in that position by Christ's everlasting advocacy. This is not merely an office of prayer, but He represents us before the throne of God; and his very presence, as He bears the wounds of Calvary, is a strong plea on our behalf, both in law and in equity, controverting the slanders of our great adversary, Satan, as well as silencing the accusations of Divine justice.

As made unto us Sanctification, Jesus Christ provides us with an example in Himself, for He says, "For their sakes I sanctify myself."

HE SANCTIFIES US

by taking us up into the sphere of his own life. There we are kept always rejoicing; for we are maintained in the peace of God, and stand outside discontent, the fiery darts of Satan, and the power of the world (1 John v. 18, R.V.). Again, the Spirit, who in regeneration makes us partakers of the Divine nature, is imparted to us by Christ, to exercise his sanctifying energy. May we not say, with all reverence, that the blessed Spirit of God is the atmosphere of the life which we have in our Lord?

Christ made unto us Redemption reminds us that we are kept by the power of God, through faith, unto that salvation which is ready to be revealed in the last time. As pilgrims passing through the wilderness, we look for the appearance of the domes and spires of the city whose builder and maker is God.

embraces a body made like unto Christ's glorious body, a spiritual life perfectly transformed into his likeness, and the whole creation redeemed from the bondage of corruption and brought into the glorious liberty of the children of God.

Is it not a remarkable thing that anybody can refuse this Christ? Oh that they who, as yet, know Him not, may yield themselves to Him, and let his wounded hand take full control of their being, that the discordant notes of their nature may be changed into heavenly harmony! God has laid out a great plan for every one of us. It is the work of Jesus Christ to make us like it; and the triumph of redemption will be seen in that day when, with overwhelming hearts, we shall look at that plan and say, "Thank God, by his grace, I am like it."

* Notes of an Address at New Court Chapel, Tollington Park, N.

Dr. Pierson in North London.

THE ministry of Dr. Pierson during the past week, in a series of daily addresses to Christians, at New Court Church, Tollington Park (Rev. Campbell Morgan's), commends itself as that of one who is manifestly taught of the Holy Spirit; for, to speak as he does, a man must know the things of which he tells. Under a quiet manner, Dr. Pierson carries a force of matured conviction, which often takes shape in striking terms of animated utterance. As one listened to his wonderfully instructive words concerning new light was thrown upon the sacred page, and it seemed as if the soul were brought face to face with God.

From day to day large companies of believers drank in the teaching of this honoured servant of God, with evident interest and delight. In view of the prayerful spirit which marked the inception and progress of the mission, we may confidently hope in God for much fruit therefrom in the permanent deepening and broadening of spiritual life among not a few of those who call Christ Master.

On the four days when afternoon meetings were held, these gatherings were succeeded, after an interval for tea, by exceedingly helpful one-hour open conferences upon practical points of life and service. Questions were propounded and answered. God-honouring testimonies were given, and the sound counsels of ripened Christian experience were as greatly appreciated as they were freely offered. As pastor of the church, Mr. Campbell Morgan, was present at most of the meetings of the week.

The twelve discourses by Dr. Pierson, ending with those delivered at the usual services last Lord's Day, covered a wide field, including the work of Christ and of the Holy Spirit, in relation to the world as well as to believers; the perfections of Christ in his divinity and in his humanity; the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, and of the Word of God; the personality and evil work of Satan; the cross of Christ in the life of the believer; the Scripture bases of testimony; and the influence of obedience upon the growth of spiritual knowledge. The practical bearings of these topics were made apparent in solemn, heart-searching expositions of the claims of God upon his redeemed people.

In his closing address, on Sunday evening, Dr. Pierson spoke to a crowded congregation concerning temptation—the sources and secret of victory, and the awful results of yielding. The summary of the first address is given on this page.

Oxford Letter.

[BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

SPECIAL interest was attached to the Missionary Anniversary of the Methodist Free Church, owing to the presence of a Chinese missionary, Rev. W. E. Soothill, who has laboured for some eighteen years in Menchew. Mr. Soothill said there were three causes why the present disturbances arose in China. There was first the reform movement, set on foot some ten years ago, which had for its object the enlightenment of their rulers re the need of a higher civilization. Then came the question of the missionaries, in considering which it was necessary to distinguish between the Protestant and the Roman Catholic. Mr. Soothill showed how the latter had come into collision with the Boxers over some securities, with the result that one of their churches was burnt. This was the commencement of a series of unpleasant experiences. Mr. Soothill mentioned as a factor in the crisis foreign aggression, and said he feared that the British statesmen, along with others, were not free from blame. It was helpful to hear the missionary speak hopefully of the work. Almost every town in China had a house of God.

The popular Pleasure Fair was held last week in the St. Giles' thoroughfare, and the attendance was very large. Rev. C. J. Casher, curate of St. Aldate's, who was in charge of the Bible stall, had the assistance of several friends, and it is pleasing to note that the various books on sale were disposed of to an extent that compared favourably with previous years. We are thankful for the testimony borne by Mr. Casher and his friends at this annual fair. Open-air meetings were also held, conducted by Capt. Warbridge of the Church Army, and others.

Rev. J. S. W. Shrewsbury succeeds Mr. Butler, as the pastor of the Wesleyan Chapel in William Street. The Recognition Services were held on Wednesday, and were largely attended. Mr. Shrewsbury comes at an interesting time to Methodism in Oxford, as the erection of a new building in Cowley Road is contemplated. He was accorded a warm welcome by the friends, and we warmly echo his wish that a new Methodist year such as Oxford had not known before has commenced. One sentence of Rev. W. Bradfield, Superintendent of the Oxford Circuit, ought not to pass unnoticed. Speaking of the difficulties that confronted them in their work, he said their greatest trouble was "the shameless conduct and shallowness of a great many of their young people." "They wanted," he said, "to start the new year with a great deal more devotion to the Word of God, and then their difficulties would vanish."

Isle of Man Convention.—The tenth annual Convention was held at Castletown on September 5. Rev. J. M. Spicer (vicar of Malew), who has acted as chairman and convener from the commencement, presided, and the meetings were addressed by Canon Christopher (Oxford), Rev. J. H. Horsburg (China), Rev. C. Lea-Wilson (Nottingham), Rev. W. J. Moran (Principal of Bishop Wilson's Theological School), and Mr. J. A. Ford, convener of the Ashton-under-Lyne Convention. The Town Hall was well filled at all the meetings, and an earnest and deeply spiritual tone pervaded the assemblies.

Does Romanism Increase in England?—A writer in the Church Review does not believe that there is "any real danger of any large number of people in this country ever accepting the Papal claims. . . . For fifty years there has been unceasing Papist propaganda. . . . There has been a constantly-increasing expenditure of money and building of churches by Papists; there ha been a gain by them from us of many bright intellects, of many devout priests; there has been, above all, an enormous immigration into these provinces of Irish Romanists. Yet Romanists in this country have not grown in proportion to the population, and it would seem quite clear that among those of English blood they have absolutely decreased."

The Metropolitan Tabernacle.

THE reopening of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, which takes place this week, is a function which necessarily awakens many fragrant memories of gracious spiritual seasons, since the structure is inseparably linked with the name of the illustrious preacher for whom the original building was erected.

That the religious forces called into being under the pastorate of C. H. Spurgeon are still a power in the land, finding an outlet in many and that the work continues to make substantial progress under the present pastor, are matters for congratulation, and believers of widely differing views will unite in praying that the new Tabernacle may be the birthplace of many souls.

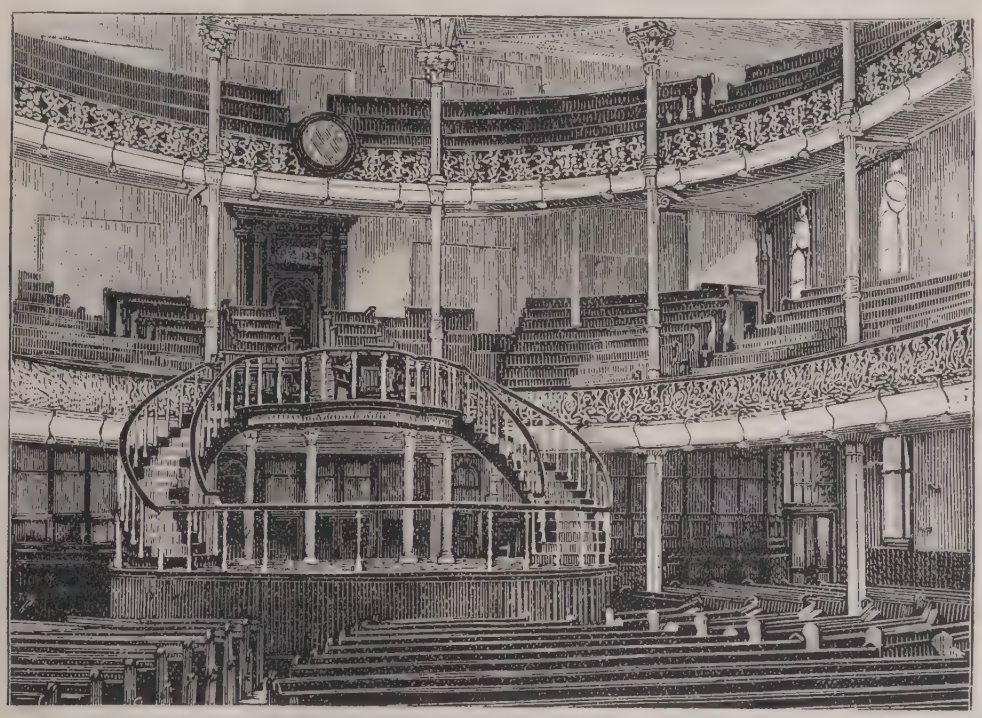
The history of the church and congregation goes back to Cromwellian days, when, in 1652, the pastor was one William Rider. That worthy was followed by the remarkable preacher, Benjamin Keach, of Winslow. In Keach's time, during the period of an indulgence issued by Charles II., a large meeting-house, accommodating about 1,000 worshippers, was erected in Goat's Yard Passage, Fair Street, Horsleydown. It was a wooden structure, and is thought not to have contained pews, the congregation standing throughout the service.

In 1757 a move was made to a new building in Carter Lane, near London Bridge, under the learned and spiritual Dr. Gill, who presided over the church for upwards of half a century. Dr. Rippon, who succeeded, filled the pastorate for sixty-three years. "He ruled," says the late C. H. Spurgeon, "with dignity and discretion." In 1833 the New Street Chapel was built, and in 1836 Mr. (now Dr.) Joseph Angus became minister, leaving only to become secretary of the Baptist Missionary Society. After the removal of Mr. Angus, the church was happily directed to Rev. James Smith, whose useful ministry in Cheltenham was an abundant guarantee of his fitness. He was both able and faithful, and his books were the means of the conversion of many. Rev. William Walters subsequently fulfilled a short ministry of two years, and, in 1854, Mr. C. H. Spurgeon accepted the pastorate, with results that have become historic.



SPURGEON'S TABERNACLE.

After the disastrous fire of April, 1898, only the skeleton of the building was left. When the Tabernacle was built, in 1861, it cost £35,000. Owing to advances in the cost of materials, &c., £45,000 has been spent on its re-erection. The fire insurance amounted to £22,000, and it is gratifying that the £23,000 needed to carry out the work has already been realized, so the reopening takes place under cheering circumstances. Externally no change has been made. The walls and are as they were, except that they have been cleaned. The interior takes the same form as before, but is about 14ft. shorter, and is seated for 4,000, instead of 5,000 persons.

The space curtailed from the auditorium has been thrown into the rooms behind, greatly adding to the accommodation, and improving the proportions of the church and the comfortable hearing of the congregation. There are two galleries as previously. The platform pulpit is again a feature, and the whole institution is lighted by electricity. The Tabernacle as originally built had no provision for heating, but the new erection has an efficient heating apparatus.

The ministry of Pastor Thomas Spurgeon has been marked by a sturdy adherence to Gospel truth, and by a devotion and untiring industry, both in pastoral work, and in the Pastor's College and the many familiar undertakings connected with the Tabernacle. Our readers will unite in prayer that the Divine blessing may rest richly upon Mr. Spurgeon and his congregation as they enter upon fresh responsibilities in their resuscitated home.

The services arranged for to-day (Thursday) are: Eleven, a.m., Rev. F. B. Meyer. Three till seven, reception by Pastor and Mrs. Thos. Spurgeon. Evening, at half-past seven, sermon by Rev. J. H. Jowett, M.A., of Birmingham. Solos by Mr. Ira D. Sankey. Subsequent gatherings are:

FRIDAY, September 21.—Evening at seven. Public meeting. Chairman, Mr. T. A. Denny. Solos by Mr. Sankey.

SATURDAY, September 22.—Evening at seven. "Service of Sacred Song and Story" by Mr. Sankey, on behalf of Sunday school extension. Chairman, Pastor Thos. Spurgeon.

SUNDAY, September 23.—Morning at eleven, sermon by Pastor Thos. Spurgeon. Afternoon, at three, special service for young people, conducted by Rev. J. Tolefree Parr. Evening, at half-past six, sermon by Pastor Thos. Spurgeon.

MONDAY, September 24.—Evening at seven, public meeting. Chairman, Mr. John Marnham, J.P.

TUESDAY, September 25.—Meeting of workmen and their wives. Tea at half-past six; lecture, at half-past seven, by Pastor Thos. Spurgeon, "John Ploughman's Pictures."

WEDNESDAY, September 26.—At seven o'clock, united rally of the various societies and institutions connected with the Tabernacle, Pastors' College, Stockwell Orphanage, Colportage Association, Sunday School, Young Christians' Missionary Union, &c. Chairman, Mr. George H. Dean, J.P.

THURSDAY, September 27.—Afternoon at three, and evening, at seven, sermon by Rev. John McNeill.

SUNDAY, September 30.—Morning, at eleven, evening, at half-past six o'clock, sermons by Pastor Hugh D. Brown, M.A., of Dublin.

THURSDAY, October 4.—Evening, at half-past seven, Baptismal service. Preacher, Rev. J. W. Ewing, M.A., B.D.

THURSDAY, October 11.—Evening, at half-past seven. Sermon by Rev. Dinsdale T. Young.

THURSDAY, October 18.—Evening, at half-past seven, United communion service for believers of all denominations. Sermon by Rev. Alex. Maclaren, D.D.

The hymns which were selected by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon, and sung at the opening of the Tabernacle in 1861, have been reprinted, and will be used at all services.

Points and Outlines.

PREACHING CHRIST.

BOWLES gives the following cogent reasons for the full exhibition of Christ in preaching:—

I. Because in Him is our only hope of salvation (Acts iv. 12; John xiv. 6).

II. Because He is the scope of the whole Scripture, the whole range of truth being employed, either (a) like the Mosaic economy, "to bring us to him;" (b) to describe Him as if before our eyes; (c) to lead us to communion with Him by the outward and inward means; or (d) that we might walk worthy of Him.

III. Because all the first ministers of the Gospel unite in giving Him the pre-eminence of their ministrations—(a) John the Baptist (John i. 29); (b) Philip (Acts viii. 5); (c) Paul (Acts ix. 20; 1 Cor. ii.; Eph. iii. 8).

IV. Because all our works, except they be grafted on Him, are no better than splendid sins (John xv. 4, 5).

POSSESSIONS OF A TRUE MINISTER.
(2 Cor. vi. 4.)

A father's tenderness—a shepherd's care—
A leader's courage, which the cross can bear—
A ruler's awe—a watchman's wakeful eye—
A pilot's skill, the helm in storms to ply—
A fisher's patience—and a labourer's toil—
A guide's dexterity, to disembroil—
A prophet's inspiration from above—
A teacher's knowledge—and a Saviour's love.

Bishop Ken.

CHRISTIAN INFLUENCE.
(Rom. xiv. 7, 8.)

I. A man cannot live only to himself. Each man is a link in the great chain of being. II. It is important for our own sakes as well as for the sake of others, that we live well. Hence we should seek to live "unto the Lord."

J. D. T.

BORN FROM ABOVE.
(John iii. 3, 4.)

The distinction of the saved is that they are "born from heaven"—"from above." They are a heaven-born set of men, a community of persons that are all of a divine family—of the family of God, to be the sons and daughters of the Most High; not by adoption only, as if their sonship were no more than a relative thing, but by regeneration too, which is a real thing, and which makes an internal subjective change, the greatest that can be wrought in this world upon the subject where it hath place.

John Howe.

East London Jews.—The condition of a large number of the Jews in the East End of London is referred to in a paper which appears on the report of London City Mission. Owing to the model dwellings having become overcrowded in their turn, and to the demolition of many streets of small houses, the overcrowding among the Jews has become dreadful. The missionary states that it is not unusual for ten to live and sleep in one little room, while five to eight families may be found in one small house of five or six rooms. How greatly this state of matters adds to the difficulties of those who preach Christianity in the localities, is only too evident.

SUNDAY, September 23. Isaiah xxi.

THE reader is earnestly advised to study this chapter in the R.V., by which it becomes far more intelligible. It begins with Babylon, which stood on a great wilderness plain, intersected by inlets from the sea. Isaiah sees its impending destruction by Sargon, the father of Sennacherib. His onset and its results are so terrible, that pangs take hold of the prophet as he beholds. In the midst of their preparations for feasting, the alarm breaks in on the princes of Babylon (5); their overthrow follows, which is attested to the prophet by the watchman he has been appointed to watch the progress of events.

There is infinite tenderness in the prophet's address to his own people (10). And surely He gives a description which is invariably true of the people of God? They are perpetually like corn on the barn floor, exposed to the flail and the fan.

Two other burdens follow—that of Arabia, the caravans of which are diverted from their usual route, and need water to be supplied, since they miss the wells; and that of Dumah, in which the well-known words ring out, "What of the night?" On his watch-tower on Mount Zion, Isaiah seems to hear a mysterious voice ringing out from the mountains of Seir. It asks how much of the calamity of invasion has passed, and what prospect there is of speedy relief. And all the answer which Isaiah can return is that there will be intervals of prosperity mingled with adversity and pain; but he bids the enquirer come again for further information. Morning is on its way, child of God, for thee, in which there shall be no night—but for others, the outer darkness, in which shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth.

MONDAY, September 24. Isaiah xxii.

Here is the state of Jerusalem, during some siege; whether of Sargon or Sennacherib is not determined. The roofs of the houses are covered with spectators who have gone up to watch the evolutions of the forces of the foe. The rulers are fled, probably by night, as afterwards (2 Kings xxv. 4). The valleys are filled with the chariots and horsemen of the foe, which effect breaches in the walls; and various internal alterations are made to provide against the better defence of the beleaguered city. But what is the state of the populace? Ah, God has called them to weeping and mourning, to repentance and amendment of their ways, but they refuse to give heed, and spend the days in reckless dissipation (13). "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." In the hour of peril, the tempter so often steals up to us, and whispers that under such circumstances we are released from ordinary restraints, and may take extraordinary liberties. But see, in this case, how the license to which Israel yielded, riveted the chains, which they endeavoured to forget.

Shebna, as a statesman, probably opposed the prophet's words—and his degradation is announced, whilst in his stead Eliakim is substituted. And as the prophetic description runs on of this good and great man, One rises behind him, in a glory to which he could not pretend, and in the hands of this Greater One, there is seen to be the true key of David, the symbol of his power (Rev. iii. 7). He also is the nail in the sure place, on whom each one of us may hang his whole weight, for time and eternity.

TUESDAY, September 25. Isaiah xxiii.

The overthrow of Tyre is the burden of this chapter. For ages she had been the commercial metropolis of the world—as Venice was in the middle ages, and London is to-day. This siege was probably by the Assyrians, though she was afterwards to be assailed by Nebuchadnezzar and Alexander successively. The story of her fall is described as circling over the world. Egypt hears it with dismay, because her harvests were transported to all the countries of the Mediterranean seaboard by the Tyrian corn-ships. The daughter cities, such as Carthage, Chittim and Tarshish, are equally filled with consternation, because the mother-city has fallen. As Assyria had triumphed over Chaldæa, so should she triumph over Tyre. But her fall was not to be final. After a time she was to revive and resume her commercial intercourse with foreign cities, receiving gains from her commerce, here described as hire.

It is stated that the proceeds of commerce shall be "Holiness to the Lord" (18). That day, in its full significance, still seems far distant. But, obviously, the people of God have greatly profited by the extension of commerce. We all benefit by the speed of modern locomotion, by the freedom with which the products of all the world are brought to our doors, by the intercourse between all nations which greatly facilitates the sending forth of missionaries, and the dissemination of good literature. We cannot undervalue these. How could Paul have traversed the Mediterranean, except by the service of the Tyrian cornships! But we anticipate a better day, when the principles of love shall supersede the laws of competition.

WEDNESDAY, September 26. Isaiah xxiv.

This chapter is full of desolation. The land is turned upside down, like a dish that is being emptied. The distinctions between ranks and classes are utterly abolished. Dismay darkens the city. And there is no way of escape. It is as when the hunter scares the wild beasts with the snare or pitfall which he has prepared for them, and they have no possibility to elude him (17). The whole structure of the Jewish commonwealth seemed on the point of dissolution, as a frail hut of branches and osiers shaken by a mighty gale.

Out of the overthrow some few survivors escape; some go east, some go west. And as go "they lift up their voice and sing for the majesty of the Lord." Over the wastes of the sea their voice is heard in holy song: "They shall cry aloud from the sea." The prophet addresses them, crying, "Glorify ye the Lord in the land of light," i.e., the East (15). And he seemed to hear their response, for he says, "From the uttermost part of the earth have we heard songs." And what is the burden of their song? It is this, "Glory to the righteous."

When the desolation of judgment visits the world, there is always a way of escape for the godly. Lot goes out of Sodom. The early disciples of Jesus flee to Pella from the Fall of Jerusalem under Titus. And as they go their way from the overthrow, they sing a twofold song. On the one hand they praise the glorious majesty of their God; on the other, they exult in the safety and blessedness of the children of God, who dwell in his secret place, and are hidden under his shadow. Their song is more elaborately set forth in the following chapters.

THURSDAY, September 27. Isaiah xxv.

Here is a sublime ode indeed! Whether it was elicited by the literal destruction of some mighty city, as of Babylon, as v. 2 suggests, or whether it deals singly with some ideal world-city, such as that Babylon the Great which has always been opposed to Jerusalem, which is from above, we cannot settle with any certainty. It is at least, in the latter sense, that this sacred poem of victory is valuable to the Church of every age.

Look at some of the poetry of it! A sandstorm of the desert which expends itself ineffectually against a wall of defence behind which the defenceless take refuge (4); the heat of the sun, which is mitigated by the curtaining cloud that veils it (5); the lopping off of a branch with one stroke of the woodman's axe (5); such are the illustrations of the overthrow of the power of the wickedness; and as we look up we see only the broken, ruined remnants of the proud city. Then turn to the figure of the feast of the Gospel, which gave the imagery for two or three of the Lord's parables. It seems as though we can behold the sides of Mount Zion covered by the successive ranks of the children of men, whilst the Church bears to them the Gospel provisions, and death is swallowed up in resurrection, and tears are wiped, and the reproaches under which God's people have laboured in every age are answered.

Yes, weary soul, if you will but wait a little longer, the green fields will show beyond the waste of waters over which you have travelled so long; and you will be glad, as the crew of an Atlantic liner, long beset with mist and resisted by strong head-winds, rejoice when they see the outlines of the southern coast-lines and headlands of Ireland. "We have waited for Him, He will save us; we will rejoice." "Behold! He cometh with clouds."

FRIDAY, September 28. Isaiah xxvi.

Song on song! Here is joy exceeding, and full of glory. Has the former chapter celebrated the fall of Babylon the Great? This celebrates the rise of fair Jerusalem, whose walls are Salvation, and her gates, Praise. Oh, citizen of that city, thy God will keep thee in perfect peace, if thy mind is stayed persistently on Him; only look neither to thy right, nor to thy left; count not thy resources, look not to thy poor sling and stone; trust in Jehovah, absolutely and for ever, for He is the Rock of Ages, once cleft for thee, and now for ever open for thy sure defence. The way for the righteous is right. God goes before him to level its course. Only put thyself in the path of his judgments, and He will appear for thee.

What a sublime confidence this is for the afflicted soul, that God will ordain peace for it, and that He will work all our works for us! Alas for us, that we ever went astray from Him, that we ever gave other lords our fealty, that we trusted in the works of our own hands! We have seen the futility of all that: "They are dead, they shall not live," &c. (14).

How often have the saints turned to those glorious words of resurrection of life, spoken by Jehovah himself in the closing paragraphs. True, first, of the Hebrew people arising from their depressed and downtrodden condition, they have been true of the revival and renascence of the Church in every age; and they shall be true in a yet wider sense when the resurrection of the saints shall close the wonderful stages in the redemption of the Church. Till all those events have wrought themselves out to their consummation, let us enter into our chambers, on which the blood of the Lamb is marked, to deliver us from the angel of destruction.

SATURDAY, September 29. Isaiah xxvii.

Israel, and we may say, therefore, God's redeemed people, are compared to a vineyard, reminding us of John xv., "The Father is the Husbandman." He keeps it, watching it, watering it, and guarding it always. It is thus that Jesus keeps us, if only we do not put ourselves outside his loving and strong protection. There are three ways of doing this. First, we may allow sin to go unconfessed; or, secondly, we may yield to fretting worry, and look off from Him to circumstances; or, thirdly, we may try to live without communion with Him in prayer and Bible-study. But if we guard against these, we shall abide in Him, and our life will be hidden with Christ in God.

There is no fury in God's heart against us, but it is against our sins, just as the gardener goes against the thorns and briars which spoil his vineyard. God hates, not the sinner, but the sin. He takes our part against our sins, as a mother may take the part of her fever-stricken child against his fever. It is comforting to know that we may take hold of the Divine strength (5); it is there awaiting our appropriation in our Lord Jesus Christ, who is made unto us . . . strength.

God does chasten his people; but their chastisements are altogether different from the utter destruction with which He visits their foes. And as the 9th verse puts it: "By this chastisement shall the iniquity of Jacob be done away," and this is all the effect of it, to take away his sin; and the result will appear when he makes his stone idols like broken chalk stones, so that the Asherahs and the sun-pillars shall stand no more." The last words are very sweet! As the husbandman gathers his olives from the trees, so God shall gather his people one by one from their banishment and exile to his store-house. Oh that each of us may be included!

Other Lands.

The Needs of France.

It is by no means easy for English people to understand French life and character. The Channel that divides us from our neighbours is a trifling obstacle to such an understanding, as compared with the gulf that separates our modes of thought and expression. Close and prolonged contact, wide study, and, above all, sympathetic insight are needed for a right comprehension of the French character. Whilst conscious of much deficiency in these respects, I yet feel that the somewhat exceptional opportunities afforded me, first during a student life in France more than twenty-five years ago, and again during the past three years, impose upon me the duty of doing what I can to make known to British Christians the condition and needs of France.

A good understanding between these two nations is, I am convinced, of unspeakable importance to the evangelization of the world. Each of them has much to learn from the other. Who can doubt that the differing gifts bestowed on each by Him who "made of one every nation of men" were meant to be complementary, not antagonistic, and are designed to be used for the

BLESSING OF THE HEATHEN WORLD?

It is, indeed, time that something should be done to promote good understanding, when one finds a serious paper like The Spectator discussing the probabilities of an invasion of England by France this autumn. Without staying to dwell on political questions, I will merely express the firm conviction that so long as President Loubet remains in office, there is no fear of any hostile proceedings against England. The only people in France who want war are the schemers, who are plotting to overturn the French Republic in favour of some sort of clerical—militarist—monarchical government. They have now for many years been at this work; but their plots have all been frustrated, and their confident prophecies of the downfall of the Republic have again and again been falsified, sometimes under circumstances that led even avowed unbelievers to admit that this was the finger of God. I believe that, in answer to much prayer, He will still interpose to prevent the establishment of a Government that would assuredly put an end to all religious liberty, and to protect one which, with all its failings, does afford protection to those who are striving to make known to the French people that Gospel by which alone it

CAN BE SAVED AND REGENERATED.

France is, by an overwhelming majority, a Roman Catholic country. Out of its population of over 38,000,000, only about 650,000—less than two per cent.—are Protestants. These are chiefly found in certain limited districts, so that there are wide tracts in which Protestantism is almost unknown. A large proportion of these Protestants, moreover, are as much devoid of any real religion as the great mass of Catholics. In the largest Protestant district, that of the Gard, the number of men who attend public worship is extremely small. Amongst the Catholics also, except in a few districts, such as Brittany, the attendance at church is but small, and mainly confined to the women.

While the French people are in a certain sense attached to the Roman Catholic Church, they are yet to a great extent alienated from it. Very few even of those who call themselves Freethinkers—a term which is generally employed as almost synonymous with Atheist—go so far as to refuse the intervention of the Church for the baptism and first communion of their children, for weddings, and for funerals. The power of custom is too strong, especially as that custom has behind it the instinctive fear of the unseen. The clergy are neither loved nor feared, generally speaking, in France. It is curious to note how anxious even nationalist politicians are to disavow the charge that they are subservient to the Church. The priests themselves acknowledge that they have lost their hold of the masses, both in town and country; they speak with almost envious admiration of England, where the religious sentiment is so strong that men are willing to endure social obloquy in becoming Roman Catholics. The prevailing religion of France at the present day is materialism, tempered only by external conformity to the national religion.

Yet there is in France, as in every other country, a deep

a craving which only the Gospel of Christ can satisfy. The thrifty peasant, whose thrift degenerates into avarice, the pleasure-loving Parisian, to whom pleasure too often means vice, both are alike unsatisfied. The reception given to the distribution of Gospel portions at the Exhibition, the numbers who come to listen to the Gospel addresses at the Salle Rapp, the readiness with which Gospel literature is received all over France, the large attendance at Protestant funerals (occasions which are highly valued by faithful pastors), all testify to the sense of need amongst the French people, high and low. It is the great crime of Catholicism, in France as elsewhere, that it withholds the Scriptures from the people. On the one hand is clericalism, with its blind acceptance of tradition, offering a way of escape from the negations of materialism; and on the other atheism, as a reaction from the absurdities of superstition. Wanting the sure guide of revelation, French thought drifts between these extremes, seeking rest and finding none.

The Indian Famine.

In spite of the general improvement in affairs consequent on the rains, a vast amount of misery still calls for the practical help of the benevolent. The fact that over 4,000,000 people are still in receipt of official relief is sufficient to indicate the lamentable condition of the country. The number of orphans to be cared for is very large, while, but for help in the form of seed corn, agricultural implements, and ploughing cattle, many of the farmers and labourers must remain destitute and hopeless.

REV. DENNIS OSBORNE VISITS ENGLAND.

"At the request of many friends," writes Rev. Dennis Osborne, "I have concluded to visit Great Britain on a brief mission on behalf of sorely smitten India. At the time of my former visit (Feb.-March) the famine was beginning to spread its black pall over the Western Presidency; and in April, on my return, the sorest intensity of distress was beginning to be felt. The terrible experiences of the period which followed, claiming the lives of seven missionary workers as martyrs of the famine, would fill a volume.

"The vigorous administration of Lord Curzon, the generosity poured forth upon the hapless nation, and the single-hearted devotion of workers of all grades and stations have, under the blessing of God, alone prevented this grievous calamity from becoming an irreparable national disaster. Still, the mortality, aggravated by cholera, the wretchedness, desolation and misery which have had to be grappled with, are beyond the power of human language to describe. It is my duty to inform Christian contributors that

than now. The monsoon rains, although late, visited most of the parched tracts, and through erroneous perception of facts it might be concluded that the famine and its dreadful concomitants were past. It should be remembered that the tillers and their cattle have largely perished, and the sowing, wherever possible, must of necessity be sparse and imperfect; and even the very scant harvest expected is yet afar off. Meanwhile the hungry must be fed, and their long-drawn distress was never so keen as now. The multitudes of waifs of both sexes, plucked from perils deadlier than death, must be gathered in. In brief, to stay the hand of help now would be for it would falsify our pledges, nullify our efforts, and expose the imperilled and the sufferer in their sorest need. I hope to spend a few weeks in Britain upon this mission, and will feel grateful for an opportunity to personally state the case before those interested in its claims."

NOTES FROM WORKERS.

Rev. G. W. Blair (Irish Presbyterian Jungle Tribes' Mission) writes from Godhra, Panch Mals: "Rain has fallen in abundance. Much suffering still exists, and will for some time to come. We are feeding nearly 1,200 people daily in a number of villages."

Miss Soonderbai H. Powar writes from 2, Phayre Road, Poona, thanking our readers for financial help, and adds: "When the girls come from the famine district they are skeletons. It is a frightful sight. The cholera and plague are in Poona; every day many people are swept away."

Rev. Herbert B. Claxton (C.M.S. Boys' Orphanage and Industrial School, Clarkabad Christian village, Punjab) writes: "The sights I witnessed in Gujarat were appalling. No one could credit the suffering. I have been able to rescue 111 children, who will be trained in our Christian Homes. Four pounds per annum will support one child."

Lieut.-Col. Nurani, of the Salvation Army, writes: "Abundant rains have fallen in Gujarat and the Panch Mahals. Thousands of acres remain unploughed and uncultivated, because the owners wherewith to do it. We are doing our utmost to help the poor cultivators, and up to the month of August had given out 32,000 rupees in small advances for this purpose. This has enabled some thousands of persons to cultivate their fields. The rain has caused excessive suffering through cold and damp. Cholera and other sicknesses abound. A distribution of 1,000 garments to as many children, men and women during the last week revealed the awful need of clothing. A thousand of the poorest creatures who attend our free distribution of grain had been instructed to come, but the news spread like wildfire, and several thousands came. They were truly an army of tatters. The destitution and state of the poor women and girls was especially shocking. We are now feeding about 2,000 little children in their villages, and shall in all probability continue this form of help, also our cheap grain shops, close up to the time of the next harvest."

Dr. Colin Valentine, from Agra, who has lately arrived in England, writes: "Before leaving India I was enabled to form a committee of Christian gentlemen who would, systematically and on business lines, engage in and send them to orphanages in various parts of the country. I had communication with all the missions in Upper India on this subject, and could have found homes for 2,500 children. The undertaking will be worked on undenominational lines, and will employ a staff to collect the children, and have them sent to any mission willing to receive them. Rain has fallen in many parts of the country, but unfortunately it has not been general. Agra is outside the famine area, but yet there is great destitution, owing to the increased price of grain. Thousands of famine-stricken people pass through. The last Sabbath morning I was in Agra we had between 5,000 and 6,000 people at our Beggars' Church. We daily received famine children, whom we fed up with biscuits and Swiss milk. There will be a need for famine relief for many a long day."

London City Mission.—The annual report of the Welsh Auxiliary of the London City Mission records a year of interesting progress. The number of migrations from the Principality continues to increase, and hence additional workers could be engaged with advantage did the funds permit. A new hall has been added during the year.

A Word to Doubters.

By Rev. THEODORE L. CUYLER, D.D.

"COME and see." This terse reply of Philip to Nathanael is the true answer to be given to all those who are troubled with doubts and difficulties about Christianity, or about their own religious duty. The only satisfactory test of Christianity is the test of personal experience. The sceptical class—whether the scepticism be wilful or involuntary—is almost entirely composed of those who have never come to Jesus Christ in a reverent, docile spirit—never sought to be enlightened by Him, and never honestly tried to keep his commandments.

I feel perfectly sure that if the most outspoken infidels would spend even a few weeks in a patient trial of Christ's precepts for themselves, if they would ask the help He promises, and endeavour to put in practice his commandments, they would find their fogbank of infidelity all dissipated by exposure to the Sun of Righteousness. The vast majority of infidels have made no personal test of Jesus Christ in any way. David Hume confessed that he had never studied the New Testament, and knew little about Jesus Christ. If he had sincerely tested the efficacy of prayer for himself; if he had gone to Christ for light, and found none; if he had honestly obeyed Christ's precepts, and found himself none the better for the honest experiment — then Hume might with some show of reason pronounce prayer a mockery and Christianity a delusion.

Jesus Christ—both as a loving invitation and a fearless challenge—says to every one, "Come unto Me, and I will give you rest." Do those who actually go to Him, confessing their weakness, ignorance, and wants, come away without any sensible relief? Do those who pray aright find it a mockery, and do those who sincerely practice what Christ bids them find themselves none the better, purer, and happier for it? These are yes, and for every doubting and troubled soul—to face. Another man's doubt or denial amounts to nothing against my personal knowledge from actual experience. Those of us who have tried Jesus Christ for ourselves, as a redeemer, as a spiritual guide, as a friend, as a supporter and comforter, can fearlessly say to every unconverted person, "Come and see. Try our Saviour for yourself." We do not make any preposterous claims of perfection; but we do know that we are better men and women—stronger, cleaner, happier, and more unselfish and heavenly-minded—for even an imperfect following of Jesus Christ. We know whom we have believed, and of this actual experience no scoffer can outwit us, and no infidel can rob us.

Many a poverty-stricken Christian can say, "Come and see how much sunshine my religion pours into my plain, poorly-furnished home." Many a converted sensualist can say, "Come and see how much cleaner my life is since I gave my heart to Jesus." From tens of thousands of

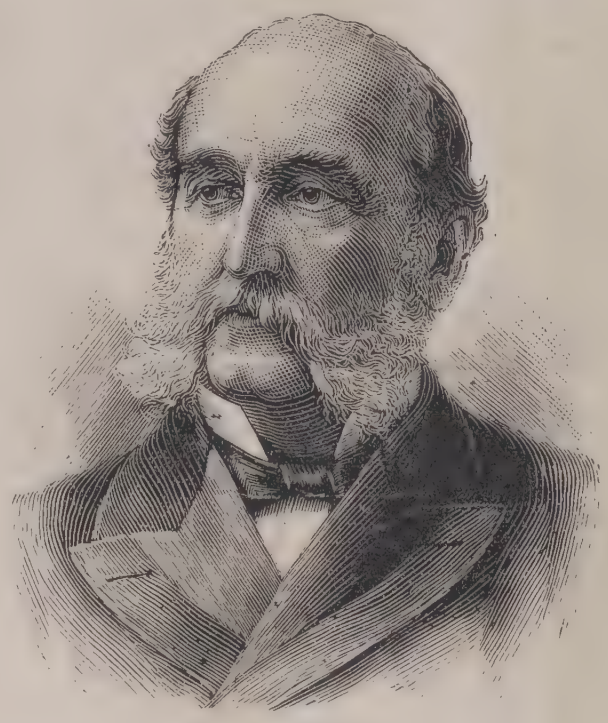
has gone out the triumphant testimony: "For me to live was Christ; for me to die is gain."

It is recorded of Sir Isaac Newton that once when Dr. Halley, the astronomer, vented some infidel opinions in his presence, Newton said to him: "Dr. Halley, I am always glad to hear you talk about astronomy or mathematics, for these subjects you have studied, but you should not talk of Christianity, which you have not studied. I have, and I am quite certain that you know nothing about the matter." When the great philosopher, Sir David Brewster, was dying, he said to Sir James Simpson: "I have had the light for many years, and oh, how bright it is! I feel so perfectly sure, so perfectly happy." Brewster was the prince of opticians in his day, and knew all about physical light. Is it to be supposed that he did not understand spiritual light from actual experience? He knew what truth was; do you suppose that a man of his discernment would pillow his dying head upon a lie? He had carried into religion the same inductive principles that he had applied to scientific investigation. He had come to Christ, and seen for himself.

"Come and see!" That is the short, simple, earnest, common-sense appeal which I make to every honest seeker after truth, every soul troubled with doubt or tormented with sense of sin and guilt. Come and look at my divine and adorable Saviour for yourselves. Study his words. Study his works. Study his life. Study his atoning death for you and me, and all other poor sinners. See what faith in Him has wrought for all who have tried Him. Ask Him to accept you; ask Him to guide you; ask Him humbly, "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" The first step toward Jesus Christ is the beginning of a new life; the last step will take you into heaven.



MR. IRA D. SANKEY.

Trade Unionists and Drink.—In dealing with the attitude of labour in regard to the liquor trade, a democratic contemporary makes a very practical suggestion that "the cream of the workers, as the trades unionists undoubtedly are," should refuse to meet in public-houses, "and thus cut off a considerable amount of the profit that at present goes to the brewer (one cannot say publicans, as most houses, in the Metropolis at least, are now tied) who records his thanks for working class support by constantly voting against all measures of social value when they come before Parliament." An even more potent method would be refuse to take the brewer's drink!

Mr. Sankey in London.

SACRED song appropriately occupied a prominent place in the proceedings at the metropolitan welcome to Mr. Ira D. Sankey, at Exeter Hall, on Thursday last. A remarkable degree of public interest was manifested in the veteran evangelist; not only was the

with an enthusiastic audience, but the lower hall was taxed to its utmost capacity by an overflow, while the Strand and the contiguous side streets were still blocked by a more or less compact mass of humanity seeking admission.

Sir George Williams presided at the meeting in the large hall; the platform was chiefly occupied by the London Evangelistic Choirs, inaugurated by Mr. Sankey in 1875, whose silver jubilee was also celebrated on the occasion. Rev. F. B. Meyer engaged in prayer. In some preliminary words Colonel Morton, president of the London Evangelistic Singers' Union, described the work of the organization in its effort to spread the Gospel by means of song, and alluded to the change which had come over the hymn singing of Christians in this country as a result of Mr. Sankey's visits. Colonel Morton went on to quote from several letters of regret, from Lord Kinnaird and other prominent workers who had been associated with the evangelistic tours of Messrs. Moody and Sankey. At a later stage, too, Colonel Morton read the following telegram from Rev. John McNeill:—"May you have a joyous meeting, an all-pervading sense of the nearness of the departed spirits of the mighty dead, and of Him whose praise has been for all these years

YOUR GLORIOUS THEME."

In his opening address, Sir George Williams gave a most hearty welcome to Mr. Sankey to England after all these years. They desired to express their sense of the benefits to religious work in this country which had accrued from the lessons taught by Mr. Sankey as to the place and power of singing in worship and in evangelistic work. Amid a scene of enthusiasm, the chairman shook hands with Mr. Sankey on behalf of the audience, welcomed him to London, and bade him God-speed in his work.

Mr. Sankey testified to the pleasure it gave him to return and find so many friends who remembered the days of old when they worked together in the Gospel, who are numbered with those who follow the Lamb, and who sing the

SWEET SONGS OF ZION.

Mr. Sankey, after remarking that he was glad to refute the story which had gained currency to the effect that he (Mr. Sankey) was dead, went on to say that he rejoiced in the many new Gospel songs which had become popular, but he had a personal love for the old ones, and would sing one which he had sung in that hall seventeen years ago:—"When the mists have rolled away." Mr. Sankey recalled the circumstances under which he first rendered the song. It was in the Free Trade Hall at Manchester, on a dark and cloudy wintry day. He did not know what to sing in order to help Mr. Moody and the people, but felt that God directed him to the song in question, although he had felt doubtful of its acceptance. Before he had finished, however, the rays of the sun had broken through the fog, filling the hall with light and rolling the mists away, while a sense of joy and gladness had fallen upon the great gathering.

Mr. Sankey now took his place at the harmonium, and sang the familiar words with wonderful clearness and freshness. The choirs had been asked to join in the chorus, but the entire audience caught up the strain with manifest feeling.

At the conclusion of the singing, Pastor Archibald G. Brown voiced the general sentiment in saying that they welcomed Mr

Sankey with gratitude for the holy and happy memories of bygone days. They could see the wonderful providence of God in bringing Mr. Moody and Mr. Sankey together. The two became blended until it almost seemed that "Moody and Sankey" was a double title for one person. The speaker made some fervent references to the revival scenes of 1875, and evoked feeling responses from all parts of the building as he cried, "Oh, that such days might come again!" What a spirit of prayer was then abroad, and how deeply sinners realized their lost condition! Mr. Brown had recently seen an announcement, which read: "This chapel has been very little alteration was needed." He feared that that might be applied in many places with regard to spiritual matters, for there is widespread coldness and conventionality, and we sigh for a tidal wave of revival.

Mr. Eugene Stock, who followed, after words of touching reference to bygone days, and especially to the great Moody and Sankey mission in the Agricultural Hall, said that he had heard all over the world the Gospel songs associated with the name of Mr. Sankey. He had listened to them, sung in the native tongue, among the Maoris in New Zealand, and among the Chinese immigrants in Australia. They were used throughout India, and he, the speaker, had heard even a congregation of Santhals—a race who were in India before the Hindus—singing "Man of Sorrows—what a Name!" and "The Great Physician now is near." In Rome itself, too, he had heard some of the King's guards, brought from darkness to light through the instrumentality of Cavaliere Capellini, singing these excellent "Songs and Solos."

During the evening many hopes had been expressed that Mr. Sankey would sing and there was a sense of satisfaction when, at the conclusion of Mr. Stock's address, Mr. Sankey sang the familiar and much-loved solo. The story of its origin was effectively told. Mr. Sankey pictured one of the great meetings in the Free Church Assembly Hall at Edinburgh, twenty-seven years ago, and the strong sense of Divine guidance which was upon him as, at an important moment in the meeting, he drew from his store of Gospel songs some striking words on "The Good Shepherd," which he had cut from a newspaper, and then, praying "God help me," "struck the key of A flat, not knowing what tune would come, and God gave it, note by note."

"THE NINETY AND NINE,"

As Mr. Sankey had to proceed to the overflow meeting, the benediction was pronounced, and this hearty and happy gathering came to a conclusion. As the vast assembly separated, the universal topic of conversation was the sustained health and vigour of Mr. Sankey, and the preservation of that spiritual and pathetic note which has been so widely owned of God in the exercise of the ministry of song.

AT HAMPSTEAD.

On Sunday last Mr. Sankey conducted morning and evening services at Trinity Presbyterian Church (Rev. J. Gillies, minister). The congregations were very large; indeed, the church and side buildings were full to overflowing before the services commenced, and hundreds failed to get into the place at all. A good many consoled themselves by listening outside under the open windows. In the morning Mr. Sankey gave an account of his visit to Egypt and Palestine, and especially of his reminiscences of Gethsemane and Calvary. Dr. Newman Hall led the congregation in prayer.

In his opening remarks, Mr. Sankey said he had come there because it was the church of his old friend, Mr. Hugh M. Matheson, who had been chairman of the London Committee in 1873, and on that account there was no place in England he would sooner visit. He had intended to come to London earlier this year and attend the Christian Endeavour Congress, but, after his beloved brother, D. L. Moody, passed away, he felt he ought to be at the Northfield Conferences as in former years. There would never, of course, be in our age another D. L. Moody, but his son, W. R. Moody, had caught many of his father's strong characteristics, and was carrying on much of his father's work very wisely.

In the evening Mr. Sankey gave his "Service of Sacred Song and Story." The solos and reminiscences of the esteemed evangelist were received with deep attention by the sympathetic congregation, many of whom would recall the Hampstead mission of Messrs. Moody and Sankey.

Our readers will be glad to know of Mr. Sankey's forthcoming engagements. September 20, 21 and 22, at 7 p.m., he devotes to Rev. Thos. Spurgeon at the Metropolitan Tabernacle reopening services. On Monday, the 24th, he goes to the Great Assembly Hall, Mile End Road, E. Wednesday, the 26th, he will be at New Court Chapel, Tollington Park (Rev. G. Campbell Morgan's); and on Oct. 1 he starts for the North of England, visiting Leeds, Wednesday, Oct. 3, and Sunderland, Sunday, Oct. 7, en route for Scotland.

SIR GEORGE WILLIAMS.

Letters to the Editor.

"The Fatherhood of God."

In reply to the question, What is the meaning of the term, "the Fatherhood of God"? I would remark as follows:—

There is a general sense in which the author of anything may be called its father; thus, "Adah bare Jabal. He was the father of such as dwell in tents and have cattle." "Jubal was the father of all such as handle the harp and organ." God is "the Father of mercies"—they come from his tender love.

If we act under the influence of some superior person, some powerful mind, such person may be called our Father. "Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father it is your will to do."

God, as Creator, being the source of the life of the race of mankind. To use the words of the Apostle Paul: "in Him we live, and move, and have our being." "We are all"—as such—"the offspring of God."

In these days it is of very great importance to hold the above truths in their integrity; yet also to keep clear the special Christian doctrine, as expressed in John i. 12, namely, "As many as received Him"—Christ—"to them gave He the right to become children of God, to them that believe on his name." This applies not to the above—the race of mankind—but to the persons now defined, who "are born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God."

Discrimination, and a balanced mind, are very needful on all such subjects. There are many truths that are diverse, yet not adverse, and which all fit in, as the stones in Solomon's temple, when they are adjusted into their right place, forming one perfect, beautiful building.

James Van Sommer.

[We have received several other letters on this subject, but they do not carry us substantially further than did Mr. Crewdson Wilson's compact Scriptural analysis in our last issue.—Ed.]

"A Plethora of Speakers."

Sir,—My heart goes out entirely with you in your protest against "A Plethora of Speakers" at our public meetings. I have long suffered silently, and protested strongly against the number of speakers invited to meetings, and I know what it is to spend several hours for just a very few minutes' speaking. The wear and tear of mind and body involved in such a wasteful service is a burden which public men ought not to be called upon to bear unnecessarily.

As organizer of public meetings—for I have my share of that also—I am sure we must be wiser, and minimize the resources which, on the whole, are so cheerfully placed at our disposal for the furtherance of Christian, temperance, and philanthropic work on all sides.—Yours faithfully,

A Worker.

"Christians and Railway Companies."

Dear Sir,—As you are aware, the Shareholders' Union urges stockholders in railways who are conscientious objectors to Sunday labour, to combine against it. The policy which they advocate is not to sell out, which would be only an evasion of high duty, but to follow the advice of the late Earl of Shaftesbury, who counselled perpetual remonstrance and memorializing. I therefore thank your correspondent, "A Small Shareholder," for the timely words, as I consider them, of the letter which appears in the last issue of The Christian.

To sell out would be a course only too welcome to our Sabbath-breaking opponents, because it would leave more power for evil in their hands. Christians have a right not only to the possession, but to the free advocacy of their convictions. They are bound to abide by these convictions at any cost. Impelled by courageous attachment to principle, at the risk of scorn, sneers, and outcries, we deliver our testimony, knowing that the Lord of the Sabbath honours confession of his name and attachment to his law. Results must be left to Him.

Of course, the objection is made that the dividends received by Christian shareholders consist, in part at least, of tainted money. True. But the difficulty alleged is comparatively easy of solution. One-seventh of the amount on the warrant can be set aside for purposes of agitation, by those who sincerely desire an altered state of things. Dividends to the amount of more than £21, have reached our treasury from this source since the year began; and we expect to receive more. Such a devotion of soiled gains seems not only lawful but expedient.

Proprietors of any railways who may be opposed to the Sunday goods' traffic, Sunday excursions, or the oppressive Sunday theatre train traffic, could not do better than write for instructions how to act. The undersigned would be pleased to correspond with all such at 7, King's Road, St. Leonards.—Very truly yours,

Jas. Fox Wilson,

Secretary of the Shareholders' Union for the Defence of the Sabbath.

Conference of Evangelists

A THIRD annual Conference of Evangelists took place on Monday last. They assembled at ten o'clock for prayer, and continued in conference through the usual noon meeting. The main subject was the consideration of the best methods of prosecuting the work of Evangelization.

Mr. R. C. Morgan presided, and opened with the remark that the answer to the question, "What shall I preach?" is, "Preach Christ." He briefly suggested the thoughts which are expounded in the article on Justification and Sanctification (p. 11).

Pastor Turner, of Sutton, followed with an anecdote of a visitor to three churches. In the morning the impression he received from the sermon was, "I am a great preacher;" in the afternoon, "We are a great church;" in the evening, "We have a great Lord." He then dwelt upon God's Gospel as being the Word of God, and all included in preaching Christ.

Mr. Wm. Green (Bickley) asked why so many backsliders? Are we sufficiently preaching Christ in his twofold relation, for us and in us—that "being reconciled we shall be kept safe in his life"? The Holy Spirit is in us from the moment of conversion, but the vessel must be cleansed and emptied that it may be filled. Converts must be cared for by nursing fathers and nursing mothers. Mr. Holness, referring to the chairman's remarks, observed that there was peculiar need now for preaching foundation truths.

Other brethren followed, urging that to preach Christ was the whole Gospel. But to preach Christ implied his life, death, resurrection, his finished work, and its results in those who believe.

Pastor Archibald G. Brown, at the noon meeting, gave a timely and much appreciated address on pleasing God (1 Jno. iii. 22). He referred to Enoch as a family man, who walked with God; to 1 Pet. ii. 19; Psa. lxix. 30, and other illustrative passages.

Mr. Rowland D. Edwards, about to leave for an extended evangelistic tour in the United States and Canada, was commended to God in prayer. Rev. David Baron spoke of sermons and revivals being not got up but coming down, and of Enoch's short sermon on the Lord's coming with myriads of his holy ones. His friend, Dr. Saphir, had summarized the Gospel thus: Christ all-necessary, all-sufficient, all-accessible.

At the afternoon session, Mr. M. H. Hodder presided. Prayer was offered by Mr. W. Holmes and Rev. Dr. Gritton, with special reference to those in China and India who are filling up, in a marked degree, that which is behind of the sufferings of Christ.

Rev. L. W. Munhall, D.D., gave a long and really magnificent oration concerning with many a pointed and witty sally in refutation of various forms of attack upon the Book. He illustrated the unique character of the Word of God, from literary, philosophical, poetical, scientific, biographical, historical, and ethical points of view. The harmony of the various writings of which the Bible consists, the finality of its teaching, the failure of all attempts to destroy it, and the marvellous office of Israel in its preservation, were also eloquently urged as irresistible arguments in favour of God's Word, The address gave much delight to all present.

The praises of Jesus were here voiced by Mr. W. S. Weeden, in a solo entitled "The Prince of Peacemakers."

Mr. W. R. Lane was thankful for the opening address. At first, he had thought it rather off the lines of the Conference, but it had proved to be the right thing for the occasion. He believed in opening up the Scriptures not only to believers, but to the unconverted. The ministry of the evangelist must go beyond mere appeals to the feelings. It is necessary to treat those who are dealt with in after-meetings as possessed of reason, understanding, and judgment, while we clearly show that faith is to be founded on the Word of God; otherwise we shall work the gravest possible moral damage. Persons rushed into public profession apart from real conversion, get into a state called backsliding, and are subsequently the hardest to deal with. This is often the cause of objections on the part of godly pastors of churches to evangelistic effort.

Getting men to immediate decision for Christ, was declared by Mr. Leonard Weaver to be the primary duty of the evangelist. We may bring the Word of God to bear upon a man when we feel that he has taken the first step in

SURRENDER TO JESUS CHRIST.

The harvest is ripe for immediate spiritual results; and, if we aim at them, God will not disappoint us.

Among those who took part in the subsequent discussion were Messrs. Van der Venter, Charles Cook, Walter Notman, David Haxton, Bewley Weaver, Ned Wright, and Monro Collings; Revs. G. Turner (of Sutton), Z. B. Woffendale, and John Wilson (Woolwich). Points emphasized by the various speakers were—the necessity of looking after converts; the impossibility of preaching Christ apart from what is written concerning Him; the need of dependence upon the Holy Spirit for influencing the people, while guarding them against the transient results of overwrought feelings; the equal usefulness of varying methods; the fact that grace does not supply the lack of natural qualifications for evangelizing; the value and capabilities of the open-air sphere; and the gathering effect upon outsiders of individual witness-bearing by church members and others.

Mr. F. W. Lawrence presided at the evening meeting. Earnest prayer occupied the opening moments; and then Mr. Henry Thorne spoke of the Divine wisdom which is needed in order to make us wise unto the winning of souls. Mr. Wm. Forbes urged that many evenings might well be utilized for open-air work, long after the season of the year at which such efforts usually cease. From Ezek. xliv., Mr. Ned Wright inferred that unless our service to the world flows out of devotion to God, He will appoint us to work of a very inferior kind. Mr. Edward Hurditch showed in order to spiritual power (Mark ix. 17, 18; Acts i. 8). Mr. William Benson, who has had an experience of fifty-two years in telling the story of the Cross, referred to the strength which comes through personal joy in God's salvation; and the varying necessities of different localities, in the way of Gospel methods, were illustrated from the experience of Pastor D. M. Cameron. Another speaker counselled the recognition of sanctified common sense as compatible with Holy Ghost power. Mr. Hodder closed the day's very profitable proceedings with prayer.

Neukirchen.—The Autumn Conference was held in the Assembly Hall of the Orphanage and Mission Institute, Neukirchen, Kr. Moers, Rhenish Prussia, last week. The proceedings were spread over three days—Tuesday to Thursday, inclusive. There was a large attendance of Christians from the entire neighbourhood, also a number of ministers and other workers, some from a considerable distance. Spiritual quickening and deepened experience in Divine things are the primary aims of these gatherings; and there is abundant ground for confidence that the meetings this year resulted in definite work for God.

Bulgaria.—Writing from the Medical Mission at Philippopolis, Madame Tonjoroff says: "The suffering poor of six nationalities come to me with their sick. You have no idea what a difference there is in the Jews and Turks since they came to our Medical Mission, but we do not see conversions among them as we do among the Bulgarians, Greeks, and Armenians. Through the blessing of God hundreds have been led to Christ in our Medical Mission. The prison work has been much blessed, and many have returned to their homes and towns to tell what God has done for them while in prison. My husband is travelling in connection with the Sunday School Union, working for and organizing Sunday schools." Madame Tonjoroff may be addressed at the Medical Mission, Philippopolis, Bulgaria.

Massacre of Missionaries in China.

THE Secretary of the Baptist Missionary Society (Mr. A. H. Baynes) has received the following communication from Rev. R. C. Forsyth, of Shantung:—

"Reliable educated native has brought news from Shan-si. Pigott party arrested Sheo-yang; driven on foot in chains to Tai-yuen-fu. Shared fate (of) other missionaries. Mission houses Tai-yuen-fu burned, except Farthing's. Missionaries fled there (on the) 29th (June), escorted (to) Yamen (on the) 9th July; promised safety; immediately massacred.

"Altogether thirty-three Protestants: Pigotts (three), Duval, Robinson, Altwaters (two), Stokes (two), Simpsons (two), Lovetts (three), Coombs, Benyon (four), Wilson (three), Farthings (five), Whitehouse (two), and four others. Hoddle, Underwood, Stewart have not been mentioned. Also ten Catholic priests; others not known. Probable total, fifty-one foreigners, besides many natives.

"Hsin-Chow: Six persons escaped (to the) mountains (on) horseback—probably Dixons (two), McCurrachs (two), Renaut, Ennals; fate unknown."

Soldiers at Lucknow.

WRITING from Lucknow, Mrs. W. D. Frater says:—"We returned here about two and a-half years since, after furlough in England, and found in this large cantonment no suitable place outside the barracks where the soldiers could spend their evenings. Wishful to influence for good, and help the soldiers in their leisure time, we decided to give up two rooms in our bungalow, and make a bright, happy home for as many men as would come.

"We were soon crowded out, and decided on taking a bungalow, which we did. This also quickly proved too small. We then approached the General Commanding for a site on which to build a Home. He listened with great interest to our scheme, and granted one of the best sites for the purpose in cantonments. The Home has been in use, though not formally opened, for three months, and during this great heat is proving an untold boon to the men. The rooms (which are large and commodious) are crowded night after night, showing beyond a doubt how highly the Home is appreciated."

An effort is being made in behalf of the building fund. Further particulars may be obtained from Rev. W. Dyson Frater, Wesleyan Mission House, Bishopsgate Street (Within), London, E.C.

Autumnal Days.

Leaves are falling, leaves are flying,
Leaves are drifting through the air;
Hearts for sunny gleams are sighing,
And for summer days so fair.

Fondly is my memory dwelling
On the joys my heart hath known;
While these autumn tints are telling
Winter soon will claim his own.

Yet while Nature's face is beaming,
With a faint and saddened smile,
Rise incessant, thro' my dreaming,
Whispers that my heart beguile.

"Look not backward! Lo, before thee,
Brighter days are yet in store;
For the foliage, fading o'er thee,
God's own hand will yet restore."

Life is ofttimes what we make it—
Trusting in our Father's care;
Blessing comes to those who take it;
God is present everywhere!

Friends are falling, friends are dying,
For the end must all prepare,
Satan and his hosts defying,
Christ's redemption all may share!

We are his who hath appointed
Summer, autumn, winter, spring;
Be our inmost hearts anointed,
Of our lives to crown Him King!

Antwerp Sailors' Rest.—Under the direction of Miss Mary Smith and Miss Hanna Baetzmann, the Sailors' Rest at Antwerp continues its useful and much needed work. The institution is open for seamen of all nations, but is chiefly visited by English and Scandinavians. An annual report is issued by Miss Smith for English friends, and one in Norwegian by Miss Baetzmann.

Prison Work in America.

ON a recent Sunday, Mrs. Ballington Booth, wife of General Ballington Booth, and co-leader with him of the Volunteers of America, conducted a field day at Asbury Park, New Jersey, a fashionable seaside resort, about half-way between New York and Philadelphia, both of which cities contribute large numbers of visitors. The services were held in a large structure called the Auditorium. The day was intensely hot, but the morning congregation, of over a thousand people, not only sat through a deep solid discourse, but at its close added forty more annual subscribing members to the Defenders' League of the Volunteers, for the support of the general work.

But Mrs. Booth's great field of labour is in the prisons of the country, and after the meeting she gave me, in an interview, some interesting facts concerning it. Her organization is called the

and has a membership of over 8,000 in the eleven penal establishments where branches have been inaugurated—Sing Sing, Auburn, and Clinton, New York State; Trenton, New Jersey; Charlestown, Massachusetts; Joliet, Illinois; Columbus, Ohio; Cañon City, Colorado; Baltimore, Maryland; and Folsom and San Quentin, California.

The members of the League pledge themselves (1) to obey the prison regulations faithfully; (2) to refrain from evil language and crooked practices in the prison; (3) to live upright lives among their companions, seeking to influence them for good as far as the prison rules will allow; and (4) to read the Scripture passages for the day from their "Day-book" ("Daily Light"), and to pray every morning and night. The League has both Protestants and Roman Catholics among its members, and even Jews; and when the time comes that any prisoner requires a home (on his release) he need not even be a member of the League. One great encouragement lies in the attitude of prison officials, who, although once sceptical as to the possibility of success for Mrs. Booth's work, have been so pleased with the visible and tangible results that now they afford her every possible facility, some of them even having gone so far as to join the League.

During the last six weeks Mrs. Booth has addressed twenty-six Chautauqua gatherings in Western States (at one of which 15,000 persons were present) in seven different States; and at every one of them she made her hearers not only know but feel a good many new things about prisons and prisoners. She has already fifty lecture engagements made for the winter, up to next March. Her lecture manager is anxious to arrange a tour for her through Great Britain for the winter 1901-2.

Soldiers' Christian Association.

THE Soldiers' Christian Association is continuing its work among the troops in South Africa with much profit to the men, socially and spiritually. It has tents at present with the camps at Bloemfontein (2), Kroonstad, Pretoria, Durban, and Ingagane. Iron buildings are in use at Pietermaritzburg and the Woodstock Military Camp, while efforts are being made to get a third erected at Pretoria. Mr. W. Gordon Sprigg, general secretary of the Y.M.C.A. at Cape Town, who has travelled the entire field of operations, writes:—"The Council has every reason to thank God in view of the abundant blessing and marked success which have attended their labours during the war, and for the extent to which the work of the Association has won the hearts of both officers and men. That the organization is recognized is the outcome of sheer hard work—work willingly rendered by a band of devoted men, who have made it their one aim, during the past eight or nine months, to rest satisfied with nothing short of the salvation of their fellows."

IN a letter describing her work in the interest of the children of missionaries and others, Miss Orlebar, of Coonoor, India, writes: "The school was opened about a year and three months ago. Almost all over India, the education of European children is in the hands of the nuns or sisters of the Romish Church. I was often told by Protestant parents that they were obliged to send their children to the Convent School, as that was the only place where they could have a good education. I never thought for a moment that we were to meet this deep need. At first our only idea was to have a small bungalow close to our Homes of Rest, in which we could have a little school for a few hours in the morning, in order that the sick and tired parents might be able to have a complete rest, by being freed from the care of their children; but the

WORK HAS GROWN AND DEVELOPED GREATLY.

"The climate of Coonoor is most healthy, very cool and very dry. The house stands on the side of a mountain surrounded by a tea estate, and the grounds are very extensive. The children are all well and happy; I never am in their midst without rejoicing over the tone which pervades the whole school. For months past we have been looking in all directions for more teachers, but none have come forward to help us. Now we have come to my point, and it is this, that unless we have immediate help, we shall have to give up the school.

"We need a music teacher, a kindergarten teacher, and also one who can teach advanced subjects. We also need some one who can 'mother' the school, conjointly with Mrs. Bird, a lady of mature age, whom she can leave in charge when she is absent on missionary journeys with her husband. The teachers have no salaries, but are as at present the school is not self-supporting, though we are expecting it very soon will be. I should be deeply sorry for the school to have to be given up; it would seem to be such a reproach upon those who hold evangelical views that, while there is no lack of nuns and and sisters who will give their lives to this work, no earnest, devoted Protestant ladies can be found who will volunteer their help."

Miss Orlebar adds that communications should be addressed to Mrs. Bird, Brooklands, Coonoor, South India.

A French Orphanage.

SOME years since, I visited Barnave, when Madame Marzials, widow of Pasteur Marzials, was in much trouble, the orphan work there in debt, and all was under a cloud. At the same time I saw her true desire for the children's highest good, and her great affection for them. We had much conversation together, and at that time I did not see how to help, nor what would be wise to do. Since then God has taught her very deeply, in her own soul, has brought her out of all her difficulties, and has compassed her and her work about with "songs of deliverance."

Madame Marzials has now, at Die, in the Drôme, an agricultural school for orphans and poor abandoned children, which is managed on the most economical scale, and almost pays its way with the help of many small gifts obtained in France. She has also a school for training servants in the same place; they are taught what is necessary to suit them for domestic employment. God is blessing them, and if any of his children would help just now in a small way, it would be truly a work for the Master. At this juncture a little is required to carry on the work and keep out of debt.

At the Y.W.C.A., 26, George Street, Hanover Square, the names have been received of ten or twelve of Madame Marzials' young girls, placed in England. Quite lately I saw a beautiful letter from one of them (and one who had been a great trouble, born with bad tendencies), telling of her deep conviction of sin through Madame Marzials' words, and then of her rejoicing in a Saviour's love. Many have thus been blessed, and one can truly thank God for real spiritual work among them; and their love for Madame Marzials is very touching.

Vice-President (Great Britain) of the International Union of the Friends of Young Women.

Dr. Baedeker's Travels.

HAVING just come home from a three months' journey in the neglected portions of Eastern Europe, I feel myself a debtor to many friends who have by their prayers and sympathy paved the way for me, and I am very grateful to them. Leaving England on June 8, I travelled almost direct to Budapest, and thence to Croatia, where in a far distant place a conference of Christians of various nationalities had been arranged. Several pastors and evangelists assembled; Hungarian, Slavonian, Slovaks, Croatian, and Germans (some of whom had had to travel many miles), gave expression to their oneness in Christ, however different and defective their degree of light might be. After the opening service of a newly-erected hall, we assembled in the primeval oak forest, and it was a refreshing time to all, the one centre of union being Jesus Christ and Him crucified.

In Hungary and other parts of the Austrian dominion there are large fields which seem to be desolate for lack of the Gospel. The few pastors who occupy enormous districts are very far apart, whilst Roman Catholics put in their assumptive claims everywhere, leaving the people in utter ignorance. The cry, "los von Rom," is spreading through Austria, yet there are few who will show practical sympathy by holding out their rescuing hands.

It is a joy to communicate the glad tidings to people who have not known it. Giving a New Testament to a fellow-traveller often opens the way to most interesting conversation, and the precious seed thus sown may be fruitful and be found in the time of harvest.

After a happy time in the province of Carinthia, and a conference at Schloss Treffen, where the Gospel was heard from many of God's servants, I returned to Vienna, and had the privilege of joining in the opening of a new Gospel hall in the very heart of the city of Vienna, for the Czechs who come into Vienna in large numbers, and very many of whom come out from Roman bondage into the liberty of the Gospel.

I found the annual Conference at Blankenburg more numerously attended than ever before, maintaining its character as international and interdenominational.

Although Miss von Weling was no longer there to welcome the many guests, yet they came from north, south, east, and west. Russians, Swedes, Dutch, English, and Germans, Lutherans, Calvinists, Baptists, Methodists, and others had come apart for a while, and they were blessed. The separation by countries and nationalities has no real weight where hearts are united in the one Lord, and seek his glory and kingdom.

The Cotelingam Brothers.

THESE workers have lately held several meetings in Paris. They took part in the Christian Endeavour meeting at the American Union Church (Rev. Dr. Thurber's), and in the evening sang at the service in the Wesleyan Methodist Church, where there was a crowded congregation to hear Rev. Dr. Talmage. In the same church, on the following evening, a well-attended meeting was held, under the auspices of the Anglo-American Y.M.C.A., the chair being occupied by its president, Mr. H. H. Skepper. With vocal and instrumental music, and an address on the need and possibilities of Christianity in India, they deeply interested all present. They also had a meeting at the French Y.M.C.A. Their personality and their mission have gained for them many friends and well-wishers in Paris. H. D. B Pen Pictures from Afar.

THE ARMY CHAPLAIN.

MANY of my young friends, I am sure, have followed the fortunes of the Transvaal war with deep but painful interest. Map in hand you have traced the march of Her Majesty's troops from city to city till they entered Pretoria. Some of you have your favourite general or colonel—Lord Roberts, Sir George White, or General Baden-Powell. Some boys—and girls too—I have found wearing small medallion portraits of their special heroes.

You will have heard, I daresay, that the soldiers at the front are not deprived of religious services when in the field, or are without the consolations of religion when in hospital or in their dying moments. I thought, therefore, you would like to have some vivid pictures of the Christian minister who accompanies an army when actively engaged in his work of love and mercy.

He is called, as you know, an Army Chaplain, and he has to share with the officers and men the hard times, and endure the exhausting marches and severe privations which war always renders inevitable. There are no fixed hours for public worship as at home, and no churches or chapels in which to assemble, of course. But the minister of Christ has a very busy and laborious time. At any moment he may be summoned to pray with a dying man, or to speak some word of comfort to a wounded comrade in a very agony of pain.

Many are the open-air services conducted at times found to be suitable. Meetings for prayer are held, frequently before a battle begins. Men who do not pray much in ordinary circumstances willingly attend a prayer meeting when the bullet of an enemy may wound or kill them in the next encounter. Opportunities are often found for conversation upon the soul's needs, the urgency of salvation, the power of faith, and the inspiration of love for Christ. Untold blessings have resulted from hurried words of warning or advice. I think you see that the Chaplain is a real Ambassador for Christ, and is in position to help many into the way of God, who would not perhaps listen to him under different conditions.

Now look at this picture: At seven p.m. is held an open-air service. We sang several hymns, and prayed, and spoke to the men, who listened most attentively. At the close of the hymn one of the men said, "Can we sing 'Love Divine, all love excelling?'" and as soon as the hymn was started they sang most heartily. After the Benediction was pronounced one said, "I have a wife and four children in England who are praying for me." Another remarked, "My aged mother is praying for me, but you don't know what a lot I have to put up with from my godless companions: will come to the meeting again to-morrow night, sir."

This is another: Had a grand time in singing with the men until the sounding of "First Post." Then I went round from tent to tent and distributed literature. I was in the last tent of all when "Lights out" sounded, and at once rose to go, when one of the lads said, "Don't go, sir." I replied, "But I shall get you into trouble, for lights must be put out." "Never mind," said he, "we can talk in the dark;" and so we did, and the Lord blessed us, and I came away with a hearty "Good night lads, God bless you," feeling that I had been able to score one.

Here is a third: Rose with the troops at one o'clock a.m., entrained, and made a reconnaissance in force. Held service at Sterkstroom in the marquee at 6.30 p.m., when Sergeant-Major X. gave a most impressive address. He is a valuable worker, a man of God, an excellent speaker, and much respected by his comrades.

The next is this: Received the following order from the head-quarters staff to-day: "No. —— died in hospital at Sterkstroom on the 24th instant of enteric fever. The funeral will take place to-day, arriving at the cemetery at about five p.m." I officiated at the grave at the time specified, and in torrents of rain. Our men were all soaked through. The band of the 1st Royal Scots was in attendance, and played to and from the cemetery, and a firing party of the Royal Engineers fired the usual three volleys over the grave.

This is the last: Received eight boxes from the ladies of Lady-Frere for our sick lads. The boxes contained apples, peaches, grapes, butter, eggs, books, magazines, and a splendid lot of illustrated papers. I wish you could have seen the expression of thankfulness upon the faces of the sufferers in our hospital as I went from bed to bed distributing the goodies.

These pen-pictures will help you to understand the lights and shades of war. They will give you, too, some idea of what a good Army Chaplain can do while he proves himself a true friend and pastor to the soldier. May the war soon come to an end, and righteousness and peace be established!

WE have some very funny children here, and yet in many ways very like some of you. One raw specimen of an Anglo-Indian youth, who generally comes to school with a weather-beaten collar, and stockings picturesquely ventilated, wanted to know if the language was difficult in London. I must tell you that this young hopeful is not the brightest specimen of our training. The other day, at Scripture class, he was repeating the books of the Bible, and after "Joshua," "Judges," "Ruth," he went on, with closed eyes saying, "David," "Jonathan"—and I just stopped him in time to prevent the whole class from laughing at him.

There is one other youngster I want to tell you about, quite after your own hearts. A rajah's son (a "rajah" in India is a native prince or king), as fit as any young Britisher, to the front in everything, even in our rambles over the mountains. And I hope I shall not suggest similar deeds of wickedness to your minds when I tell you that in school hours he sometimes brings live snakes out of his pockets, and passed me a match-box the other day with a live insect in it. I am afraid I shall have to exercise more judicious severity on these occasions, and march this young man up to the desk of the head-mistress, where both rebukes and prizes are delivered in turns.

And now you will accuse me of favouritism, if I do not tell you a little about the girls. Once a week, in my own little room, I invite the girls to what I call

A "NUGGET TEA."

Mountain ferns and beautiful wild flowers decorate the walls, and in the middle of the floor tea is spread—the cups are all turned down, and under one of them is to be found a tiny gift with a text attached to it. The excitement is great, as the girls walk round three times before they decide which cup they shall squat in front of. Last week the "nugget" fell to the lot of the best girl in the school, the daughter of missionaries, who with her knowledge of the Marathi language, helps to teach the poor natives, who come here every week for an address. In her own simple way she tells them "God has made a beautiful heaven for all who give their hearts to Him, and when they die, if they trust Him, He will make them happy in his love for ever, and take them to that land where they will renew their youth, and will never grow thin or frail any more." I must tell you that these poor people are all suffering from the effects of plague and famine, and we supply each with a small quantity of rice before they leave.

I must add a word about the grown-up people, too; there are not many of us here, but we occasionally have visits from other missionaries who come out to this beautiful mountainous district for a little rest. I shall soon be running away and leaving them, to begin my real native work amongst the poor women who are shut up in the Zenanas, and about whom you have heard so much already.

TARES IN YOUR FIELD (Matt. xiii. 24-30, 36-43).

HOW clearly our Lord teaches the personality of Satan! In his explanation of the parable, He says distinctly, "The enemy that sowed them is the devil." He knew that in every heart, in every church, and throughout the world, the great enemy of God's kingdom, and of human happiness, is always at work, sowing tares. The similitude of tare-sowing is very striking. Because the seed is so small, because in a single night such irreparable injury may be wrought, because the evil may not appear at once, but may lie germinating through long months in secret to break out into manifestation, just when the husbandman's hopes were ripe—for all these reasons, among others, there is a marvellous aptness in this comparison.

We ought to guard against tiny thoughts of evil, which glance on our mind. We may be aware that they have come, evil suggestions, looks, desires; and without resisting them, or hating them, without confessing them and seeking the cleansing of the Saviour's blood, we may simply forget them. But they may lie in the soil of our heart, waiting for a suitable combination of conditions, and suddenly, when we least expect, they will leap on us full armed, and carry us away into some sin of presumption and self-will that will leave a scar behind. So often I have noticed that a strong temptation is connected with some slight evil thought that glanced to the heart days before, which had not been resented and confessed, but had been for a moment, at least, permitted and entertained.

It is noticeable, also, that you become what the seed is which you receive. "The good seed—these are the children of the Kingdom. The tares—these are the children of the evil one"—or of evil. Such are the processes by which our characters are being made. Those who receive the wheat-seed become wheat; those who receive the tare-seed become tares. "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he." How careful we should be, then, over the books we read, the recreations we take part in, the companionships we form. If we are thoughtless and careless we may expose ourselves to so much tare-seed, which will make our character tare. Of course, if our necessary duties carry us into scenes where evil is being cast abroad by handfuls, we may claim the keeping power of Jesus, and hide in Him. As we may saturate our clothes with disinfectants when duty calls us into a house where plague or fever is rife, so the Holy Spirit, in whom we may bathe our souls, will be as the antiseptic, which will deliver us from the microbes of temptation which are everywhere. (See Gal. v. 16, 17, R.V.)

In this age God leaves the wheat and tares to grow together. There is not much difference, it is said, between the two, in the earlier stages of growth; it is only when harvest comes that the distinction between them is clearly defined. So the church and the world are full of counterfeits, of people that seem all they should be, that go in and out amongst God's people, are accepted as among the very elect; but they are not what they seem, and in the day of reckoning the angels will root them out of the kingdom of God, and cast them forth as rubbish. Please notice the two classes of people which will be rejected at last. "Those that cause stumbling, and them that do iniquity" (41, R.V.). It may be that you are not yet amongst them that do iniquity in any of its more glaring shapes, but by your inconsistency, your want of earnest devotion to Christ, your worldliness, you cause others to stumble. This indicates the tare-nature.

There are only these two classes, wheat and tares, the children of the kingdom and those of the evil one, the righteous who shall shine forth as the sun in the Heavenly Father's kingdom, and the wicked who shall be cast on the rubbish heap. Let each one of us examine himself, that we be in the faith, opening the heart to receive from the hand of Jesus the incorruptible seed (1 Pet. i. 23). F. B. M.

C.E. NOTES.

The official report of the World's Convention, "Advance Endeavour," will be published within a week or two, price half-a-crown, with fivepence extra for postage. Orders should be given at once to avoid disappointment. The volume is bound in cloth, with many photographs and illustrations, and will form a really worthy souvenir.

The Irish Methodist Christian Endeavour Societies entirely support Rev. R. Booth, M.D., as a missionary at Hankow. That he is a worthy representative may be seen from the fact that his mother said, "She had written to Robert to stick to his post, for, much as she loved him, she could not think of his leaving the poor native Christians." The English Presbyterian Societies support Rev. David Sutherland, also a missionary in connection with their church.

International S.S. Lesson.

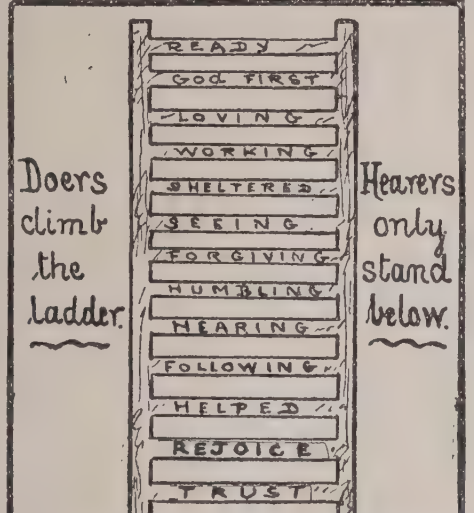
September 30, 1900.

REVIEW.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"Be ye doers of the Word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves."—James i. 22.

INTRODUCTION.

EACH of the lessons this quarter will teach us something God would have us do. We must learn first, and then carry out in our lives what we have learnt.



Key to Blackboard Plan.—A ladder is made to climb; so this ladder on our diagram is for each one of us to climb, a step at a time. We are not to stand below, just give it a glance, perhaps admire it, and then walk away, but, with a firm hold, let us put our feet on the rungs, one by one, till, by God's help, we reach the top.

1. TRUST.

Christ walking on the sea, calling us to come, to trust Him entirely, to put our hand into his and so be saved (Acts xvi. 31).

2. REJOICE.

This naturally follows, for if we have been saved by Christ, we shall certainly rejoice in Him; the two things go together. When Zaccheus trusted and obeyed Christ he was "joyful." The young ruler who acted otherwise, "went away sorrowful."

3. HELPED.

"Lord, help me," was the cry of the Gentile woman, and the help was given. So will it be with us. We all need help, for John xv. 5 shows us our helplessness; but, thank God, Christ is always ready to help and strengthen our weakness

4. FOLLOWING.

Not wandering away on by-paths of our own, but doing what Jesus said we must do, viz.: "Follow Me." With the following will come denial of self, taking up the cross—often going in an opposite direction from what we would choose; but let us climb this step and follow Him closely (Luke xxii. 54).

5. HEARING.

So many go along without listening for the Master's voice, and consequently they do not hear it. To hear that "still small voice" we must be calm and quiet, free from all bustle, hurry, and noise. We must enter in . . . and shut the door. Real prayer, to hear God, is what is wanted to-day (Matt. vi. 6; Hab. ii. 1). Let us not lose the music of heaven by never "coming apart" to hear what He shall say.

6. HUMBLING.

A need for all characters, the lesson of humility, of being made humble as the little child. Pride of dress, position, work, &c., must all go (Prov. xv. 33).

7. FORGIVING.

Forgiving as we would be forgiven, without counting; go on forgiving. This lesson does not come to an end till we reach heaven (Matt. vi. 12, "as").

8. SEEING.

Much like believing, and yet it is more. To believe is just to trust at first; to see is to go deeper. It is to know the character and love of God; it is to realize the great redemption story more fully; it is to look down into the Word of God, below the surface (Psa. cxix. 18).

9. SHELTERED.

How happy are those sheltered sheep with the Shepherd's care ever over them and around them! The walls of the fold protect safely. The Shepherd leads, guides, calls, knows every single sheep. Are you one of his sheep? (John x. 4).

10. WORKING.

All can do something for God's cause, some a little, some more. All can be faithful in their work. The rewards are great. Names written in the Lamb's Book of Life is worth gaining. So is the promised joy to all who work from right motives (Luke x. 17).

11. LOVING.

There are two divisions for love. The first is love to God; the second is love to neighbour. The first will be followed by the second; and in this lesson we see very clearly how to love our neighbour, by being unselfishly kind to him (Lev. xix. 18).

12. GOD FIRST.

This ever grows in the Christian's life. It is more and more putting God first in everything; the more we know of God, and understand his great love (Matt. xxii. 37, 38). The rich fool in the portion for to-day did exactly the opposite.

13. READY.

All leads up to this point. If we can climb the steps of the ladder, we shall then be ready when God calls us into his presence (Mark xiii. 35-37).

Motherless Children.—The applications for admission to the Homes for Motherless Children, Chiswick, exceed the accommodation. Among those who have recently made application are a boatman whose wife had drowned herself, leaving him with two little boys, and a stone-mason, whose wife died leaving five children. The Homes fulfil a useful purpose in taking charge of the little ones, and thus setting the fathers free to work for their support. The founder and superintendent is Mr. R. T. Smith, 90, Thornton Avenue, Chiswick.

Tasmania's Orphans.—An institution of much promise and usefulness in Tasmania is the Infant Orphanage at Claremont. The initiation of the movement a few years ago was attended with numerous difficulties. These were encountered in a spirit of earnest and constant prayer, which has been observed throughout. The support which has been accorded the Home has encouraged the promoters in their efforts to provide a much-needed institution, and from its inception the work has been signally prosperous. Particulars may be obtained from the matron, Mrs. Fagg, Alva Lodge, Claremont, Tasmania.

Trade Union Congress and Increased Education.—A speaker at the recent meeting of the Trades Union Congress pertinently inquired how it could be possible to take advantage of the increased educational facilities if the children had to go to work at twelve or thirteen years of age, and it is not surprising to find that the Congress afterwards passed a resolution in favour of raising the age standand and of the abolition of the employment of children under the age of fifteen. A delegate from Belfast had seen "little children of eight, nine, and ten years of age, going to work on cold winter mornings in their clothes still saturated with the steam of the previous day's toil. In many textile districts it was the fact that many children died before they were taught to live."

National Good Templar Celebration.

THE thirty-second National Anniversary of English Good Templars has just been celebrated at Exeter, all the local temperance bodies and Churches joining in the arrangements, which included a Saturday afternoon procession of 1,000 Band of Hope and Juvenile Templar children to Castle Hill; and an evening reception given in Franklin Hall, by Mr. W. H. Reed, J.P.; four Gospel Temperance Services on the Sunday, in the Theatre, which was crowded to excess; a Session of the Grand Lodge of England on Monday, and a great demonstration at night, in the Royal Public Rooms, Rev. Charles Rhodes, District Chief Templar, presiding.

The speakers included Councillor Malins (Birmingham), Councillor Vorley (Leicester), Councillor Hopkins (Gloucester), and Rev. D. F. Roberts, district secretary—the Exeter Temperance Choir also rendering service at each meeting.

It was reported that about 2,000 branches were meeting weekly in England (exclusive of 100 English naval and military lodges), with a membership of about 105,000; and arrangements were completed for a great autumn and winter campaign for the instituting of some hundreds of additional branches.

The Y.M.C.A.

AT no period of its fifty years' existence has the Association in Ireland better equipped for carrying on its distinctive work. The buildings in Upper Sackville Street, Dublin, have, during the year, been relieved of debt, and the purchase of the Donegal building has been completed. According to the annual report the Association is now represented in seventy-seven different points in Ireland, and its property has increased in value by over £3,000. The foreign missionary department is widely developing, and many outlying districts are brought within the ever-extending sphere of this useful section. With the object of creating and fostering a deeper and more definite interest in mission efforts, foreign missionary auxiliaries have been formed at eleven centres.

"Seek ye First the Kingdom of God."

Is there no room for Jesus?
Not a place in your heart for Him?
Are the earth lights so dazzling,
That the light of his face seems dim?

Are the earth songs so joyous,
That you hear not the Saviour's voice
Bidding his wayward children
In his wonderful love rejoice?

Sunbeams, and flowers, and music,
Find a place in your heart to fill—
Pleasures the world can give you,
That yield to the sway of your will.

There is a joyous welcome
For the friends of a passing day—
Room for their lives to enter,
And a place where their love may stay.

Is there no room for Jesus?
Not a place for the King of kings—
Not a desire for shelter
In the shade of his outstretched wings?

There will be days of shadow
As you pass through the changeful years—
Days when the summer glory
Will be veiled in a mist of tears—

Days when the flowers you cherish,
In the dust at your feet shall lie—
Days when your heart will hunger
For the love of the days gone by.

Will you not need the presence
Of the Friend who is always true?
Shall not the heart of Jesus
Be a haven of rest for you?

He is the same for ever:
Though the years may their changes bring,
There is eternal safety
In the love of our Saviour King.

Southborough. EDITH HICKMAN DIVALL.

South Arcot Mission, India.—Miss Clara M. S. Lowe writes:—"Miss Reade is about to return to her much-loved work, and as my failing sight and memory render me unable to offer the least assistance as formerly in keeping accounts, Miss Bazett (29, Argyle Road, Ealing), has kindly consented to give information about the Mission." Donations may be addressed to her or sent as usual through this office.

The Churches.

 The Editor will be glad to receive "post-card" notes for this page, of* SPIRITUAL PROGRESS AND EFFORT in the Churches. They must be prompt, reliable, and NOT TRIVIALITIES; and be accompanied by sender's name and address.

Church of England.

The living of St. Andrew's, Bordesley, Birmingham, has at length been filled up. Rev. J. H. Richards, who has been for the last three years organizing secretary of the C.E.T.S., has been appointed in succession to Rev. Dr. Burrow.

Speaking last week at Liverpool on behalf of Ragged School work, Bishop Chavasse said the best wealth the nation could have was not in silver and gold, but in its men and women. Those waifs must be shielded with all possible care from the awful surroundings in which they lived, and they would be trained to become servants of Christ, true citizens, who would serve the country in the time of need, standard bearers for Christ, handing down the pure and holy truths for which their forefathers had shed their blood.

At the Carlisle Diocesan Conference, Rev. H. Lonsdale, Upperby, said the question of church attendance in Carlisle was serious. There were places in the city for 6,600 worshippers, but not half of that number were present at either the morning or the evening service on any Sunday. He believed that the want of attendance in churches on Sundays was due to the loosening of definite religious feeling among their people. Mr. J. Swainson, Kendal, urged that the churches should be made free, and the poor welcomed as much as the rich. It was important that the congregations should join in the singing in the churches. Many working men and women often could not understand or take part in the services.

Congregational.

Rev. W. C. Chisholm, who has held the pastorate of the English Congregational Church at Hamburg for the past four years, will on medical advice terminate his ministry at the end of December and return to England, where he hopes to undertake pastoral duties.

The churches at Ravenna Road and Oxford Road, Putney, have amalgamated under the joint pastorate of Rev. Norman Rowland, M.A., son of Rev. Alfred Rowland, ex-chairman of the Congregational Union. Rev. Dr. Bedford is retiring, after ministerial service of nearly half a century.

The safe arrival at Capetown of Rev. J. Reginald Truscott, formerly of Harley College, is reported in letters received at the Memorial Hall. Mr. Truscott left for Kimberley, where he preached for Rev. W. H. Richards. Special permission being granted by the military authorities, he left for Bulawayo en route for Gwelo, which he was expected to reach in time to take up his work on Sunday last for the Colonial Missionary Society.

A reception has been given at Wood Street Congregational Church, Cardiff, to the new minister, Rev. John T. Peace, who was until recently pastor of Pender's End Church, London. Wood Street Chapel is one of the largest in the principality, and strong hopes are entertained that through the labours of the new minister the church will be restored to the eminent position it held during the pastorate of the late Mr. Watkiss.

On Thursday evening last, Rev. Samuel Pearson, M.A., of Broughton Park Congregational Church, Manchester, presided at a service held for the purpose of forming a new Congregational church at Heaton Park. Over a hundred members of the Broughton Park Church joined the new Heaton Park Congregational Church. Rev. Edward Fleetwood, who has been minister of the branch church for two years, accepted an invitation to become the pastor.

At the autumnal meetings of the Congregational Union of England and Wales, the usual Valedictory meeting to missionaries leaving to take up their work in foreign lands will give place to a public meeting on "The Present Position in China," arranged by the L.M.S. The presence of a number of Chinese missionaries has been arranged, including Dr. and Mrs. S. Lavington Hart and Mrs. Bryson (of Tientsin), Revs. W. Hopkyn Rees (of Chi Chou), and James Sadler (of Amoy).

Calls (accepted).—Mr. Percy N. Harrison, of Mansfield College, to Salisbury; Rev. F. W. Brown, of Bristol, to Gloucester Street, Painswick; Rev. George Bawn to Leyburn, Yorks.

Baptist.

Endowments to the amount of £5,000 have been created in connexion with the North Wales Baptist College, Bangor, by Alderman R. Cory, J.P., of Cardiff, for the advancement of the work of the college as a training institution in theology and Biblical studies.

At Woolwich, Rev. W. E. Wells holds a weekly meeting for soldiers inside the barracks, and though the constant changes occuring in the regiment affect the numbers, still God has (Mr. Wells says) been pleased to graciously bless this meeting. It is held in the garrison school.

Owing to ill health, Rev. Alfred A. Savage has resigned the pastorate of the Salters' Hall Baptist Church, Baxter Road, Islington, N., and will close his ministry there on the third Sunday in October. His resignation has been accepted by the Church with much regret, and deep sympathy is felt for him by all the members.

The work at Netherton, Dudley, of Rev. D. C. Chapman is being attended with blessing. On a recent Sunday evening many had to return home finding no room in the chapel. Rev. D. C. Chapman preached from Acts ii. 41, and at the close baptized seven fresh converts, making twelve baptisms during the last month.

Services of an enthusiastic character have been held at Lewisham Road Chapel, Greenwich, in connection with the settlement of Rev. E. de Rusett as pastor. The church is in a very populous district, where, in spite of much effort of various kinds, the people do not seem to have been by any means fully reached.

The opening services of the iron chapel at Hither Green, belonging to the London Baptist Association, have been held. In the afternoon Rev. F. B. Meyer preached from Matt. xvii. 27. From the statement presented at the evening meeting by Rev. J. E. Martin (Erith), it appeared that the cause which had found a home in an upstairs room in Torridon Road for about a year, had made encouraging progress.

The lease of the Dugdale Street Chapel (with schools), Camberwell New Road, expiring in June, 1901, the freeholders have offered to extend the lease for another twenty-one years at the same ground rent, also the free use of the chapel and schools for that period, providing the building be renovated. To accomplish this it is necessary that a sum of £100 be expended. Strenuous efforts are being made to realize this amount, and thus save the church from being abandoned. Pastor John Waite, 2, Foxley Road, Brixton, will gratefully acknowledge additions to the £47 already contributed.

The opening of Cavendish Baptist Sunday Schools, Ramsgate, took place last week. The church was pledged to open free of debt, and the efforts to raise the cost proved successful. In all £4,400 has been received. Among those who took part in the opening ceremony were Revs. B. Senior, J. W. Ewing, W. Wall, Col. Porcelli, and Mr. Charles Cook. In the course of an impressive address, Mr. Ewing said it was possible to be convinced in the faith and yet not be won in heart. How many of their young people were very near to the Kingdom of God, almost persuaded, but had not taken the deciding step. They wanted to win such to a loving fellowship in Jesus Christ.

Recognition.—Rev. E. J. Goodman (late of Eden Bridge, Kent), Forris Church, Elgin, N.B.

Calls (accepted).—Rev. H. Rowlands, of Tenbury, to Cutsdean, Worcester, ministry to commence on October 21.

Methodist.

Revs. J. H. Hopkins and Henry T. Meakin have decided to open the Wesleyan Great Central Hall in Bermondsey on Wednesday, September 26, by a series of meetings beginning at noon.

Rev. Vallance C. Cook, who is working valiantly to revive the Wesleyan cause at Mayfield Road, Dalston, has arranged a Convention for the Deepening of Spiritual Life for Monday and Tuesday, September 24 and 25. The speakers are to be Revs. J. Gregory Mantle and Thomas Cook, Messrs. James E. Vanner, Josiah Nix, and T. D. Wallace.

A number of the Wesleyan ministers of the Leeds District, recently met at Woodhouse Grove for a quiet day of devotion. The forenoon meeting opened with a Bible study of Romans viii., followed by a conversation on personal spiritual life in relation to ministry. In the afternoon, Rev. H. Bone opened the conversation on the life-work of a Christian minister. A delightful period of fellowship, intermingled with singing and prayer, followed, and in the late afternoon the brethren partook of the Lord's Supper together, separating after tea for their evening's engagements. At a public meeting in the evening, a deeply-interested congregation listened to addresses from Revs. S. Vincent and S. Chadwick, the latter speaking on "The Church and Its Members." It was a day of marked spiritual influence, not soon to be forgotten.

Presbyterian.

In connection with the Synod, a conference is to be held in Liverpool on October 15, 16, and 17. It is for ministers and elders only, and will be addressed by Rev. Dr. Watson and other well-known ministers.

A new district mission hall, in connection with the Bingley Chapel, has been opened by Rev. E. R. Lewis, pastor of the church. The cost is about £450, which has been met out of the local Twentieth Century Fund.

Somers Town congregation, London (Rev. Z. B. Woffendale's), opened its autumn and winter campaign with a three weeks' Gospel mission in the open air. The services are being held in the principal squares, streets, and courts of the districts.

Society of Friends.

At Llandrindod Wells, a lecture has been given at the Meeting House by William Littleboy, of Birmingham, the subject being, "The Prophets of the Decline and Fall of Israel, Amos and Hosea." M. A. Wallis (Southport) presided, and the lecture, which was of a most instructive kind, was much appreciated.

Willesden Meeting-House is now open. Meetings for worship are held on first day morning at 11, and evening at 6.30. The adult school is held in the class rooms upstairs at 9.a.m. A formal opening and social meeting is intended to be held next month. The Meeting-House is situated in Harlesden Lane, Harlesden, N.W., ten minutes from Willesden Junction (L. & N.W.R.) Station.

In connection with the Friends' Prayer League, a conference for the deepening of spiritual life, is to be held at the Friends' Meeting-House, Leeds, Nov. 5—8. There will be morning, afternoon, and evening sessions each day. The Conference is specially intended for friends, but attenders of Friends' mission meetings, adult schools, &c., are also cordially invited. Secretary, Arthur Dann, Hurstpierpoint, Sussex.

The twentieth anniversary of the Sherborne Street Mission, Gloucester, has been celebrated. Arthur Midgley, of Saffron Walden, was present. The meetings throughout the first day were well attended, the hall being filled in the evening. Next day, at a public meeting, at which Frederick Sessions presided, a stimulating address was given by Arthur Midgley from the words, "No man liveth unto himself." Short reports of the leading branches of work were given by some of the workers, all of which provoked thankfulness and encouragement.

Fallen Asleep.

Rev. RUSSELL THOMAS, a young Congregational minister. On leaving Airedale College he commenced his ministerial work in York. When his health gave way his people refused to hear of his resignation, and gave him a year's rest. His health failed for the second time, when the church resolved he should have another year's rest, at the close of which he was once more able to resume his much-loved work, but only for a while.—At Newcastle-on-Tyne, ELIZABETH ANNE, widow of the late John George Richardson, J.P., aged fifty-six.—Rev. A. BOWMAN, minister of the Evangelical Union Church at Beith.—Mr. PETER MCLAGAN, ex-M.P. for Linlithgowshire, who was active in promoting the social, moral, and religious welfare of the people.—Rev. THOMAS CAMPBELL, Presbyterian minister at West Hartlepool congregation from 1858 to 1896.—At St. Leonards, Rev. H. E. PERKINS, who, on his retirement from the Indian Civil Service in the Punjab, became an honorary missionary of the C.M.S. in the same province, and laboured in that capacity for several years. Since his return to this country he has furthered the missionary cause in this country.—On the 17th inst., at Newington Green, Miss H. PILLANS SMITH, in her 81st year. (Funeral at Abney Park Cemetery, on Friday, 21st, at 11.30 a.m.)

Overcrowding in Liverpool.—The demolition of insanitary property, desirable as it may be, is not without its dangers, and it is stated that in Liverpool 100,000 have been evicted in the carrying out of extensive improvements, and of the number only 900 re-housed. Naturally, in the absence of suitable provision, there is still greater overcrowding, with the result that in one ward the death rate has been increased from twenty-nine to forty-one per thousand. Such facts point to the need that exists for a wide and extensive scheme that will not involve the substitution of new evils for the old ones, and that will reduce the number of preventible deaths traceable to municipal and State neglect.

Scottish Y.M.C.A.'s in Council.

THE annual conference of Scottish Young Men's Christian Associations and Fellowship Unions has just been held at Inverness. On the evening of Tuesday, 4th inst., a public reception was given in the Town Hall, when the chair was occupied by Mr. George Walker, president of the local Association. Provost Macbean, on behalf of the community, extended a most hearty and cordial welcome. He hailed the delegates as representing all denominations and sections, who, however different in outward forms and ceremonies, are sound on the essential fundamentals of religion.

Rev. Dr. Black (Free High Church) testified to the good work done by the Inverness Y.M.C.A., and specially traced much of it to the spiritual impulse given by the visit of Mr. D. L. Moody.

A most helpful address was given by Rev. W. Todd (Crown Free Church), who began by speaking gratefully of the benefit which had accrued to himself personally through his early connection with a Y.M.C.A. He said that in the changing, moving times in which we live it is of special importance for members to discover the shoals and the quicksands of life, so that they may be the guardians and guides of the rising youth. Unless the members understand aright the age in which we live, and are in sympathy with the best of it, they are likely to be of little use.

OBSTACLES IN THE WAY.

The first subject of conference on Wednesday was "Obstacles in the Way of the Y.M.C.A., and how to Remove these," the subject being introduced by Mr. John Macphail (Greenock). The obstacles he named first were internal, namely: (1) the inadequate realization of the spiritual character of the Association and its work; (2) the lack of individual responsibility, and (3) the want of concentration in carrying out the details of their work. Passing to obstacles arising from outside sources, he spoke of the false ideas that exist regarding the relation between the Y.M.C.A. and the Churches. It might seem strange that, after three-quarters of a century of Y.M.C.A. work in Scotland, there should exist in intelligent minds such an idea as that the operations of the Association are in any degree antagonistic to the interests of the Churches. He believed that, at the present moment, this feeling may be somewhat intensified by the fact that the Churches are realizing, more fully than they have hitherto done, their direct responsibility for the development of the Christian life and character of the young people committed to their care. The result of this honest and earnest conviction has undoubtedly been the multiplication of church organizations; and it is not too much to say that perhaps the position and influence of the Y.M.C.A. has not been utilized as it might have been in connection with the origin and development of these. He reminded members that, faithfully and lovingly carried out, there need be no antagonism between the fullest denominational activity and the most thoroughly developed Y.M.C.A. work. The speaker also referred to the abnormal amount of time now devoted by young men to recreation and amusement.

In the discussion which followed, Mr. Henderson Smith (Edinburgh) expressed the opinion that the whole of the obstacles in the way might be overcome by sympathy; Mr. Strang (Denny) appealed to members to show more liberality in supporting their own Associations; and Mr. Auld (Greenock) complained that former members did not encourage their own sons to join the Y.M.C.A.

HOW TO STUDY THE BIBLE.

The second subject of conference—"How to Study the Bible" was introduced by Dr. Alexander Mackay (Inverness), who spoke on (1) the spiritual attitude in approaching Bible study, and (2) the mechanical performance of that attitude. He said that each generation gives its own mental setting to the interpretation and exposition of the Bible, and the danger of the present age is a kind of practical atheism, an attitude of indifference being supremely characteristic of the young men.

Mr. Walker S. Melville (Dundee) added that members would find no time for Bible study unless they made it themselves. Mr. Black (Peebles) gave some practical and helpful hints, and emphasized the "searching," not merely the reading of the Scriptures. Rev. Dr. Norman Macleod (Moderator of the Church of Scotland) said it is a mere truism that nothing should be substituted for the personal study of the Word of God. They must approach it from a spiritual point of view, and would then find the revelation of the Spirit of God to the spirit that is in man.

THE DUTY OF PARENTS.

Lord Kinnaird presided on Wednesday evening over a great public demonstration, and urged the necessity of organization. He said that while still behind our friends on the other side of the Atlantic, members here are beginning to recognize that this work cannot be carried on as it should, unless some are set apart to keep the special object before the public. They welcomed most heartily all others who are working in the same way, in Guilds, Sunday Schools, the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavour, and other organizations. Speaking as one who lives in a great centre of population, his lordship sought to impress upon parents the fact that workers in cities must not be expected to do all that is necessary for the young people who come up from the country. Unless they are taught in the ways of truth and purity, and temperance before they leave their homes in the country, those in the cities cannot do it.

Rev. Dr. Norman Macleod said they were being told in some quarters that the young men of this age are, in a large measure, alienated from Christianity, that they have become more frivolous and sceptical than their predecessors; but there may be under the surface a better state of things than is imagined. That there is a certain aloofness on the part of young men need not be denied, but it seemed to him that there is a greater respect for all that is good, and more accessibility to religious influences.

"MADNESS" FOR CHRIST.

Rev. C. J. T. Merrylees (Bainsford) dwelt on the want of enthusiasm. He believed the greatest need of the day to be a revival of the "madness" which animated the disciples of the Lord as they set out to conquer the world. Men and women are wanted so filled with enthusiasm that they will be able and willing to do anything for Christ. He asked whether, if there was this enthusiasm, the Churches would be content with passing protests against the evils of the present day, or candidates be lacking for the ministry? Would the social condition be as it is to-day, when, on the one hand, men have their millions—Christian men, too—and, on the other hand, thousands of God's people are working for starvation wages?

INDIVIDUAL WORK.

On Thursday morning a paper written by Mr. John Davidson (recently-appointed secretary of Motherwell Y.M.C.A.) was read in his absence; subject, "The Necessity of Emphasizing Individual Work in Winning Young Men for Christ." Great importance was attached to members making the personal acquaintance of individuals, and then using every opportunity to speak to them on spiritual things.

Mr. William Campbell (Thurso) introduced "How to Retain Members and Associates Removing to Other Centres." He said it must be admitted that in the past the Associations have failed to retain their members as they ought to have done: with but few exceptions, he believed members who leave small towns for the cities are lost to the Y.M.C.A. He knew that some Associations are working in a fifty-year-old spirit, and lack that enthusiasm which is the vital atmosphere for successful work. After dealing with the many ways in which the life of a young man can be touched by a sympathetic hand, Mr. Campbell closed by reminding the members emphatically that they must never forget they are a Christian Association.

At a C.E. Anniversary.

A MINISTER'S TESTIMONY.

AT a special service held on Sabbath of last week, in connection with the anniversary of the Christian Endeavour Society of Finnieston Free Church, Glasgow, Rev. David Macintyre expressed his own feelings and those of the congregation in the following words: "The Christian Endeavour Society was formed five years ago. Since then a sister society was started in the mission district, and two junior societies have also sprung up. We have reason to give God thanks for the number of young people who have made a creditable profession of faith in Christ. This movement lays emphasis on two points.

"The first is confession. It is possible to enter too lightly upon an outward profession of faith; it is sorrowfully possible when there is no reality. But for all that, confession lies in the very heart of Christ's grace. He has set the Communion table in the very centre of all our religious observances, and the Communion is the confession of Christ the Saviour before the world. We are saved if we believe with our heart and confess with our mouth. If we confess Christ here, that confession is taken up into heaven, and He confesses us before his Father.

"Another point is prayerful meditation upon God's Word. The members gather together in their weekly meeting round the Word of God. Their consecration services are sanctified by the Word of God and prayer, and as it is impossible to study the Word of God, and to enter into close fellowship with the Redeemer in a public meeting, as one can do in private, a great emphasis has also been laid on 'The Quiet Hour.' Yet another point on which accent has been laid is work. It takes its place after 'The Quiet Hour.' Those who go forth to service, go from the King's house, carrying the brightness of his face on their countenances as they go; they go because He has sent them, and because they are the Lord's messengers in the Lord's Message.

"Our Society has run a course of five years; during that time some of the members have passed from us, and we have reason to give God thanks for many of them. Those who remain are serving Christ as they have opportunity. I do not say that every member is a child of God, for I do not know. I am afraid there is no congregation on the face of the earth of which that could be said. But I know this, that those who are associated with it have reason to thank God for the fruits of his grace among the young men and women gathered there. I do not say the young believers are without fault, nor would I say it about the older believers. Until we enter the House of God, we shall still have reason to confess and repent of our sin. There are temptations incidental to the young, and there are other temptations incidental to the old; but I do believe that those who gather there are growing up into Christ Jesus, and if God spares them will be a great blessing. Already we thank God for them as a congregation."

Edinburgh University Christian Union.

DEAR SIR,—The Edinburgh University Christian Union has recently secured offices as below (within two minutes' walk of the University buildings), and has decided to have these rooms open from September 29 to October 6, for the convenience of men attending the preliminary examinations in arts and medicine. In addition to an interesting library of missionary and other religious books, the rooms will, during these days, be supplied with a number of magazines and journals of general interest.

The Executive hopes that freshmen will avail themselves of this, as the rooms, though not large, are comfortable and are intended to be useful. Several members of the Union will be in attendance at the office between the hours of examination to help men to find rooms, or to render any other service that lies in their power.

The general secretary will be glad to hear from any men about to come up to whom he can be of service.

I am, yours on behalf of the Executive,

G. Duncan Whyte, M.B. (Gen. Sec. E.U.C.U.)

Perth Christian Conference.

THE thirty-eighth annual Christian Conference was held at Perth last week. On Monday a reception took place in the hall of the Middle Free Church, followed by a prayer meeting in the church adjoining, while the evening was given to an evangelistic service for women, at which an interesting and helpful address was given by Rev. Patrick R. Mackay, Secretary of the Anglo-Indian Evangelization Society (formerly minister at Prestonpans).

On Tuesday the Conference was formally opened in the City Hall, the chair being taken by Mr. W. E. Malcolm, of Burnfoot. The subject for the morning was, "The Will of God, what it is for the World and for the Church;" and addresses were given by Rev. Donald Fraser (Ekwendeni, Central Africa), Rev. F. S. Webster (All Souls, Langham Place, London), and Rev. Dr. Robertson (North Berwick).

In the afternoon the Conference turned on the practical application of the morning's meditations, the subject being, "Hindrances to the Doing of God's Will at Home and Abroad —Intemperance, Impurity, and Worldliness." Illustrations were given from every field of Christian effort—home missions, Gospel temperance work, work among special classes, among our own fellow-countrymen on the Continent, in the Colonies, and elsewhere, and work among the heathen.

A special gathering of ministers was held, as well as one of ladies at which reports were presented in connection with work among women at home and abroad. A largely attended gathering took place in the evening under the presidency of Mr. F. A. Brown Douglas (Edinburgh), at which addresses were given by Miss Olivia Johannesdothir (Iceland), Rev. Gordon B. Watt (Kilmarnock), and Mr. Andrew Stewart.

The meetings were resumed on Wednesday morning, when Mr. Samuel Smith, M.P., took the chair, and addresses were given by Rev. Charles Robson (Inverness) and Rev. Dr. John Ross (Moukden, Manchuria).

Convalescent Home for Miners.

ABOUT two years ago, Rev. W. C. McDougall, of Coatbridge, founded a convalescent home for miners at Saltcoats. This was an act of faith on his part, for he had no means of his own for such an enterprise, but his heart felt for them among whom he laboured, and he determined to help them in a substantial way. Accidents in mines are very frequent, and he saw men attempting to return to work after being hurt long before they had recovered from their injuries.

Renting an unoccupied brick building in the upper part of Saltcoats, in Ayrshire, which is famed as a health resort, he fitted it up for the accommodation of a few men. Friends of the miners assisted him with many gifts, and now the Home is furnished with ten beds, whilst on the ground floor there are a dining-room, parlour, and kitchen.

The Home is kept very clean and tidy by the matron, Miss Maxwell, who is beloved by the inmates because of her unwearied attention to their bodily and spiritual wants. The men are admitted without any charge being made for their board, although some, on leaving, give a donation to the funds. The Miners' Union also assists, but there is an urgent need for more funds, if this excellent institution is to prosper.

Contributions for this object can be sent to Rev. W. C. McDougall, 20, Weir Street, Coatbridge, from whom I had the pleasing information that several of the inmates had given evidence of having received lasting spiritual good while under his roof. J. B. S.

Y.W.C.A.—Mrs. J. E. Smith, hon. sec. of the Y.W.C.A. at Waterford, desires to make it known, that the Y.W.C.A. Holiday Home at Tramore will be set apart during October and following months for missionaries home for rest. Terms may be obtained from the lady superintendent, 32, William Street, Waterford.

At Doncaster Races.

ARRIVING at Doncaster on Saturday evening, Sept. 8, the Open-Air Mission workers at once held a service in St. Sepulchre Gate. Each succeeding meeting on and off the course was attended by the presence and power of the Holy Ghost, and many were scenes of evident conviction and conversion. The services on Sunday, on the green sward, near the course, and in the centre of the town, were memorable, the first witnessing the happy surrender of two young men, who knelt with us there on the ground, and the last the fixed attention of a crowd numbering hundreds, till at length we were reluctantly compelled to adjourn to the Y.M.C.A.

Four of the brethren—Messrs. Barry Wake, Argent, Heath, and Pullinger—were engaged on this day at Goole, where several remarkable services were held, one being attended by 1,000 people.

Each morning from Monday to Friday services were held in Doncaster Market Place, where, amid crowds surrounding well-known tipsters, the Gospel banner of the Open-Air Mission floated aloft, and drew round it a wonderfully attentive audience. On the racecourse the audiences were far larger and more attentive than usual, and while some smiled with contempt, or even uttered angry words as of yore, the majority listened with profound respect, while on many faces sure signs of conviction were seen. A constant stream of brief and glowing Gospel testimony was poured forth, interspersed with solos, trios, quartettes, and choruses, beautifully rendered by our musical brethren, and commanding eager attention.

Each afternoon we took our stand where tens of thousands swept by on their way homeward; we gave altogether over 70,000 choice cards and booklets. Thousands of brawny hands received these gifts, while many thanked us for them. A proportion were thrown away, but the greater number were retained and pocketed for future reading.

As to the evening services, they too, evidenced the power of God to save, many pressing round to hear the Word, and some confessing Christ on the spot. The men of the County Police, drafted in large numbers into the town, were addressed by Colonel Major and Mrs. Tweedie in the Guildhall.

How much we have to praise the Lord for in this memorable season of service! Our hearts simply overflow as we review the loving hospitality shown by local friends, the delightful prayer meetings held daily in the house of our tried and true friend, Dr. Christy Wilson, the fellowship of so many ladies and gentlemen as "helpers in the war," the indefatigable labours of Miss L. Hay Wake, our local collector, and, more than all, that smile of God which is as the true wine "which maketh glad the heart of man," and without which these great Gospel ventures could never be attempted. God be praised for all!

Frank Cockrem, Secretary.

A Missionary Day.

A SPECIAL endeavour has been made in Tewkesbury by Rev. E. H. F. Cosens, Vicar of Holy Trinity, to arouse missionary interest and to raise up fresh friends of missionary enterprise. Last week, Tuesday was set apart for the presentation of the interests of a number of Protestant Missionary Societies in connection with the Established Church. These included London Jews Society, Waldensian Mission, C.M.S., Irish Church Missions, Spanish and Portuguese Church Aid Society, South American, and C.E. Zenana Missionary Societies.

Mr. Cosens and his helpers were much encouraged by the interest manifested. Certainly the way to stir up missionary interest is to impart information, and his example may well be widely followed.

Marie Hilton Creche.—It will be remembered that this crêche was, last year, transferred to the care of the National Waifs' Association (Dr. Barnardo's Homes). In the eleven months dealt with in the annual report 9,257 children have passed through the crêche, and their admission has smoothed the rough road of life for hundreds of the hard-working poor. The crêche is to be maintained as a permanent memorial of Mrs. Hilton, and it is in contemplation to rebuild it and extend it on another site on the opposite side of Stepney Causeway. A fee is levied upon the mothers, but this income is a small proportion of the amount necessary to keep an open door. The treasurer of the Marie Hilton Crêche is Mr. John Hilton, National Incorporated Waifs' Association, Stepney Causeway, London, E.

Books for Villagers.—Some workers in a poor village in Leicestershire are trying, by means of an adult school, to let in some light, and give some Evangelical Protestant teaching where it is much needed. They would like to obtain some books of a helpful character—such as Rev. F. B. Meyer's—to lend in the village. Communications may be addressed to Mr. G. Spencer, All Saints' School, Plumstead, S.E.

Irish Notes.

A GOOD work is being done at St. Michael's, Belfast (Rev. R. Usher Greer, rector). When Mr. Greer became incumbent eight years ago, there was no church, but a congregation of about 100 persons used to meet in a small hall in a back street. There were no communicants and no workers. Now there is a large church, which cost about £6,000, most of which has been contributed by the people in the district. There are 1,200 families connected with the congregation, 1,000 children in the Sunday schools, a band of 120 workers who hold open-air meetings twice a week, and conduct eight weekly prayer meetings, while conversions constantly take place. The locality was one of the greatest slums of Belfast.

A hearty welcome has been accorded to Rev. Wesley Guard, on his removal from Dublin to Belfast, by the members of Donegal Square Methodist Church in the latter city. Mr. Guard is well known as a preacher and lecturer. This is his second appointment to the same church.

The Committee of the Jungle Tribes Mission, in connection with the Presbyterian Church, has passed a resolution expressing the highest appreciation of the earnestness and ability, as a missionary, of the late Mr. William Mulligan, who recently died of cholera while working among the Bhils in India, and also assuring his friends of their sincere sympathy in their sore bereavement.

Complaint has been made that on the Technical Committee nominated by the Sligo County Council not a single Methodist has been placed. Indeed, at first not a single Protestant of any kind was on the committee; but the Roman Catholic bishop pointed out that it would not look well if the whole twenty-four members of the committee were Roman Catholics, and accordingly four Protestants were put on it, namely, two Episcopalians, one Presbyterian, and one Congregationalist. The Methodists form an influential portion of the population.

In Belfast, Dr. Henry, the Roman Catholic bishop, is agitating to have the Roman Catholic children sent out of the workhouse to be educated at the nuns' schools, but, of course, at the cost of the public. Neither he nor Roman Catholic ecclesiastics generally wish their people to mix in any way with Protestants. Hence their objection to the Queen's Colleges and their demand for a Roman Catholic University. They have no objection, however, to get all their institutions endowed by the State and supported by Protestants. Their most earnest efforts are at the present moment being directed with this object. The amount of public money of which they are in receipt is astonishing.

Rev. Charles Davey has been welcomed to Fisherwick Place Presbyterian Church, Belfast. In the course of an impressive address, Mr. Davey said they believed that the only power that could raise man to a higher level, transform his life, and fit him to stand in God's presence was the glorious Gospel of the Living God.

Inebriate Home for Ireland.

THE Irish Women's Temperance Union, after much prayer and effort, has raised nearly £2,000 to erect an Inebriate Home for Women in Belfast; £1,000 more is needed before the building is begun.

The Temperance Union seeks the help of friends in England and Scotland in the undertaking. It is scarcely necessary to say that drunkenness, the curse of our country, is increasing among women to a very serious extent.

Many of these institutions are doing good work in England, under the Inebriate Act of 1898. It is proposed in Belfast to provide for two classes, paying patients and those who can pay very little, or nothing.

Work for our Navvies.

THE winter is the season most favourable for special spiritual work amongst our navvies; last winter many were brought to know that there is a happy rest for the labourer, and a welcome for the wanderer at the hands of the One who loves them. Two missionaries of the Navvy Mission Society, who have much experience in this style of work, have been specially deputed during the last two years to hold ten-day missions at the different navvy settlements, and there is great cause for thankfulness at the results.

Pamphlets regarding the work will be gladly sent to any who desire to know further. Prayer is desired, that the missions now commencing, and to continue through the winter, may be blessed.

Notes & Comments

THE "Christian Almanack" for 1901 will be presented gratis as a Supplement with our issue of October 25. The nnual subscription for The Christian will enceforth be 6s. 6d. (instead of 6s. 7d. as itherto), and 8s. 8d. for abroad.

The Queen, through her Ministers, has dis-olved Parliament, and we shall shortly be in ie throes of a fiercely-contested general election. t these times party spirit runs high, and the ndency to mutual recrimination among those ho uphold opposite views is strong. With party olitics we here have nothing to do, holding iat the question, Which party is in power? quite subordinate to a more important uestion, What kind of men represent us in ie National Legislature? Good laws will be assed, and true progress fostered, only if those ho are elected are men of high principle and hristian character. Are they men of real nd deep convictions? Do they seek their vn advancement, or their country's good? re they such as can be trusted to put ghteousness and justice, and mercy and uth, in the forefront, and to sacrifice per-onal interests for the sake of the Kingdom of od? These are the questions Christian ectors ought to ask.

We cannot help thinking that, from every atriotic point of view, the intention of the overnment to appeal to the country solely on ie merits of the South African war is ill-judged, nd may be followed by mischievous conse-uences. The country cannot afford to wait r another five years for the settlement of nportant home questions. Reform for the ture cannot, or should not, be put out of ght by this one question of the past. The ousing of the Poor, Old Age Pensions, ie Maintenance of Protestantism, Licensing eform, and many other matters of domestic conomy, on which the higher welfare of the ountry depends vitally—these are problems f immense importance; and the men who are nt up to the next Parliament should have a clear andate from the constituencies upon them. hat is wanted is that the energies of the ountry should be devoted to domestic reform.

The outlook in many directions is so serious iat exceptionally strong and good men are sential at the head of affairs. Probably the ture of our country depends upon the events f the next few months. Is it too much to hope that party passions will give place to strong, healthy judgment upon great moral principles which should be beyond the jargon of partisans? On the day when the dissolution of Parliament was officially announced, The Times printed a remarkable article from its Paris correspondent, in which it was pointed out that, owing to various complications in China and elsewhere, Europe has not been for thirty years so near a general conflagration as she is at present. Every Christian must do his duty at the poll—that goes without saying—but above all things, we need to seek Divine guidance at the present hour. Let prayer be made unceasingly on behalf of our country.

Rev. John Thomas' sermon at the Dedication Services at "Spurgeon's Tabernacle," with its forcible protest against the intellectual arrogance of the age in regard to spiritual things, was keenly invigorating in view of the unhappy fact that of late the tone of the pulpit with reference to modern science has been far too apologetic. There is no need to assure the scientist of the friendly attitude of religion, or to give such prominence to the so-called "Higher Criticism," and by so doing present Jesus as a debater rather than a Saviour. We are aware that the Bishop of Ripon has gone so far as to express an opinion that it is desirable the clergy should be "so far acquainted with science as to change their phraseology;" but "sin" and "salvation" are terse and clear terms, and it is with these the pulpit has most to do. The vapourings of the scientist pass away; the Word of our God endureth for ever.

In this light it is not pleasant to read a paper by Rev. J. V. Simpson (Free Church College, Glasgow) in The Expositor, upon "The Influence of Modern Science upon Religious Thought," with its tacit repudiation of immediate design in nature, its defence of the various theories of evolution, heredity, and environment, "man's self-realization," and the "Higher Criticism;" and also its want of faith in the presence of God in phenomena. Theories of this kind do not seem to be healthy food for Free Church students, and it certainly will not send them out strong to help the sinful and the sorrowful to find salvation and comfort. When Jesus invited the weary to come to Him and find rest, He made the way clear; and if any "new disclosure of the mind of the Logos—that is of Christ," is necessary—and we do not agree with Mr. Simpson that it is—we cannot think it will be found in "every new fact disclosed by biology."

The presence of Mr. Sankey in our midst is recalling to tens of thousands of people the epoch-making meetings of twenty-five years ago, and is also awakening in many hearts the desire for another time of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. Looking back upon those great days, the one thing that stands out prominently above everything else is the large place which was given to prayer. For months before Messrs. Moody and Sankey visited a town Christians met for united prayer, and so an atmosphere was created in which blessing easily came. And we may confidently predict that, in whatever form the new revival will visit us, that old and radical condition of continued and united prayer must be observed. In view of the general indifference towards religion, is it not possible for Christians in every town to meet regularly for united prayer? If all who read this note would begin to take what action they can in the matter, there is no reason why the entire country should not be girded with bands of praying people—all seeking one thing. We should then not have to wait long for the desired blessing.

The tissue of absurd charges brought against missionaries in China as the alleged cause of the recent disturbances continues unabated, and so far the missionary societies have not done very much to rebut them. Julian Ralph, writing in the Daily Mail, attempts among other insinuations, to charge the lady missionaries with being "women who make trouble." Is it not time that a real effort were made on the part of the great societies to set the public right on the subject? It is not fair to leave this work to the religious papers alone, which are at a disadvantage compared with the daily Press in the dissemination of news, and cannot reach a tithe of those within the scope of irresponsible "secular" journals. This is surely an opportunity for holding great meetings in defence of the brave and singleminded men and women who are at work, at the risk of life and safety, in distant parts of the earth, and cannot possibly defend themselves. We are glad to see that the L.M.S. means to hold one such meeting at the City Temple next Monday evening; but these gatherings should be held in every great town.

Our contemporary, the British Weekly, has done good service in devoting six articles to an exposé of the tenets and practices of Dr. Alex. Dowie and the "Christian Catholic Church." The following quotation from one of his own utterances briefly but sufficiently indicates the character of Dr. Dowie:—

> If my ministry is from heaven, you must believe what I say, and you must do what I tell you. Does it follow? It does, just as surely as anything can ever follow upon this earth. I will venture to say, after nearly a quarter of a century of silent testimony, that I have a right to stand here and say, in Zion, you have to do what I tell you. "Oh, the whole Church? What? The whole Church?" Yes! The whole Church—Presbyterian, Congregational, Baptist, and Episcopalian. God has sent a man, and He has written his mission over twenty-three years. What more do you want? "Well, Doctor, that is the most daring thing we have heard." Yes, and it is the most daring thing I ever said, but it is time it was said. . And many of you believe it is time. (Applause.) I do not ask somebody else to say it for me. The time has come when I must say it myself. . The words that rang out long ago concerning other prophets ring out to-day: Touch not mine anointed ones, and do my prophets no harm. I tell you it is an awful thing to have a message from God. . . It is an awful thing to stand between the living and the dead, and it has been laid upon me. The time has come. I have entered upon the fourth year of this Christian Catholic Church. I tell the Church universal everywhere, you have to do what I tell you. Do you hear? You have to do what I tell you, because what I tell you is in accordance with that Word, and because I am the Messenger of God's Covenant.

"This," says our contemporary, "is high-falutin' with a witness!" It is more than high-falutin'. It is in blatant defiance of the words of the Lord Jesus, which, said of Himself, apply with tenfold force to mere human claimants: "If I bear witness of myself, my witness is not true."

There are two principles which should ever be kept in view by those who would form a correct opinion of errors and errorists. First, that the errors in regard to Christian doctrine will, for the most part, if not invariably, be found to aim at a rehabilitation of man in the flesh. This is opposed to the foundation doctrine of the Gospel, which is resurrection—"with great power gave the Apostles witness of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus." All sound doctrine must prominently declare the utter alienation of the heart and will of man from God: "The carnal mind is enmity against God."

The second test is this—to whom does the teacher direct attention—himself or Christ? The Apostolic warning was: "From among your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away the disciples after them" (Acts xx. 30, R.V.). Wherever, therefore, we see a teacher or leader attracting disciples to himself, we may be assured of some form of error. In true Christianity, Christ is the centre, and to his standard alone should the people be called.

As an illustration of the immense difficulty which lies in the way of licensing reform, a story reaches us from a magistrate in a certain town. A public-house proprietor applied some time ago for a renewal of his licence, which was refused by the magistrates. Before the next brewster sessions, however, the number of magistrates was increased, and all the new magistrates were known to be on the side of the publicans. Consequently, when the application of this publican was renewed at the next sessions, the licence was at once granted, because the full bench of magistrates represented a majority in favour of the brewing interest. Now who is responsible for the appointing of men of this sort to sit and administer "justice"? In the case before us there can be no two opinions about the matter. It was purely a party move, without any regard to equity. Perhaps one of the greatest scandals of our country at present is the way in which so many partisans and unfit men are elevated to the bench. It is a burden which a free people have no right to bear, and while it is imposed upon us we shall never obtain justice in matters pertaining to temperance. For, unfortunately, the case we have quoted by no means stands alone.

A Knaresborough correspondent, referring to a Note in our issue of September 13, in regard to the disgracefully large number of public-houses in Chichester, states that a far worse condition of things obtains in the Yorkshire town, the adult population being only 1,250, inclusive of abstainers, and the number of public-houses fifty, in addition to the wine and spirit merchants and the licensed grocers. It is estimated that in these houses a sum of not less than £50,000 must change hands each year. Of course the working classes are, our correspondent adds, "in a poverty-stricken state;" and he regrets that "the Churches offer practically no resistance to this soul-destroying factor." He asks if there are no campaigners ready to open a campaign there in the name of Christ.

Undoubtedly the best way, however, would be that of dealing with the cause. Probably, as at Chichester, the brewers, with their "tied-house" system, are primarily responsible for it, and after them come the lax magistrates, who fail to go closely into the question of the public need. It was recently decided by the Liverpool Bench that out of 197 applications for renewal of licences, in 128 of these cases the houses were not required, and when fifty-five cases were heard, nineteen of the licences were extinguished. In that city more than 90 per cent. of the licensed houses are "tied" to some half-dozen brewers or brewery companies. Cannot our correspondent approach the question at Knaresborough from this point of view, and, with his Christian and philanthropic friends, bring strong pressure to bear upon the licensing magistrates who, to so great an extent, have the matter in their own hands? This, at present, unfortunately, is the only way in which anything like communal control of the vile drink trade can be secured.

A daily contemporary states that "one of the most astonishing phases of the life of our time is the growth of the cigarette habit," and adds that "the colossal sum of eighteen millions is spent annually by the British public on cigarettes." Setting aside altogether the grave question of the deleterious effect of the habit, and the fact that The Lancet has denounced the cigarette as one of the most potent enemies to longevity, it may reasonably be asked whether this wasteful expenditure upon that which, in any case, is unnecessary, might not be diverted into other channels with national and individual advantage. After all, it is in the smaller things of life that our most effective sacrifices are made.

The Church Times, angry with the men of the north on account of their want of appreciation of High Ritual, speaks strongly in regard to the Lancashire people, in the diocese of Manchester, not yet reached by "the Catholic faith." Clerical life is represented as "daily martyrdom" among them:

> It is not that the people as a whole are fanatical Protestants. . . . The distinguishing feature of Lancashire Church life is not hatred of sacerdotalism; it is rather a rooted dislike of anything that makes a definite appeal to the soul; in fact, to any form of Christianity which is in downright earnest.

Yet the writer admits that Lancashire is a "distinctly religious county," that the revival of a century ago is "not yet run out," but urges that the religion "of the Methodist type," being highly subjective, forms "a grand soil in which to plant the seed of the Catholic religion." This will be somewhat surprising to those who are familiar with the strong and deep spiritual life of the northern county.

The Monitor returns to the subject of the falling-off in the number of attendants at Protestant Sunday schools, and bases upon the unpleasant fact some insinuations against the condition of the "shaky concerns." It is, of course, convenient to our contemporary to forget for the time Cardinal Vaughan's noteworthy speech of a few months ago in regard to the tremendous leakage from Rome, and the lapsing of the young of both sexes; and also to ignore the instructive discussion which has been taking place in the Romanist journals in regard to the weakness of their Sunday schools.

A serious problem that many pastors have to face is the regular Sunday morning hearer, who remains unconverted. There are many persons who, through custom, listen to the Word of God on Sunday mornings only. They never appear at night, nor do they ever attend a service that is directly evangelistic. In most Evangelical Churches it is customary to seek the edification of believers on Sunday mornings, and to preach to sinners on Sunday evenings. In this way the class of people of whom we speak escape direct personal appeal. Mr. Spurgeon, feeling the difficulty, used frequently to take his congregation by surprise, and to make the Sunday morning sermon directly evangelistic, reserving an exposition for the evening. It was an eminently wise thing to do, and all who experience a similar difficulty in their congregations would surely do well to follow the method of the late great soul-winner. To surprise this class of people is apparently the only way of reaching them.

A millionaire in the ministry is a novel sight in a world where riches are so often fatal to ardent religious living. A young American, who is supposed to be "worth" two millions sterling, has just given himself wholly to spiritual work, and has been ordained to the full work of the ministry—Mr. Anson Phelps Stokes, who has freely chosen this as his vocation, and has expressed his great desire that he may have grace given him to devote his life and possessions to the service of Christ. If rich men realized their call and opportunity adequately to do the Saviour's work, and help forward his cause, they might not feel drawn into the ranks of the pastorate, but they would still find abundant scope for their money and their energies. The "ministry" of Christ embraces every form of true service, on the platform, in the Press, the market-place, the home, everywhere, and to it all men are called.

The writer of a deeply interesting paper in one of the current monthly reviews has drawn much attention to the continued existence in Ireland of numbers of "Witch Doctors," and other professors of superstitious beliefs and practices, and, as usual, much sympathy is being expressed for "poor Ireland." It is at least questionable, however, if we need go quite so far afield in search of objects for our pity, for all our fashionable resorts, at the seaside or elsewhere, now have their recognised and greatly-patronised palmists, and from many of our pulpits and publications we are being pressingly invited to go back to the superstitious doctrines and practices of the dark ages. The only difference, it would seem, is that of the centre of the operations.

The oft-repeated axiom, "when man loses faith in God, he loses faith in himself," receives a remarkable illustration in an article in the current Nineteenth Century. Mr. Skelton has set himself the task of ascertaining the cause of the increase of suicide amongst European peoples, and he sums it all up by declaring that ennui is growing in human life. It is remarkable that Saxony—the country where suicides are most common—is a country where rationalism has found a playground. Loss of faith in God has produced a distaste for living. The late Colonel Ingersoll, who collected dollars from curious crowds to whom he made the return of a heartless negation of all religion, openly preached suicide for the fatigued. In his own family two or three persons took him at his word and ended their lives. One remarkable statistical fact furnished by Mr. Skelton will be useful to temperance workers:—In Norway, since the drink bill has been diminished, the number of suicides has been reduced one half.

During the lovely weather of the past few weeks Nature has been slowly but surely preparing for the season of decay and rest. The pomp and pageant of the summer are over. The fields have yielded their precious grain—"four months of golden sunshine bound in sheaves." The orchard-trees have borne their heavy, but beneficent burden of fruit. The year has fulfilled its period of promise and fulfilment; and presently the energies that have been so long at work will be asleep. There is something in all this that appeals to us as a parable of the spiritual life. The time comes with all true workers for God when the heats of youth and the busy energies of maturity are slackened, and the soul looks forward to a pause, a rest, a period of quiet meditation and preparation for the end—the end which is also a beginning.

What is Doctrine?

THE first of several "Don'ts" which a lady has laid down for the conduct of Cottage Meetings is, "Don't preach octrines: use the miracles and simple stories." We understand this to mean, Appeal to the eart rather than to the head; be simple nd experimental rather than argumentative nd profound. And so far so good. But octrines are teachings, and no one would y, "Don't preach teachings." There is othing more needed at the present time than e teachings, the doctrines, of our Lord and s apostles, illustrated, as Jesus illustrated em, by miracle and parable, and enforced, as e Apostles enforced them, by the simple ories of the older Scriptures.

In the cottage or in the open air, in church mission hall, the people want instruction, aching, doctrine. The soul of a miracle or parable is its teaching. Every miracle was sign. The purpose of every sign recorded the Evangelist John was that we might elieve the teaching, the doctrine, that Jesus the Son of God, and that, believing, we ight have life in his name. The simple ory of Jonah was used with mighty fect by the Great Teacher to teach the octrine of the death and resurrection the Son of Man. Peter at Pentecost, filled th the Spirit, so used the simple stories of ewish history to enforce the doctrines of the pirit's power, the Father's love, the Saviour's crifice, that men of all nations cried out, Men and brethren, what must we do to be ved?" Stephen recounted facts which oved his opponents' rejection of their ophets' doctrine, with such effect that they nashed upon him with their teeth, and oned him.

Doctrine is the teaching of facts. The octrine is to the fact what the soul is to e body, what mind is to matter, what the life to the seed, what faith is to works. Preach e your Gospel without doctrine, and I will each you my Gospel by my doctrine; for as e body without the spirit is dead, as faith thout works is dead, so a gospel without octrine is dead also.

The people's souls hunger for food. There e vain talkers of old wives' fables, who give em stones for bread; there are teachers of lse doctrines who overthrow the faith of me, and for eggs give them serpents; there e men who teach perverse things to draw vay disciples after themselves, and for fish ve them scorpions. Such reject the Saviour's octrine that, "Except ye eat the flesh and ink the blood of the Son of Man ye have life in you." But apostolic preachers each Jesus and the resurrection. They are e Apostolical Succession. "With great wer gave the Apostles witness of the resur- ction of the Lord Jesus." M.

The Evangelist.

HIS ORIGINALITY, HIS CHARACTER, HIS CONDUCT, HIS MESSAGE.

I. ORIGINALITY, or at any rate a measure of it, is seen in every true evangelist. He is not a mere copyist, but behind his words lies a marked personality an individuality. If this be absent it may legitimately be questioned whether such a person is really called to the work. A divinely gifted evangelist is natural. He avoids imitation, he is himself. He moulds himself by no earthly pattern. He does not waste his energies endeavouring to be what he never can be; i.e., somebody else. He admires and is thankful for men such as Spurgeon, Chalmers, Punshon, Moody; but be these he never can, and he wisely avoids any attempt in that direction. He knows what has been given him in the way of endowment, and uses it for God's glory. A sling was better for the shepherd youth than a "mailed fist," and proved effectual in his hands.

II. Character is produced by the Spirit of God forming Christ in the soul, and thus reproducing in a man those moral graces that are seen in their loveliest bloom and fullest perfection in Jesus. It is really "growth in grace." The evangelist is not to be at a standstill. He is to GROW IN THE KNOWLEDGE OF GOD.

Alas, that any should not be making this progress! and yet it may be too true that in some cases there is lacking the spiritual power and freshness of former days. Like Ephraim, he may not know it; but it is written, "Strangers have devoured his strength, and he knoweth it not; yea, grey hairs are here and there upon him, yet he knoweth not." The measure of a man's personal communion with God should exceed that of his outward activity in service; in other words, his income should be greater than his outgo, otherwise what spiritual barrenness will ensue, what powerlessness for service!

III. Conduct is character in action and, like Cæsar's wife, should be above suspicion. A few points may be noted—

(1) An evangelist should be careful not to allow in his own ways what he condemns in others. "Thou, therefore, which teachest another teachest thou not thyself . . . thou that abhorrest idols, dost thou commit sacrilege?" How terrible for a man to pose as an iconoclast, and yet his own heart and life to be centred upon some idol! It may be a secret sin that is destroying all spiritual vitality. How many an evangelistic address, a sacred solo, has been and sweetness and power through some harboured, hidden sin in preacher or soloist!

(2) An evangelist should be free of envy, and should cultivate a warm, broad-hearted sympathy towards all fellow-workers in the harvest field. He should learn to look not on his own things, but also on the things of others. The unique and successful position held by The Christian amongst the religious weeklies of the age is largely to be attributed to the breadth and catholicity of its spirit and its desire to further every good word and work. A narrow-minded evangelist will never inspire confidence.

(3) An evangelist should be easily accessible to all men. The Lord was the most approachable of men. His great heart was open to all.

(4) There should be sobriety of mind and intense earnestness. Paul writes—"Whether we be beside ourselves, it is to God; or whether we be sober, it is for your cause." His ecstasies were "to God," his sobriety for men. Undue excitement and wild gesticulation on a platform are as much out of place as trifling levity. Let the message be delivered soberly, and yet with all the earnestness at command, the heart being filled with love to Christ and a passion for souls. An audience would then see that the message is personally believed in by the messenger, that the Gospel is his own experience.

IV. The Message. "We preach Christ crucified," "and with great power gave the apostles witnesses of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus." These two sentences furnish the theme. Someone has said: "The corruption of nature is too strong for logic, rhetoric, and philosophy; too strong for refined speculation, too strong for the greatest oratory." This witness is true. The Gospel, and this alone, is God's power unto salvation to every one that believeth, and is the sole divine panacea for all human evil. Foxe wrote of Bradford, "Sharply he opened and reproved sin, sweetly he preached Christ crucified, pithily he impugned error, earnestly he persuaded to godly life." May the work of an evangelist be done more efficiently, more whole-heartedly, more prayerfully, and more faithfully, until the "Well done" is heard when "every man shall have praise of God!"

Windermere.

With rippled lake before me,
And arching vault of amber,
My errant fancies clamber
The rocky heights that, o'er me,
Mount up to meet the clouds.
The hush no hurrying crowds
Disturb, with restless feet.
Peace is diffused abroad,
The holy calm of God,
Heaven seems earth to greet
In this serene retreat.

Above, the heavens bending.
Beneath, the waters lie—
A mirror for the sky.
Supernal glories blending
With scenes far, far below.
So hearts made pure may know—
Indwelt by God's own Dove—
How radiance celestial
May bathe a soul terrestrial,
Descending from above,
From God the Fount of love.

See earth respond in beauty
To heaven's ceaseless blessing;
As thankfully confessing
The claims of grateful duty.
The green salutes the blue,
With incense ever new—
Life's parable revealed!
God blessed sunshine lends,
And earth its flagrance sends.
My soul, dost thou so yield
The harvest of thy field?

Reposeful Windermere!
Edenic for thy sweetness;
With what a fatal fleetness
Thy charms will disappear!
The leaves of autumn, sere,
The frosts of winter, drear,
Complete earth's changing year.
What skies that know no shade,
What flowers that never fade,
Adorn that Land, so dear,
To which faith brings me near!

Reflections on the War.—I.

By AVARY H. FORBES, M.A.

ITS EVILS.

TO the present generation of Englishmen a serious war is a new thing, and the Transvaal war has been to us in many ways an "eye-opener"—if we may use the phrase. The more interesting phases of the conflict, from a Christian standpoint, will not be found in the official history; they must be gathered, if at all, from the private letters of soldiers at the front, which have been voluminously published in the daily papers.

The grosser evils of war need not be insisted on here. They include death by thousands to men in the prime of life, torturing wounds, pain, anguish, suspense, privation, besides fever and other diseases. They also include racial animosity, hatred, and malice.

The command, "Love your enemies," is largely if not entirely set aside by most Christians during war; and yet was not the command intended for such a time, and is it not most needed in time of war? Moreover, if I am a Christian and a soldier, I must be true to Christ, and also to my country. If I am true to my country, I must try and kill my enemies. If I am true to Christ, I must love them. But I must also ask God's blessing, and pray that the bullet I am going to fire may kill a foeman. I must say, "Lord bless this work, and guide this bullet. The man I hit may be a brother in Christ. I can't help that; send it through his heart, for he is my country's enemy." What an awful incongruity there is between Christianity and war!

DISILLUSIONMENT.

The disillusioning in the home has been bitter, but wholesome. There have been more tears shed in England in the last eleven months than probably in the previous eleven years. Tears bespeak feeling and earnestness. There is often more power in one tear than in a 100-ton gun. People have been made to think, and think seriously. Many, from whose circle death has kept away for many years, have been called on to meet it very nigh. Social platoons have been broken up. Partings have taken place "such as press the life from out young hearts"—and old hearts too; the papers have been scanned with anxious eyes and beating pulse, and some have prayed that never prayed before.

The poor fellows at the front, however, were the first to be disillusioned.

"Fighting is all right to talk about," writes a Dragoon Guard, "but I think I shall have had enough of it if I get through this." (January 24.)*

"Oh! it is dreadful; one can't explain it; it must be endured to realize it," writes a sergeant of the Devons (January 25).

"It was the awfullest day ever I have seen," says another (January 25).

"My God, I shall never forget it in my life, Bill. It was terrible, fearful" (from a corporal of the Black Watch, January 13).

"We have had to pick the men's brains up in helmets to bury them and all their clothes" (from a private, Army Service Corps, January 19).

DEATH LESSONS.

The death lessons have been most awful, both at home and at the front. Who can fathom the feelings of a man's mind who has been mortally wounded and knows it? The following heart-rending case is only one of hundreds:—

"The captain had just got behind a small bush, and I was still in the open, when five shots struck him almost at the same time—two in the mouth, one in the centre of his chest, one in the stomach, and one in his left shoulder. He turned round and walked a few yards. . He said 'My God! My God! I'm shot. Lay down, men, lay down!' Then he shouted for the doctor. Lance-corporal Woolley took the captain's helmet off, and laid him down. Then he turned round to me and said, 'The captain is dead.' Ten minutes afterwards, as Woolley was crawling along on his hands and knees, a bullet struck him in the temple, burnt and blew off half his head, and left him in a kneeling position. I was not more than two yards from either of them." (From private, Mounted Infantry detachment of Buffs, January 29).

When a man is face to face with death, his thoughts instinctively turn to God. This poor captain, too, cared for his men at that agonizing moment, and told them to lie down.

A private of the 1st Coldstreams writes home that he and sixteen others were talking the night before Belmont as to what they would have to tell their friends at home when the war was over; but after the battle he found that eight out of the sixteen had been killed.

"Then I began to realize what war was. You may imagine my feelings when I looked on poor David! He was riddled with bullets." (January 19).

One more death lesson—and a large one!

"I witnessed one of the most horrible scenes that ever a lad could witness last night, which I cannot describe or ever forget—rows upon rows of dead. The first grave we dug was about thirty feet long and three feet deep, and, would you believe it? we put fifty-three Scotsmen into it, thirty-four of the Black Watch alone. It was something horrible! And every man of us was crying all the time we worked. . . . Three or four fainted, while the others cried so loudly that you could hardly hear the minister. . . . We all went back to our train crying. I could not sleep after such a sight." (From a sapper in Royal Engineers, January 12.)

It is difficult even now to read of such scenes without tears, and yet we can realize very little of what such scenes really meant. To move so many soldiers so deeply is a thing that does not occur often in a century.

"Talk not of grief, 'till thou hast seen
The tears of warlike men."

May the lesson not be thrown away on the survivors!

HEROISM.

Bravery and heroism have been displayed by both sides in this war, and that in an astonishing manner. Whatever view we take of the war, we cannot deny this redeeming feature. In many instances it has been noble and splendid beyond expression.

The conduct of the gunners at Tugela will be fresh in all our minds, and need hardly be enlarged on here. These men, writes Mr. Burleigh in the Daily Telegraph (January 18):

"These, I say, by the light of all my experience in war, these gunners are men who deserve monuments over their graves, and even Victoria Crosses in their coffins."

"How the gunners of the 66th stuck to their guns! Such a sight will never be seen again." (From Driver F. Williams, R.F. Artillery January 25.)

The officers were equally heroic:

"I wish our officers would not expose themselves as they do—I mean British officers generally. They seem to think it is beneath them to take cover; and that is the reason they get picked off, as they have been, in such large numbers." (From a trooper in Thornycroft's Horse, February 8.)

Further testimony and multiplied cases might be given, but space will not allow. Instances of generous and unselfish conduct in the presence of great danger are also very numerous.

"Some, who were so badly hit that they could hardly stand, were helping others, and when we offered to help, replied, 'No, no, my lads; lower down you will find hundreds who cannot move.' Men carrying stretchers were wounded and ready to drop. All around us we heard cries of—'Water, for the love of God!' And when we gave them some, they would just take a little, although we told them to have more; but they would reply, 'No, there are others in front.' Not one of them thought of self. (February 13.)

Many were killed while helping or carrying the wounded from the field. Writes an officer of Thornycroft's Mounted Infantry (January 29):

"I went twice under a hot fire, and brought in two wounded men, one of whom was shot again as we were carrying him; also the man who was carrying him by the head."

Mr. H. C. Benson, of the Imperial Light Horse, likewise received his death-wound while heroically carrying Colonel Chisholme, who had been mortally wounded, from the field of Elandslaagte.

Scripture Texts in Tramcars.—During the year, the London Tramcar and Omnibus Scripture Text Mission has been enabled to increase its exhibits to 487, which are now silently witnessing to the truth over ninety-seven different routes. Much more remains to be done in this direction, and the committee will gladly arrange for its secretary to attend meetings with the object of presenting the scope and claims of the Mission's operations and resources. The secretary is Miss G. L. Baily, 27, Charterhouse Square, E.C.

Thoughts on Atonement.*

THE ONLY REMEDY.

THE Christian doctrine of Atonement is the only remedy which has ever been propounded to the world to deal with the psychological fact of guilt. It satisfies a Christ-awakened need.

Rev. R. J. Campbell.

POINTS OF VIEW.

The death of Jesus was a satisfaction (satisfaction having reference to the claims of law) and a reconciliation (which has reference to estrangement), and an expiation (which has reference to sin), and a propitiation (which has reference to wrath).

Principal Cave.

CHRIST AND THE SINNER.

Atonement is substitutionary, else it is none. Let us not denounce or renounce such words, but interpret them. They came into existence to meet a spiritual necessity, and to sweep them away is spiritual wastefulness, to say no worse. We may replace the word substitution by representation or identification, but the thing remains. Christ not only represents God to man, but man to God. Is it possible for any to represent man before Holy God without identifying himself in some guiltless way with human sin, without receiving in some way the judgment of sin? The principle of a vicarious atonement is bound up with the very idea of Revelation, of love emerging into guilt.

Dr. P. T. Forsyth.

ATONEMENT AND DIVINE JUSTICE.

It is not mere hate and horror of sin that we learn from the disclosure of the heart of God in Christ; it is love of righteousness and holiness. We are not made at one with God until we are possessed by this sacred fire of holy love. This is the consummation of atonement, God in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself. Rev. C. Silvester Horne.

SUBSTITUTION.

The "for me," understood as in the sense of "in my place," is, in my eyes, the centre of the Gospel, as it is the nerve of the Christian life. Christianity deprived of this becomes nothing more than a sword with its edge blunted, powerless in the hand both of the missionary who seeks to strike down other religions, and of the private Christian to deal a mortal blow at the heart of the old man, at the tyrannous domination of self. The Christ who became my substitute on the cross has alone the right and the power to be substitute in my heart.

Dr. Fréderic Godet.

A VINDICATION OF RIGHTEOUS RULE.

The death of Jesus is a more splendid vindication of righteous rule than the death of all sinners would be. He who for the good of the entire universe, made the law that death should follow sin, from love of the whole universe submits his sinless self to death. Who can say thenceforth, whether man or devil, that sin had been lightly forgiven and the interests of holy rule endangered? By his death as man, and all its inexplicable suffering, the God-Man made it possible to restore his life as God to any sinners willing to avail themselves thereof. Man may become regenerate if he will, not alone because Christ died, the just for the unjust, but because Christ ever lives, having "the keys of death and Hades." Principal Cave.

"Rainy Days."—A correspondent suggests what a boon it would be if pictures, books, games, and even the luxury of a gramaphone, could be supplied to Dr. Stephenson's, Dr. Barnardo's, and other children's homes for use on rainy days, when the time hangs heavily.

The Church Army.—Rev. W. Carlile writes from the headquarters, 130, Edgware Road, W.:—"The very heavy calls upon the public in connection with the war and famine funds have told severely upon the income of our Society. During the last two months alone the receipts from subscriptions were £6,500 less than in the two corresponding months last year! The demands upon us in connection with our work amongst the outcast, the destitute, and the helpless—men, women, and children—which we carry on, wholly irrespective of creed, in every county of England and Wales, as well as in parts of Scotland and Ireland, are greater than ever before. The work has the official sanction and approval of the Home Office, the Prison Commissioners, the Local Government Board, and all experts in social reclamation. Unless, however, increased funds are forthcoming, our work of helping the helpless—and we deal with thousands of cases each month—must be largely cut down—and at once. The Church Army never goes into debt."

* These points are taken from a selection of the articles in a Symposium, entitled THE ATONEMENT IN MODERN RELIGIOUS THOUGHT. (6s. James Clarke & Co.) The papers are of varied merit, some of them of great interest and value.

Scarlet and White.

THE Chinese attach a meaning to every colour, and they would refuse to purchase articles if the wrappings were an unlucky shade.

Red is a "lucky" colour, and it is predominant t weddings. The pair of winecups from which he bride and bridegroom drink are bound ogether by a red string; the presents are lecked with red ribbons, wrapped in red paper, nd brought by attendants whose dress is flame. Over the bride's sedan-chair a brilliant rimson cloth is hung, and her bearers have at east scarlet feathers in their tall hats. Even he letter from the bridegroom is written on ed notepaper. The wedding-dress is a bright ed, the veil is red, and crimson boards inscribed with golden lettering are borne before he bride by attendants in scarlet.

Significant indeed is the contrast in the Bible between the colour of the Bridegroom's ress and that of his Bride. As they nter the wedding feast, she leans on her Beloved (Song of Solomon viii. 5), and her arments are dazzling in their whiteness. But is are crimson, and she is proud of their olour, for they bespeak her safety; they are yed with the blood which He shed in her escue. So ill remind us of Christ's robe. When the soldiers n mockery flung a crimson robe over his houlders, unconsciously they continued the uccession of Old Testament teaching.

The Prophet Isaiah saw One coming to him lad in a blood-bespattered robe. He was a hepherd, and perhaps, like David, had been efending his flock against the lion and the ear. So the Prophet cried aloud, "Who is iis that cometh from Edom with dyed garents from Bozrah (sheepfold)?" The reply as the reply of a victor, "I that speak in ighteousness, mighty to save." With his riosity still unsatisfied, the Prophet asked, Wherefore art thou red in thine apparel, and ıy garments like him that treadeth in the inefat?" And the Shepherd replied: "I ave trodden the winepress;" ay, and alone He od it, for none other could have trod by his de, and thus He won his Bride, and the ink ith which the contract was signed was his own lood.

To this marriage, of which red is the chosen olour, a long succession of crimson finger-posts ad and point. A few of the most prominent re: The blood-smeared door-posts of Goshen; ıe Nile changed into blood; the passage rough the Red Sea; the colour of the dye on ıe rams' skins and of the tabernacle hangings; ıe choice of scarlet in the cleansing of leprosy; ıe choice of a scarlet cloth to cover the shewread utensils; the choice of a crimson thread r Rahab's window; the choice of a red heifer, nd a brush tied with red thread to sprinkle the hite ashes.

THESE ARE NOT PICTURESQUE

uches, nor accidental coincidences. They ark out the road to the cross, and they are gnificant of Calvary. The thread which nds the sixty-six books into one indissoluble hole is red.

It is strange that the Bride was herself once rrayed in scarlet, but on her the colour was ıe mark of shame (Rev. xvii. 3, 4, 5). As her es travel from her own fair dress—the ridegroom's marriage gift—to his, if the olour of his recalls the garments she has put f for ever, it is only thankfully to be reminded ıat He has borne her sins in his own body on ıe tree. How true have proved the words ith which He wooed her: "Come now and t us reason together: though your sins be as arlet, they shall be as white as snow; though ıey be red like crimson, they shall be as wool." hey have exchanged gifts as proofs of mutual ve and confidence. He has given her his otless, stainless robe of righteousness, and ıe has given her sin-stained rags.

Scarlet and black are the two dyes which nnot be hidden under another colour. They e double dyes. And the Bride was doubly filed. She had the family heritage of sin her will, and heart, and mind, and emotions, and she had struggled in the slough of daily transgression. Yet such was the condescension of her Lover that He took her out of the mire and clay, and cleansed her, and made her his own.

The use of scarlet for sin is also appropriate, because of its brilliancy of colour. Unless one be colour-blind, it is easily seen. It is a danger-signal. Some are purblind. To them with their distorted vision scarlet appears white or blue. But to the man who has honest sight, scarlet serves as a warning of danger.

Some have so repeatedly sinned that they are past distinguishing (Eph. iv. 19) between the right and the wrong, and they are not warned by the sins and ruin of others, but they love to tread the same ruinous path (Rom. i. 32).

There is a house on the Bruyère road, near Paris, which has been the scene of many fatal accidents to cyclists. It has been painted red as a warning. Yet the warning is worthless, and

RIDERS STILL ATTEMPT THE HILL.

God has made sin hideous as a warning to those who are honest as yet in sight, and not warped in judgment. But, when once the easy slope is commenced, what can save the sinner, gathering momentum as he flies onward to the catastrophe? Mercifully, even if unsaved himself, he has his value in the world, as a danger signal to those who can and will see.

The Bride's white robe can also be traced through the Old Testament. We can recognize it in the white robe which Jacob gave Joseph, whereby he would have made the youngest the Prince of the family. We have a hint of it in the "little coat" (Heb. Me-il, a part of the priest's dress), which Samuel's mother brought to her son, which also was white, and which marked him as a Priest of God. We can see it plainly in the wedding-coat which the guest despised. For it were fitting that the Bride of the King's Son should have the dress of a princess, and that the bride of the High Priest should wear a priestly dress. (Rev. i. 6; v. 10; on "white," cf. Dan. xii. 10; Rev. vii. 14; xix. 8; iii. 18; Ps. li. 7).

HERBERT DUDLEY LAMPEN.

Fan—Floor—Fire.

A HARVEST MEDITATION.

(St. Luke iii. 17.)

THE FLOOR—that is, the threshing-floor. What were they like in our Lord's day and in our Lord's country? A piece of ground, unenclosed, high, and exposed on every side to the winds; the soil trodden hard and beaten level, so that it should not mingle with the grain in the process of threshing. Each village had one or more. From all directions camels, and oxen, and asses might be seen converging to this or that floor, bringing huge burdens of unthreshed wheat.

Several threshing-floors are mentioned in the Bible, but the most famous of all, of course, was that of Araunah (or Ornan), the Jebusite. There God stayed the sword of the Angel of death, and on that site was the Temple of God ultimately erected, chosen in commemoration of this merciful deliverance. The threshing-floor became a mercy-seat. The Temple, visible from every part of the city, stood as a reminder that the mercy-seat should become spiritually a threshing-floor. Just as the threshing-floor improved with use, the ground becoming harder and smoother with the continuous tread year by year, so should the House of Prayer have become, if rightly used, an increasingly effectual place for

THE SANCTIFICATION OF GOD'S PEOPLE.

Each generation should have found it easier, by virtue of the increasing number of God's mercies, by the example and patience of saints and prophets and parents, to render unto God a purer service, separating the chaff from the wheat, and gathering for Him only the good grain. The record of the nation testify to the sad opposite.

The threshing-floor, the Temple, has gone; but the fact to which it testified remains. Its successor is the Christian Church. That is the new threshing-floor; and the immensely important question calls aloud for a definite answer. "Is the new to have the same discreditable history, and the same disgraceful end as the old?" This is Christ's threshing-floor, that which He has built and prepared. It is high and lifted up. It is open to the full breeze of heaven, blowing from every quarter, the Holy Spirit proceeding from the Father and the Son. Lo! from "the field which is the world" all nations of the earth converge to the Church of Christ, bringing that which they have sown and grown; or, to apply this thought to ourselves, our part of the floor is where we worship. Thither we go to confess our sins, there seek the help of the Holy Spirit to drive away all that is worthless within us, and leave us pure and wholesome grain. The life of Christ is the soil, followed by saints, known and unknown of old, and more recent time, lived out under manifold temptations and varied experience, which should render our part easier, by virtue of the formation of a strong and sound public opinion, to render up to God full return for his work, and making it more impossible each year for earth's impurities to remain behind and mingle in the heap of life's total.

THE FAN.—This was a wooden shovel with a handle three or four feet long. Its purpose was to cast up the grain against the breeze, which then carries all the lighter and worthless particles—chaff, husk, stubble to the lee-side of the floor. There slowly but surely it increases until it becomes a great heap. Without this fan, the breeze could not be utilized. "Whose fan is in his hand, and He will thoroughly purge his floor." The fan, therefore, represents all those means of grace, all those persons, all those circumstances amongst which we are placed, and which throw us up, as it were, into the line of the Holy Spirit (or wind) of God (John iii.). So writes George Herbert in his poem on "Sin."

> Lord, with what care hast Thou begirt us round!
> Parents first season us, then schoolmasters
> Deliver us to laws: they send us bound
> To rules of reason, holy messengers,
> Pulpits and Sundays, sorrow dogging sin,
> Afflictions assorted, anguish of all sizes,
> Fine nets and stratagems to catch us in,
> Bible laid open, millions of surprises . . .
> Without, our shame; within, our consciences;
> Angels and grace, eternal hopes and fears.

THE FIRE—fire unquenchable. Let us thank God for that fire unquenchable. All who have had to do with the cultivation of land must thank God for that destroyer; for what should we do with all the rubbish left, when all that is good is gathered in? Now, the harder the floor, and the stronger the breeze, and the better the fan does its work, the larger will grow the heap of chaff and such refuse on the lee-side of the floor. The unquenchable fire is ready at hand to destroy that which the Holy Spirit and the Fan, in sacred league and co-operation, send to it. It is now the fire of the altar; hereafter it will be the fire of punishment. We are told in Rev. viii. 5 that "the angel took the censer and filled it with fire of the altar and cast it into the earth." Fire is the symbol of the wrath of God for sin, but at present the fire burns upon the altar. It is "the wrath of the Lamb," "the Lamb that taketh away the sin of the world." We feel its heat within ourselves. "Did not our hearts," said the disciple, "burn within us while He talked with us by the way, and while He opened to us the Scripture?" It searches through all the intricacies of the human heart, seizes upon as fuel all those excuses and pretexts for sloth and sin, and turns them into hot burning shame. "Our God is a consuming fire." He burns up the chaff here, if we expose the chaff, and separate it from the good in man. If our hatred of our sins be real and unfeigned, if we look upon sin as the thresher looked upon his chaff, utterly useless and worthless, then we shall want to see them no more. We shall rejoice that they have passed to the lee-side of our lives—a good riddance to bad rubbish. What that fire will be hereafter is beyond the ken of human thought. But because we know not its nature, let us not deny its existence. Now we know in part, whether of heaven or hell. We do not deny heaven on that account; why deny hell? "He will thoroughly purge his floor, and gather his wheat into his garner." The thoroughness has not come yet; but it will come.

Lantern Lectures.—Messrs. George Newnes, Limited, are again prepared to loan their useful series of lantern lectures, which have been thoroughly revised and rendered up-to-date. Several additions have also been made, and secretaries of literary societies, working men's clubs, and similar institutions will do well to apply for syllabus and conditions (stamped envelope), to George Newnes, Limited, Lantern Lecture Department, 7-12, Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

The Jewish Day of Atonement.—The Hebrew-Christian Prayer Union hope (D.V.) to make a special effort to reach a large number of Jews with the Gospel during the solemn Day of Atonement, Wednesday, October 3. They invite friends of Israel to join them in earnest prayer and intercession. The meetings arranged include the following: Tuesday, October 2, eve of the Day of Atonement, Church Room, Whitechapel, at six o'clock. Wednesday, October 3, Day of Atonement, Presbyterian Jewish Mission Hall, 58, Whitechapel Road, at eleven a.m.; Open-air Gospel Testimony to careless Jews, near the fountain, Victoria Park, at three p.m.; later, a meeting for prayer and praise in Marnham Hall, Darling Row, Cambridge Road, E. During the day, Scripture portions and suitable tracts, especially prepared by Mr. Bergmann, will be circulated.

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, September 30. Isaiah xxviii.

DRUNKENNESS was one of the prime causes of the overthrow of the Ten Tribes. The vineyards that terraced the hills around Samaria, so far from being the crown of pride which their appearance suggested, were really the cause of national deterioration and decay. Let those who point to the immense revenues which our nation derives from strong drink remember that they are raised at the expense of all that makes for a healthy and vigorous national life. The subject of this proud boast shall fade like a first ripe fig, and the nation which makes it shall err in vision and stumble in judgment. How great the contrast between such a ground of dependence, and the might of the Lord of Hosts, who combines in his own Being all that men seek from the material and sensual, and infinitely more! Oh, let us appropriate his wisdom for judgment, and his strength for battle!

The politicians of Israel, enervated by sensual excess, scorned the reiteration of Isaiah's words, and boasted that the alliances they had made would be sufficient to guarantee their safety, whatever course political events might take. They had made a covenant against death, and an agreement against hell. "Ah," cries the prophet, "it shall not avail you. The bed is too short to lie on, and the covering too narrow to suffice for warmth." The judgment which was about to fall on the land was too searching and terrible to be warded off by such expedients as these. What a striking appeal may be based on these terrible words to those who are relying on anything less than the precious Corner-stone, which God hath laid! Nothing less will avail in the Day of Judgment.

The kingdom of Judah, referred to here as Ariel, has been not inaptly compared to the "buffer-state" of Bulgaria, between Russia and Turkey, and was jealously watched and coveted by both Assyria and Egypt; and the politicians of Isaiah's day hoped to preserve the national independence by playing off the one against the other. As, however, the Asiatic and African empires rolled nearer and nearer each other, year by year, and threatened to crush the little kingdom of Judæa as a corn of wheat between the upper and nether millstones, Isaiah protested with unwavering tenacity on behalf of a divine and superhuman alliance, based on the fundamental covenant in which Israel was constituted God's people.

It was no small matter to stand against the concentrated experience of the diplomatists and statesmen of the time; but it seemed as though these had become paralyzed and unable to guide the tempest-driven bark amid the contending seas. "All vision had become to them as a sealed book." "The wisdom of the wise perished, and the understanding of the prudent was hid." They thought themselves wiser than God, and dared to insinuate that the policy which Isaiah advocated was void of intelligence (v. 16). But the prophet foretold a time when he would be abundantly vindicated, when the deaf should hear and the blind see, when the meek and the poor should rejoice in the Holy One of Israel. God would redeem his people, and they would be led into a deeper reverence and awe of the God of their fathers.

TUESDAY, October 2. Isaiah xxx.

Isaiah's, or rather the Divine policy, as one has aptly put it, was one of non-alliance and non-intervention. It did not forbid commercial and friendly intercourse with foreign nations. On the contrary, it looked hopefully forward to the time when all kings and their subjects should acknowledge Jehovah, and flow into his house. He stood, as in the opening paragraphs of this chapter, against an alliance with Egypt, and urged the people to absolute trust in the protecting care of the Living God, who holds the nations in the hollow of his hand. He insisted that if only the nation were purified from idolatry, oppression, unrighteous trading, luxury, and lust, from the hypocrisies and shams of ceremonialism, there would be no need for standing armies and warlike weapons, because God would be their defence.

This was in the strict line of the teaching of Moses, who commanded the children of Israel to leave their cornfields and vineyards three times a year, to frequent the Temple feasts, though surrounded by tribes as hungry for loot as the Bedouin. They were assured that God would be their defence, and they were never disappointed. Only once in modern days has that most Christian policy been tried on a wide scale, when William Penn dared to establish the great State which bears his name on that basis.

Isaiah painted in lurid colours the inevitable results of the alliance-making policy of the time, and declared that God was "a God of method," and could only bless his people when they had forsaken all other reliance, and were fully surrendered to his reign. This is the explanation of some of the Divine delays that so sorely try our faith. God is waiting until we have reached such a position before Him that He can be gracious. O, return to Him from your wanderings for creature help, and rest in his will and power.

WEDNESDAY, October 3. Isaiah xxxi.

The prophet-statesman still protests against the alliance with Egypt, which was so popular at the Court. Some trusted in horses, and some in chariots, but he and the religious party which he led, and which embodied the noblest traditions of Israel, remembered and relied on the name of Jehovah. God would deliver his people with the superiority of a young lion guarding its prey from defenceless shepherds, and with the soft tenderness of the mother-bird settling down upon her brood; if only they would turn unto Him, from whom they had deeply revolted. Yes, the Assyrian would fall, though not by the sword of man. God, whose Shekinah-Fire shone perennially in Mount Zion, would strike the death-blow, beneath which the proud invasion would reel to dissolution.

How fond these Old Testament writers are of lifting the veil that divides the visible from the invisible, and showing us the Creator and Governor of the Universe at work in human affairs. They never weary of proving the truth of Joshua's dying speech: "One man of you shall chase a thousand; for the Lord your God, He it is that fighteth for you, as He spake unto you."

Child of God, you may have to face your Assyrian! Some masterful trouble may even at this moment be bearing down on you, like an armed man. But there is no reason for dismay. It is permitted that your faith should thus be tried; but dare to appropriate the sentence from the ancient liturgy, "There is none other that fighteth for us, but only Thou, O God."

THURSDAY, October 4. Isaiah xxxii.

How eagerly the prophets turn toward the eastern sky! Amid all the darkness they were as men that watch for the morning. Two cradle songs have lulled restless hearts to peace in every age—the golden age that is past, and the golden age that is to be. Note the combination of the King and the Man. The King reigns, but the Man is. Souls flee to the Man Christ Jesus because He has known the experiences of human life, and is able to be a hiding-place, a covert, rivers of water, and the shadow of a great rock from the scorching desert sun. How various are the experiences of life! For some, there is a great and strong wind that rends mountains and rocks; for others, the hurricane beneath which the masts bend almost to snapping. For these, the drought that staunches the streams; for those, the march over the monotonous sand-wastes. But whatever be the experience of any soul, the complement of its need is found in Jesus Christ; there is no lack to them that fear Him.

When a man is right with Christ, his judgments become rectified. He judges persons accurately. His standards become those of heaven. He no longer cringes to the churl or the vile. His heart becomes generous, and, in its very generosity, discovers the secret of immortal happiness.

So often in Scripture we find this combination of righteousness and peace, always in that order. Always Melchizedek, King of Salem. Always righteousness as the foundation of peace, whether of the heart, the home, or the country. God's peace is based upon the righteousness which was satisfied at the cross.

FRIDAY, October 5. Isaiah xxxiii.

When this chapter was written, the invasion of Sennacherib was near. Isaiah anticipates it. In the earlier verses he meditates the spoiling of Palestine. Then you hear the chant of the priests in the Temple, as they entreat Jehovah to be gracious to them, their arm and salvation in the time of trouble. Then there is the anticipation, that, in spite of all the Assyrian can do, God will give stability and abundance of salvation.

In vv. 7, 8, we have the story of devastation spread throughout the country, the highways vacated, and the land desolate. No harvest on the cornfields, no vintage in the vineyards, no olives for the press, the Vale of Sharon even like the desert of the Arabah. Still nearer in vv. 13, 14, the enemy approaches, till the sinners in Zion are afraid, and trembling surprises the godless ones.

Then in v. 14 there comes a change in the prophet's note. He dwells no longer on the foe, but magnifies the Divine protection which would be like a ring of devouring fire. The everlasting burnings of which he speaks have no reference to Gehenna, as is clear by a description of the people who are to dwell within them (vv. 15, 16, reminding us of Psalm xv. and xxiv.), but of the Shekinah of God's presence, which was to environ and encompass his people, intercepting the onset of their foes. How happy it is if character corresponds to the items of those two verses, and we may claim to dwell in the encircling care of God.

O beleaguered soul, your terror shall pass as a dream of night! You shall no longer dread the fierce people of deep speech. Though your Jerusalem has no river by nature, God will be around you as a place of broad rivers and streams. It is better to be without the river in which Babylon or Memphis delights, if its place is to be filled by the glorious Lord.

SATURDAY, October 6. Isaiah xxxiv.

This is a terrible chapter, describing the judgment of Edom. Israel never forgot the slight cast upon her weary children as they besought permission to march through Edom on their way to Palestine. There was constant feud between the two peoples, and one of the later Psalms asks that God would remember against the children of Edom the day of Jerusalem, when they said, "Raze her, raze her even to the foundations." Now Israel beholds the day of the Lord's vengeance, the year of recompense in the controversy of Zion.

The sword was to fall on Edom. The princes, compared to wild oxen and bulls, were to fall with lambs and goats, which stand for the lower classes. There was to be widespread and wholesale massacre; fire and sword should sweep from one end of the land to the other, and it should be left to perpetual desolation. Volney, the French traveller, tells us how absolutely these predictions have been fulfilled. He counted the ruins of some thirty cities in the wilderness to the south of the Dead Sea. The broken buildings are still the haunt of the wild beasts of the desert, and of vast swarms of unclean birds.

The literalness with which these predictions have been fulfilled startles us with a great fear for the sons of men, who seem to be courting destruction by their apathy and rebellion against God. If these predictions have been realized so literally with respect to the nations of the world, may not similar words be fulfilled with equal exactness of those who remain impenitent? We must never forget what Christ said about the fulfilment of the jots and tittles.

Other Lands.

The Needs of France.

(Concluded.)

THE late Dr. M'All, by his bright, simple gospel meetings, showed how to reach the people in the towns, especially the working classes, and many have through his means come to know and love the Saviour. His spirit was even more important than his method. A Frenchman, himself originally a convert of the mission, and now for many years a volunteer worker in it, remarked to me the other day that Dr. M'All had won more souls by his hand-grips than by his preaching. To self-sacrificing love, especially when allied to the genial manner that was Dr. M'All's remarkable gift, the French people are peculiarly susceptible.

It has now, however, become extremely difficult for an Englishman to work in France. The Roman Catholic hierarchy is well aware that most efforts for the evangelization of France are more or less dependent on British support. It has utilized every opportunity, therefore, of exciting ill-will against England, and of representing her as the national enemy. It accuses the Protestants of being the agents of England. Rome's first great opportunity in this respect arose out of of a few years ago, when English missionaries were represented as the determined enemies of French rule in Madagascar. Then came the anti-Semite agitation, with its remarkable development in the Dreyfus case. I think there can be little doubt that the real design of the clerical party in this crusade was to attack the Protestants, whom they fear and hate much more than they do the Jews. They have constantly tried to couple those two classes together as objects of popular distrust, but have been only very partially successful as regards the Protestants. These latter are generally known as peaceable, inoffensive neighbours; moreover, educated Frenchmen recognise that Louis XIV. made a huge blunder when he exiled from France the best and bravest of his subjects. I heard this stated by a learned professor at the Sorbonne when I was a student, and have lately heard it repeated by a commercial traveller in a railway carriage, both speakers being Catholics.

It must, then, be by French Protestants that France is to be evangelized, including in this term the converts from Romanism, who best know the real condition of their fellow-countrymen, though born Protestants have the advantage of having been taught the Scriptures from childhood. Many Protestants, even some who are themselves truly attached to their own religion, take little interest in, and have little faith in, the evangelization of their Catholic countrymen. But a better spirit is, I trust, gradually permeating which have been stirred by the news of remarkable popular movements towards the Gospel in some of the most Catholic districts of France. In such localities, the Gospel is represented by earnest and faithful men, whose life commends the truths they preach. Where there are Protestant communities containing a large proportion of merely nominal Christians, whose lives present little, if any, superiority as compared with those of their neighbours, conversions from Catholicism are rare.

I would appeal to British Christians, who owe a great debt to the exiled Huguenots, for much prayer on behalf of the Protestants of France. Among them, especially among their pastors and evangelists, are many truly spiritual Christians. But the great mass live far below their privileges. In visiting among these descendants of the Huguenots, one is sometimes constrained to ask: "Can these dry bones live?" Yes, they can, if only the Spirit of God shall enter into them. J. G. A

The Martyred Missionaries.

ARE we laying to heart as we should the sufferings of our beloved missionaries in China, seventy or eighty of whom, it is known, have been put to death, in some cases, after seeing their darling children slaughtered before their eyes, while many who escaped with their lives have been exposed to unspeakable indignities, and are at this moment bearing in their bodies "the marks of the Lord Jesus"?

Has there ever been such a thing in our day, and what are we, their own brethren and sisters, the members of the same family, saying or doing in the matter? If it be asked, what can we do? I would say, Much. We can weep with the anguish-stricken relatives at home, and cry ceaselessly to God on their behalf. We can pray, too, that neither they nor we may faint, that is, shrink back, because of these tribulations, "knowing that they were appointed thereunto." We can, at least those of us who are pastors, seek to stir up our several flocks, keeping them well informed, and using the present opportunity to awaken a deeper, tenderer, and more personal interest, not only in China, but in other parts of the world similarly dark. We might also provoke one another to praise and thanksgiving for the Christian constancy exhibited, not only by the missionaries, but by the native Christians under their charge. We might set apart a Missionary Sunday, devoting a whole day to the subject, in its bearing alike upon the saved and the unsaved in our congregations. This would enable us to correct many false impressions which, it is feared, prevail, concerning missions in China, and their connection, directly or indirectly, with the recent outbreak.

Further, we could do very much to cheer and encourage the secretaries of the various Evangelical Missionary Societies. Few know the pain and strain which they and their advisers are feeling just now. I could say much more, but leave room for other pens worthier and abler than mine, only adding that I feel it an intensely solemn matter to have come to such a day as this, and I keep hearing the words of the Master in his touching appeal to his own disciples, "What, could ye not watch with me one hour?"—Yours very faithfully,

FRANK H. WHITE.

Talbot Tabernacle, Notting Hill.

P.S.—I should like to ask prayer for my dear friend, Dr. Edwards, who left England on Saturday last for China vid New York. His painful and delicate mission is to ascertain particulars concerning the reported martyrdom of his fellow-missionaries in the Shan-si province, including the dear Piggotts.

DR. A. G. PARROTT.

In a letter from Hankow, dated August 9, Dr. Parrott says:

"You will have heard, ere this, that we have safely reached the treaty ports, and are now fairly safe. But there is terrible excitement all over the Empire.

"The departure of hundreds of missionaries, and the massacre and murder of dozens of others all over the land, has greatly added to the terror. Lao-ho-Kou remained quiet, but the officials were anxious, and guarded us night and day. We were only ten miles from the Honan border, which province seems to be in a state of rebellion. The missionaries have escaped with only their lives after most awful sufferings. I have heard from the lips of five of them stories which would touch the pity of the hardest. All their houses and halls are destroyed. Even in this Hupeh Province, where the Viceroy Chang Chih Tung lives, nearly all the halls and houses have been plundered, but no lives are lost. Near us five Roman Catholic places were attacked, and largely destroyed. We have not heard of the massacre of any in this province, but in many others it is terrible.

"The heat is intense. Few of us can sleep at night. Ethel had fever on the boat, but was well again when we reached Hankow. Miss Logan is ill now. It is fever, but I hope not enough to detain us here more than a day or two. Seventy missionaries and others arrived from the West yesterday; 120 others are soon expected. All the ladies are ordered away from the river ports. But for this I should prefer to stay here till the storm is over.

"Shanghai is extremely congested, and in a state of scare possible only in a treaty port in China. Living there is so expensive that hundreds are, like ourselves, perplexed. More than 1,000 have gone to Japan, but there the cost of living is much greater than usual. The missionary societies are seeking to provide lodgings for their people—no easy thing. Every house in Shanghai seems to be over-full now, and many are living on boats. Since I began this letter one of the small halls on the streets of Hankow (Han-yang) was attacked at midday by 200 men and badly damaged. Soldiers came, and instantly dispersed the crowd."

THE CHINA INLAND MISSION.

A Shanghai telegram received in London on September 20 states: "Mr. J. Young, Miss Troyer (now Mrs. Young), murdered July 16, with Mr. G. McConnell [and] party."

Miss Proctor's Syrian Schools

IT is now about fifteen years since Miss Proctor opened a Mission Boarding School for Girls in Schwifat, in order to win them for Christ, and train them as teachers. The difficulties in the beginning were legion, but faith and courage overcame all obstacles. The success of the work has surprised the most sanguine expectations.

During these years over 300 girls have passed through the girls' school. A large number of these have been trained as teachers, and thirty-five are at the present time teaching for various missionary societies in Egypt, Palestine, and Syria. The education and training given to the girls are thorough.

Although seventy-one years of age, Miss Proctor superintends everything, as well as teaches five hours daily. Her energy and love of work are extraordinary. Nothing could better illustrate this than her recent achievements on behalf of her boys' boarding school. The parents often wished Miss Proctor to undertake the training of their boys, and she was first induced to receive very young boys who, while living in a separate building, were taught with the girls. But when the boys reached ten years of age, Miss Proctor had to part with them. This was a great trial, as in many cases they went to the Jesuits. Hence there arose a longing desire to erect a building where boys could remain until their education was complete. Miss Proctor purchased the girls' school with her own money; with additional class rooms, &c., it cost over £1,000. But in the case of the boys' school, the upper storey of which has just been completed, she has had to appeal for help to friends in England, and they have responded very nobly. Now there is accommodation for sixty students.

The work is not simply two large educational institutions worked on mission principles, but it is a real centre of life and activity, where the one end of every effort is the salvation of souls. Miss Proctor herself does a large amount of medical work amongst the women and children, especially amongst the Druse women, who are not allowed to see male doctors. Two Bible women also visit from house to house.

There are branches of the Y.W.C.A. and the Y.M.C.A., and as a result of varied efforts, many souls have passed from darkness into light, and many have whole-heartedly consecrated themselves to the Lord. Miss Proctor has been assisted from the beginning of the work by Pastor Said, who has been to her not only a helper, but as a son. His ability in teaching and in business matters, and above all, his high and thoroughly reliable character, make him an invaluable and indispensable associate in the work.

While Miss Proctor gives her services freely, and nearly £100 subscription yearly, the remainder of the expenses are dependent on the free will offerings of God's people.

The Metropolitan Tabernacle.

RE-OPENING SERVICES.

THE inaugural services in connection with the re-opening of "Spurgeon's Tabernacle" awoke tender and fragrant memories in the minds of very many who were privileged to attend. The resuscitation of the famous temple where the Gospel had been proclaimed for so long and with such by Charles Haddon Spurgeon evoked, in the natural order of things, expressions of the deepest thankfulness and praise.

Pastor Thomas Spurgeon was the recipient of congratulations and good wishes on every hand, and the gatherings have been characterized, thus far, not only by vast attendances and by addresses of helpfulness and conspicuous ability, but by the old-time, whole-hearted insistence on foundation truths, which has always been associated with the Metropolitan Tabernacle.

On Wednesday, Sept. 19, the opening day, the first service was of a devotional character, and was conducted by Pastor A. G. Brown. After silent prayer, Pastor Thomas Spurgeon read two or three verses of Scripture, one being: "The Lord hath done great things for us, whereof we are glad." Numbers of congratulatory telegrams were pouring in, but he only read one of them. It expressed "Loving congratulations and an earnest desire for the presence and blessing of God at the meetings," and was signed simply "Mother." This message was, of course, from

MRS. C. H. SPURGEON.

The gathering was briefly addressed by Rev. James Stephens (Highgate Road), who emphasized the fact that doctrinally the church stood where it had always done, and prayed that it might ever remain true to the old paths. Pastor F. H. White (Talbot Tabernacle) followed with interesting reminiscences. On Monday, March 25, 1861—he thought that was the date—he listened to C. H. Spurgeon, as he preached his first sermon in the old Tabernacle. The text was, "Daily in the temple they ceased not to teach and to preach Jesus Christ."

Pastor A. G. Brown, speaking briefly on two or three occasions during the meeting, said that a simultaneous gathering was being held in Dublin by Pastor Hugh D. Brown. As to the Tabernacle, history repeated itself, and he believed it was repeating itself there. The Lord sent Haggai to his people, and he gave them a prescription which very soon altered the mingled experience of Ezra ii., "My Spirit remaineth with you, fear not." Thus might history repeat itself in the Tabernacle. The old house which many of them knew had been swept away by fire, and no doubt it was only natural that some should say, "How can the new house ever have the GLORY OF THE OLD?"

With the commencement of the work there might have been an intermingling of grief and joy, but Haggai had come and said, "My Spirit remaineth with you," and while the Holy Ghost dwelt in a church, all was well.

Mr. Ira D. Sankey expressed the satisfaction it afforded him to be present in the new Tabernacle, as he had had great pleasure in being in the old. He brought the greetings of ten thousand friends beyond the sea, among them Dr. T. L. Cuyler, who sent them his love and his great rejoicing that the building had been reconstructed. The last time he (Mr. Sankey) had stood there, was to sing a song over the dead body of the greatest preacher of the nineteenth century. He felt sad as he thought of the two mighty men who had passed away—

C. H. SPURGEON AND D. L. MOODY.

We are left to carry on their work. Mr. Sankey then sang "The Better Land." Among others who took part were Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, Pasteur Saillens, and Rev. Charles Spurgeon. The latter closed the service, praying that the building might be re-consecrated, and accepted by God as an offering of love from thousands.

In the afternoon the Tabernacle was full, save for a few seats in the top gallery. A powerful sermon on Dan. xii. 3, was preached by Rev. John Thomas (Myrtle Street, Liverpool). His voice was at first extremely weak, owing to recent illness, but in due course it gathered strength, and the congregation was much affected by the impressive utterance.

Mr. Thomas expressed his conviction that the Book of Daniel would emerge from the fiery furnace of criticism with no greater loss than the three Hebrew children sustained from the fires of Nebuchadnezzar. The book moves along a platform which takes in all life. It revels in the roll of ages; it is a book of the nations, a charter of the human race. The prophet saw that not in swift ease would God's dominion arise, but through the troubles of centuries. But whatever confusion might obtain in the world, God's purpose is unchangeable.

After declaring that those who are truly wise are of the grandest type of character, and that to turn many to righteousness is the greatest of all tasks, Mr. Thomas said that in that new Tabernacle memories of the old crowd upon the mind. They remembered the great preacher who devoted his gifts and his consecrated life to turning the many to righteousness. He swerved neither to the right hand nor to the left, and thousands heard him to the salvation of their souls. That fact and that ideal he had handed to his Church and his beloved sons—unto the pastor. "Let me call him by the name by which he is known and beloved—

TOM SPURGEON!

Surely if it were possible to receive a message that afternoon from father to son, and from pastor to people, it would at least in essence be this—They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever."

After the collection, which was for the extension of the schools, Mr. Sankey sang, "We shall meet beyond the river, by and by," the refrain being taken up at his direction by various parts of the huge congregation.

In the evening the building was filled an hour before the hour fixed for commencing the meeting. Sir George Williams, who presided, in the course of a brief address invoked God's blessing on every department of "this fountain of life."

On rising to speak, Pastor Thomas Spurgeon was received with enthusiasm. He said he desired to thank the many friends who had been raised up to send succour and to say "We will see you through in this matter." Sister churches and churches of other denominations had helped them; some of them even had given liberally and cheerfully. He also expressed his thanks to the Press for the great interest they had taken in this great enterprise. In the letters sent to him containing contributions there were the kindest references to his late father. Almost everyone had spoken of his wonderful ministry and the spiritual food he provided, which was still available through his published sermons. Regarding the future—as God enabled him, he would go on preaching the old Gospel and working along the old lines.

A solo by Mr. Sankey came next—"When the mists have rolled away," the crowded audience—now the upper gallery, and now the whole congregation—joining in the chorus. Dr. Monro Gibson, who followed with an earnest speech, declared his belief that the evangelical forces were never stronger than now—but they need to be more united. Pastors Charles Spurgeon and C. B. Sawday, Dr. John Robertson, and Mr. George Cadbury, also spoke.

The services were continued on Thursday, which was the Pastor's birthday. As on the first day, the morning gathering was a devotional meeting. Rev. F. B. Meyer presided, and there was a very good attendance. Early in the service was sent on behalf of the meeting to Mrs. C. H. Spurgeon, who, the chairman said, was very weak and low.

Pastor T. Spurgeon returned thanks on behalf of his mother, and said he had had a message from her conveying her birthday congratulations to their pastor, and enclosing a kind gift to the birthday fund. She said that as the occasion was so very special, and had so much interest attaching to it, she would double the usual amount. He mentioned that partly by way of example. The birthday occasion was next formally remembered by the audience, who at the call of Mr. Meyer rose to their feet and wished Mr. Spurgeon "Many happy returns of the day."

Mr. Meyer proceeded to make his opening address. Everybody must be struck, he said, with the artistic beauty of the Tabernacle, and must rejoice that the outlines of the old building were so carefully preserved. He brought congratulations from his own people at Christ Church, and also from the neighbouring Free Churches. The sorrow of the Tabernacle had been the sorrow of the other Churches, and the depression that had rested upon their work had been felt by them all. The Free Churches of the district were looking forward to a more prosperous winter than ever, because the Tabernacle had renewed its youth. The remarkable thing that must arrest any thoughtful man entering that structure was the absence of anything like the altar, or the lights, or the priesthood, or anything that might

SAVOUR OF THE SACRAMENTARIAN.

The very simplicity of the place witnessed to their faith in the finished work of Jesus Christ. He rejoiced in the vastness of that structure, because he was persuaded that many people drifted in with a great audience who might be wary of entering into a smaller place, where they might be more noticed and observed. They entrusted the pastor and the workers in that Tabernacle to the love, and blessing, and power of God.

Rev. Robert Taylor, of Norwood, followed with an address expressing the joy felt by all of them, not merely that the Tabernacle had been rebuilt, but that the spirit and the spiritual prosperity associated with the first building would, so far as they knew, crown and glorify the second.

The next speaker, Rev. A. Connell, declared they were all conscious that not only all evangelical forces in this country, but all evangelical Christendom, had a stake in that place. But he should like them to allow their vision even a further range than that, and to believe with him that the also had a stake in those celebrations. The speaker then referred to the spirit of devoutness which ought to pervade the Tabernacle if they were to make it truly a temple of God. There was a certain help to the spirit of devoutness in the sense that they had found a spiritual Sabbath home. He did not believe very much in vagrant Christianity. It was a very real element in the spirit of Christianity that founded a beautiful house such as that—the courts of the Lord's house, where they found the conditions under which the spirit of God could best reach their hearts.

After encouraging words from Dr. Harry Guinness, Mr. Sankey sang "I'm a Pilgrim," mentioning that he was taught it by his mother, who still lingered on the shores of time at the age of ninety, and then related an experience he had with the late Mr. C. H. Spurgeon. He happened to be on his way to Germany, and attended the Tabernacle one Sunday to hear Mr. Spurgeon preach. Being discovered in his pew by the preacher, he was asked to see him after the service. Mr. Spurgeon then to the meeting at night and sing, and explained that he was to preach a sermon upon a bill then in Parliament concerning the British soldier. He had looked into the bill, and he saw a sermon in it, and he thought that if Mr. Sankey came and sang "Hold the Fort," he would get through the sermon all right. Mr. Sankey had accordingly consented to sing, and he gave the famous hymn, the audience joining in the chorus, "and," added Mr. Sankey, "such a chorus I never heard before."

In the afternoon the chief feature was a reception, in the Lower Hall, by Pastor and Mrs. Thomas Spurgeon. There was a constant stream of people desirous of offering their congratulations, and numerous gifts were made to the Birthday Fund, which, according to custom, is allocated to the various institutions of the Tabernacle as the pastor may direct.

In the evening an immense congregation assembled—so large that many persons could find only standing room—to hear Rev. J. H. Jowett, of Birmingham, who based his sermon on Eph. i. 7, 8. Mr. Jowett dwelt chiefly on the word Grace—what it is, and what it can do. It is not a of God. Grace is infinitely more than a smile; it is unspeakable and transcendent energy. Thought is an energy which enters into, and operates in, common life. The thought in the mind comes out in the life. So grace is tremendously real, operating on and energising the life. It forgives sin. The word sin is not liked to-day. It will not often be found in the modern novel or modern newspaper. Men to-day want a phrase to apply to their deformities, and a catalogue of terms can be given for this good old Biblical word, sin. Sin, says one philosophy, is the result of imperfect knowledge; and another says sin is inevitable so long as we are incorporated with this sensuous frame. The Bible says sin dwells in man and becomes his master; he becomes dead in sin, and to this sin-poisoned world there flows the

OCEAN TIDE OF GOD'S GRACE.

If this redeeming energy of grace comes to our lives, it brings liberation from the guilt and power of sin, also wisdom and the power of a fruitful application of truth to the varied exigences of daily life.

At the close Mr. Sankey sang Fanny Crosby's hymn, "Saved by Grace," asking the vast congregation to join in the chorus, which they did with remarkable effect.

Friday night's gathering was as hearty and impressive as any of the preceding meetings. Mr. T. A. Denny presided, and the Tabernacle was again filled. The chairman, in the course of a brief address, expressed his admiration for the building, his satisfaction at finding that the son of C. H. Spurgeon was receiving such whole-hearted support. Rev. John Bond offered the congratulations of the Wesleyan Churches, and Rev. Dr. Hanson, of Marylebone, made some interesting remarks from a Presbyterian point of view, appreciative of the theological views which Mr. C. H. Spurgeon had held.

Mr. Sankey chose for his solo, "Throw out the Life Line." It was given very effectively. Next came Pastor Thos. Spurgeon, with for the financial aid accorded by many friends on the preceding day. The "birthday offerings" received on behalf of the Tabernacle and its institutions had amounted to nearly £500.

Other speakers were Pasteur Saillens, representing the Baptist Churches of France; Rev. E. E. Tarbox, who voiced the congratulations and good wishes of Baptist village churches; and Dr. Harry Guinness; the final item in the programme being a beautiful rendering, by Mr. Sankey, of "What shall the harvest be?"

On Saturday evening public enthusiasm fairly surpassed itself. Mr. Sankey gave his popular "Service of Sacred Song and Story," to an audience which crammed the great building in every part. People had begun to assemble some hours before the time of commencement, and hundreds were unable to obtain admission.

Mr. Sankey, in the course of his address, sang "Saved for Grace," "There'll be no dark valley when Jesus comes," "My ain Countrie," and the ever welcome "Ninety and Nine." The enthusiasm of the congregation can hardly be exaggerated. Mr. Sankey introduced a number of reminiscences connected with the authorship of both words and music of these Gospel songs, and spoke words of ENCOURAGEMENT TO CHRISTIAN WORKERS.

He denied that there had been any misunderstanding between Mr. Moody and himself. The cause of his absence from some of Mr. Moody's later meetings in this country was that he had gone to America, at Mr. Moody's own request, in order to arrange the Northfield Convention for that year.

In thanking Mr. Sankey for his address and solos, Pastor C. B. Sawday suggested that Pastor Thomas Spurgeon and Mr. Sankey should conduct a ten days' mission there. In reply, Mr. Sankey said he was pledged to numerous engagements all over the country, and he could not yet promise to come. But if he did return to London, he would come to the Tabernacle.

were attended by large congregations, many persons standing throughout the services, both morning and evening. In the afternoon, Rev. J. Tolefree Parr conducted a service for children, who crowded the building from end to end, and Mr. Sankey sang.

Pastor T. Spurgeon, in the course of his sermon in the morning, said that language seemed too weak to express his depth of feeling. God had been very good to them. He had accepted their gifts, and had crowned their efforts. It was not to be wondered at if they were a little excited, but with all their gratitude he warned them not to forget to be humble. They had only done that which it was their duty to do, and in doing that there had been many faults. This house, free of all encumbrance, had been given to them by God; let them not cease to praise his name.

On Monday evening there was again a large attendance, the occasion being a public meeting, at which a number of ministers, of various denominations, spoke words of encouragement.

Rev. Dr. Newman Hall recalled, with great pleasure, the occasions on which he had preached in the old building, and went on to advocate a more frequent interchange of pulpits. He had never heard a minister accentuate differences of opinion when preaching in a pulpit of another denomination.

Rev. Marcus Rainsford, the well-known vicar of St. James', Holloway, said he would try to bear the wrath of a man who had told him that he ought to be ashamed of identifying himself with Baptists. He felt it an honour to be there. He felt it a high honour to say that the late Mr. Spurgeon was a personal friend of his. When he was at Brixton Church, Mr. Spurgeon would sometimes lunch with him on Sunday. "Tell me," Mr. Spurgeon would say, "what you are going to preach about to-night, and I will tell you," and when they had exchanged confidences, he would ask the Great Father to bless the services of the evening. It was a wonderful thing to see a great man like a little child. To know Spurgeon was to love him. His message that night would be to launch out into the deep.

Others who took part included Pastor Thomas Spurgeon, Revs. Ossian Davies (Paddington Congregational Church), David Davies (Brighton), and W. Y. Fullerton (Leicester), while Madame Annie Ryall and Mr. Chamberlain delighted the congregation with their singing.

Mr. Sankey's Movements.

THE interest manifested in the movements of Mr. Ira D. Sankey continues to grow, and it is clear that the affectionate regard in which the evangelist is held by vast numbers of people in this country has by no means waxed cold with the lapse of time.

It is a very difficult matter, indeed, to find halls large enough to accommodate anything like the number of people who, either for the first time or to renew hallowed memories of bygone days, flock to hear, under such striking circumstances, the which have played so important a part in the great revivals associated with the names of Messrs. Moody and Sankey, and which have been the means of carrying the message of salvation on the wings of melody to countless thousands.

The most recent manifestations of this spirit of recognition and appreciation have been in connection with the opening services of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, and at the Great Assembly Hall, Mile End. The account of the Tabernacle gatherings which appears in another column will convey some idea of the extent to which the occasion was helped by Mr. Sankey's presence. On Saturday evening, at what was practically the first public gathering of a general character subsequent to the actual opening meetings, Mr. Sankey's Service of Sacred Song and Story drew an audience which packed the building in every part, while, after the doors were shut, hundreds lingered long in the vicinity in the hope of obtaining admission.

After the Exeter Hall experience, with its memories of thousands on thousands of disappointed people turning homewards, unable to get near the entrance, it was wise, as well as profitable to the Tabernacle, to charge for admission; but this seemed to make no difference in the numbers attending. The service, with its wealth of reminiscence concerning blessed days of revival, was one not merely of interest, but of spiritual stimulus. It brought encouragement to the hearts of many workers to hear the veteran survivor of the most fruitful evangelistic combination of our time, declare, with the ring of sincerity in his words, his belief that the old Gospel had of its power, and urge his hearers to fresh efforts in plain, direct, earnest evangelism.

The expression of sympathetic feeling when Pastor Sawday suggested an evangelistic mission at the Tabernacle, to be conducted by Messrs. Sankey and Thomas Spurgeon, was remarkable. It evidenced respect and love for both Mr. Sankey and Mr. Spurgeon. It did more. It proved a wide-spread and fervent desire for a revival of evangelistic work on the old-fashioned lines, which, again and again, have been used of God in the salvation of the great crowds outside the pale of church influences. We understand that Mr. Sankey was much affected by the incident, confirming, as it did, his own aspiration and endeavour to make the service, by the Divine blessing, a spiritual help to the multitude.

Owing to prearranged engagements, however, Mr. Sankey was unable to accept the cordial invitation of the pastors and their congregation, but he expressed the hope that he might be able to comply with their wish at some later period.

The crowded meeting at the Great Assembly Hall on Monday evening was a repetition of that of Saturday night at the Metropolitan Tabernacle. The hall was filled, and the song and story began at seven instead of eight, as announced; thousands being unable to obtain admission. One feature of these sympathetic addresses has been Mr. Sankey's warm and loving testimony to the high qualities of his leader and friend, Mr. D. L. Moody.

Many of our readers will be glad to know Mr. Sankey's fixtures for the immediate future. They are as follows: Wed., Oct. 3, Leeds (Oxford Place Chapel); Thurs., Oct. 4, Middlesbrough (Temperance Hall); Sun., Oct. 7, afternoon and evening, Sunderland (Victoria Hall); Tues., Oct. 9, Newcastle-on-Tyne (Brunswick Chapel); Thurs., Oct. 11, South Shields; Sun., Oct. 14, North Berwick (two meetings); Tues., Oct. 16, Edinburgh; Thurs., Oct. 18, Dundee; Sun., Oct. 21, Greenock (Town Hall, at 9.30 a.m. and 7 p.m.).

North London Convention.

THE opening meetings of the North London Convention were held at St. Peter's, Islington, on Monday, September 24. The vicar, Rev. F. Trevelgan Snow, presided.

At the first meeting the desire of many hearts for this convention found expression in the words which Rev. F. S. Webster gave as a motto from Col. i. 18., "That in all things He might have the pre-eminence." It should be our chief desire, he said, not merely to enjoy the meetings, but to seek to satisfy Christ's purposes regarding us. So far beyond our own, it should be our thought that He is looking, longing, expecting; let us not disappoint Him.

From Col. iii. 18, Mr. Webster pointed out that Christ should have supremacy in the details of daily life. "Whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus." He showed (1) that it was not an extravagant demand, for we are therefore by right. In laying down his life as the price of life for us, He gave his all. Surely our return to Him should be in some proportion. It is but our "reasonable service" to glorify Him in our bodies and our spirits, which are his. It is (2) not an impossible command. "It is not so much a matter of outward profession, but of inward method and principle." It means that the thought of pleasing Him should be at the back of all we do. This must be our master motive; and that this may be so Jesus Christ must be very real to us. A constant vision of Christ is the secret by which we may be enabled to obey this command.

Certainly (3) the command is not irksome. The duties performed without Him are those which leave behind a sense of emptiness and of dissatisfaction. Nor need there be discouragement that opportunities of service are not great. The command is inclusive when it bids us "do all in the name of the Lord Jesus."

At the evening meeting, Mr. Webster took as his subject, Rom. vi. 11, "Reckon ye . . . yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord." He showed that it is as—by faith—we reckon ourselves dead to sin that we give God the opportunity to make it experimentally true to us by the power of the Holy Ghost. And it is only as we reckon this to be possible that we give full value to the death of Jesus for us. God's grace is to abound both for the forgiveness and removal of our guilt, and also for emancipation from the power of sin; and we limit his grace if we accept the one, but will not believe for the other. Justification is a righteous ground for our acceptance with God, but the object of our acceptance is that we may walk with God. We need not only to have Christ imputed to us as our righteousness, but as our life. The captious critic may say, "If there is forgiveness, let me then continue in sin that grace may abound." But a sight of the exceeding sinfulness of sin will lead us to say "God forbid;" for when once we realize the full meaning of the Cross, it will be impossible to allow any complacency towards sin. It is the life of Jesus that we need as an expulsive power; not more effort, but greater abundance of life. Therefore v. 11 may and should be our present experience, and we may claim from God that the fullest meaning of the word "freed" in vv. 7 and 18 may be ours—"freed" in regard to justification (marg.), and in its fuller meaning of emancipation (v. 18, Gk.).

The Convention meetings are spread over five days—until Friday, Sept. 28.

A Village Experience.

MAY I, at the close of another holiday season, again ask you to draw the attention of Christian workers to the condition of many of our rural parishes, with the hope that those who have lately found but small openings for usefulness in our crowded watering-places, may next year see their way to visit some lonely village where the simple Gospel is seldom heard.

We took a house quite in the country for two months, where we were perfect strangers, and, as good church people, attended Sunday morning service. Some seventy or eighty were present, which we were told was about the average, and that hundreds never entered a place of worship; for the population was 1,300, and there was no Dissenting chapel.

The landowner was non-resident. The vicar a member of the English Church Union, with vestments, side chapel, &c. On one side the adjoining parish adopts the eastward position, and also the next beyond it. On the other side, the nearest vicar is a member of the "Holy Cross," and "Confraternity of the Blessed Sacrament," and the one beyond, "English Church Union" again.

We had some cards printed and distributed in the village announcing an open-air service every Sunday evening, a quarter of an hour after the Church began—in the centre of the place where the young men pass their time on Sundays.

We found a Christian family in the parish who helped us much with the singing and harmonium, and we also received important assistance from a retired minister of Lady Huntingdon's Connexion, who had lately been led to purchase a house in the parish, although himself a stranger to it. But on the Saturday a letter came from the vicar in which he says: "I must respectfully, but very firmly, enter my protest against your holding any service, or preaching in this parish, without—(a) The authority in writing of the Bishop of the Diocese; and (b) The consent of myself as Incumbent of the parish, placed there by the authorities in Church and State, and invested by the Church, through the Bishop, with the cure of souls therein. P.S.—I purpose sending a copy of this letter to the Bishop, together with any reply," &c.

Yet the attendance at this and at all meetings was most encouraging, nearly half were young men, and when they came they stayed.

The Sunday following, as we were opening the meeting, we were stopped by a policeman, who stated that the vicar had sent him to protest, and to show us the "Bye Laws" of the county, which he, the vicar, had specially marked for us.

I read, "No person shall sound or play upon any musical instrument in any street within 100 yards of any church," &c. We could not see the church, which was hidden behind some houses—we paced the distance, and found we were only ninety-eight yards off, so we moved two yards and satisfied the Law.

This did not happen in the South of Ireland, but near the centre of England. Since we left, the meetings have been continued in the minister's hayloft, and fifty attended the first Sunday to join in Lady Huntingdon's form of worship.—Yours respectfully,

Alex. H. Hutchinson, Major-General
Cavendish Place, Bath.

Progress in Basutoland.

WRITING from Thaba Bosiu, Rev. E. Jacottet, of the Paris Evangelical Mission, acknowledges the help afforded by friends who support native workers. "We have (he says) now 156 out-stations, but we ought to have at least fifty more, in order to reach all the people. The catechists are paid by what we call "Caisse Centrale," or "Sustentation Fund," which receives £1,200 or £1,300 from our churches, besides the money from London, Glasgow, and Edinburgh. We will try to raise our income to pay the catechists a little better, and to found new out-stations. But we still need outside help. Our Christians have given this year over £2,500 in contributions, which is rather much, when we know how poor they are.

"God has allowed us to go on and increase. We have passed through troublous times. The country has been more than we in great danger from the Boers, who first tried to induce the Basutos to rebel against England and to foster civil war, and afterwards seemed disposed to invade the country. God has protected us, and we hope now all danger is over."

Rev. R. Henry Dyke, writing from Morija, also thanks the London Auxiliary for financial assistance. He says:—"Many of our out-stations have very bad buildings. You often find the evangelist living in a round hut, holding services in the open air. Some who have cottages with two or three rooms, have to devote one of these to the school. If only some friends could undertake what a help this would be, and what worry the missionary would be saved! The question of maintenance is no doubt a great one, but the other gives more thought and attention. We are thankful to see the blessing of God resting on the work. Souls are saved, and believers are built up and strengthened in their faith.

"At our last Conference the statistics showed a considerable increase all along the line. This was most remarkable, for, with war surrounding us and the outlets from this country closed, we feared that the minds of people would be turned to other matters rather than those of their eternal welfare. To a certain extent this has been the case, especially with the men. Three weeks ago I went to our out-station at Masite. I then baptized nineteen women, all converts from heathenism, but not one man. Some of these I did not expect would leave the world, but the power of the Cross knows no limits. The most remarkable case of and its attractions which has come under my notice for a long time is that of old Rantaopan, who is to be baptized in two months. He is an old man of over 100 years of age. He lived near my father's station at Hermon fifty years ago, and we thought him one of the hardest men in the district. He was already a grandfather. Until his conversion he was a great Kaffir-beer drinker. He had four or five wives, and insisted on all the heathen rites being carried out in his village. When I was out preaching in the villages, I always made a point of visiting him, but it seemed to me that he was too old and hardened ever to understand the Gospel. Now, however, he is not only one of the most regular attendants at the daily prayer meeting held by an elder near his house, but he has completely broken with the beer drinking and heathen customs. The elder was telling me a few days ago that he puts all the younger people to shame by his zeal. It is worth while to work for years to see one such case.

"Unfortunately, there are others who had given us hopes of being truly saved who have not been able to resist the world. Moleko, a man living near Rantaopan, joined us eighteen months ago. I now hear that the numerous heathen feasts held lately have been too much for him; he has been seen drinking Kaffir beer, and eating meat sacrificed to "the spirits." This means the "down grade," and I fear we shall lose him. I shall be very sorry, for I like him very much, and he is a man of some influence. These deceptions are a great trial to the missionary. Pray for us, dear friend, that we faint not."

The hon. secretary and treasurer of the London Auxiliary of the Basutoland Mission, is Mrs. Sutherland Taylor, 32, Boresford Road, Canonbury, N.

We understand that the annual sale on behalf of the work, by kind permission of the committee of the Home "Bienvenue" for Foreign Governesses, will be held on Thursday, November 1, at 2, Colville Houses, Talbot Road, Bayswater, W.

The Indian Famine.

THROUGH the free-will offerings of readers of The Christian, and the liberality of many leading manufacturers of concentrated foods, condensed milk, biscuits, cocoa, &c., we have been enabled to send large consignments of these supplies to Bombay, from whence they have been distributed amongst 130 missionaries and workers, including Government officials, in the famine-stricken districts.

Dr. Colin Valentine, Rev. Dennis Osborne, and many of the missionaries have testified to the immense blessing which these valuable foods have been to the perishing, and it is cheering to know that the lives of have been saved. Through the generosity of the P. and O. Steamship Company, hundreds of cases of these goods have been landed freight free in Bombay, and through the intervention of the Viceroy duty free.

Mr. T. M. Carroll, Manager of Messrs. Wm. Watson and Co.'s Bombay Branch, has volunteered his invaluable services, in receiving in a strictly business form, the various shipments, and, by the help of Rev. Dennis Osborne, in seeing to their despatch to those numerous missionaries by the State railways, carriage free, also through Lord Curzon's influence.

We are persevering in our efforts to obtain further consignments of foods on the same liberal terms as heretofore.

Mr. Osborne has reminded us that, now the winter is drawing on, another prime necessity for the comfort, the health, and lives of the tens of thousands of our naked fellow-subjects, is CLOTHING. We look forward hopefully to our appeal for supply of this crying need being met as cheerfully and promptly as that of the foods.

We shall look to the many Christian mothers and children coming to our help in this new and deeply interesting effort for the comfort of the orphans and others who, were their needs left unthought of and unsupplied, would be exposed to months of shivering in the cold night and day.

We expect, from the various plans we are setting in motion, to have the privilege of shipping hundreds of bales of blankets, rugs, shawls, and such clothing, and, in addition, bales of unbleached cotton and other cheap and useful materials, which we expect to be able to buy or otherwise obtain on favourable terms from manufacturers and merchants. Of course, contributions in money we shall be able to turn to good account in the purchase of the above.

REV. DENNIS OSBORNE'S VISIT.

No time has been lost by Rev. Dennis Osborne, of Poona, in voicing the claims of the starving, plague-smitten millions of our great Eastern dependency.

Mr. Osborne has already addressed a number of meetings in his important mission of stimulating public opinion, and calling attention to the urgent character of the present need. The address given by Mr. Osborne at the noon prayer meeting at the Aldersgate Street Y.M.C.A. on Monday last was a review, in vivid and convincing terms, of the present position. After expressing the gratitude felt by missionaries and people for above referred to, Mr. Osborne described the present famine as the most terrible of the century, and, in order to convey some slight idea of its ravages, he described a ride through the country in the neighbourhood of Dohad, Gujarat. At the railway station they were met by clamouring, famine-stricken beggars. Before the travellers had proceeded a hundred yards, they saw a poor creature, almost a skeleton, dragging his emaciated form towards them.

With an obeisance, he pleaded pitifully for food. A few yards further on, another poor creature, similarly weak, lay across the road in a swoon. Lifting him into a cart, Mr. Osborne and his friend had him conveyed to a place of safety, and fed. Close by, again, a poor woman lay in a field by the road-side, entirely naked, with her bones starting out of her skin; she had an infant, gasping for breath, by her side. Still a few yards further on, another poor, naked woman lay dead, the corpse presenting a shocking appearance. It was with deep feeling that Mr. Osborne proceeded to describe the spectacle he witnessed of a woman's corpse half devoured by dogs, who were still at their ghastly work.

The state of the orphan children was also described. Hundreds, indeed thousands of boy and girl waifs, wander hither and thither through the afflicted districts. Mr. Osborne visited a poor house where there were 700 to 800 young children, but he found they were all boys. In tones of deep indignation he now repeated the question he had put to the native official in charge:

WHERE ARE THE GIRLS?

The official had said that "their parents or relatives had taken care of them," but this was undoubtedly false. The girls had been secured by agents for houses of ill-fame. Missionaries of various denominations have rescued not fewer than 10,000 little ones, and these must be fed, clothed, and trained. Many of them have come through trials almost passing belief. On one occasion a young girl, stripped and almost strangled, was held over a fire to roast by her hunger-maddened mother. The child was rescued, and is now being cared for in one of the orphanages of the Methodist Episcopal Mission. The duty of supporting the children is an obligation which has been taken up in reliance upon the generosity of Christians at home.

In dealing with the present condition of the country, Mr. Osborne said the impression is abroad, that, because rains have fallen, the famine is at an end, and that there is therefore no need for further relief measures. So far from this being the case, India was NEVER IN SORER NEED.

Many of the cultivators of the soil have died; the cattle, also, have perished; the ploughing inplements have been soiled or burned, and only one-tenth of the affected area will be tilled. Even the next harvest, scanty as it must therefore be, will not be available until November, so that the enfeebled population, already on the verge of starvation, must perish in sight of harvest, unless prompt and liberal help be forthcoming. Prior to sailing for England, Mr. Osborne had a conference with Lord Curzon (who has dealt with the famine crisis in a large-hearted spirit, and with great ability), in the course of which the Viceroy expressed the fervent hope that the people of England would come to see that help must on no account be stayed, or dire calamity will result. Lord Northcote, Lieut.-Governor of Bombay, expressed similar views.

With reference to methods of contribution, Mr. Osborne said that the official funds are administered only in an official way. This means, of course, that religious aims and hopes have no part in the distribution. The Fund raised by The Christian, Mr. Osborne pointed out, is of special value, since it is and strengthens their position as preachers of the Gospel.

At the conclusion of Mr. Osborne's address, Mr. Alfred Holness strongly appealed to the audience to enlist further sympathy and co-operation in making prompt and generous contributions to The Christian Fund; and Mr. Robert Scott, after giving a brief account of the dispatch and distribution of food consignments, emphasized the need for liberal gifts of clothing.

"One Loaf in the Boat."

JESUS had twice fed the multitude: once with five loaves and two small fishes he had met the wants of 5,000, and again with seven loaves and a few little fishes he had satisfied the hunger of 4,000 men, besides women and children.

And Christ had also for the second time stilled the storm on the Sea of Galilee. And yet when the disciples are again crossing the lake with only one loaf in the ship, having forgotten to take fresh bread with them, they did not understand Jesus when He said by way of warning against the false teaching of the rulers—"Take heed and beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees."

The disciples began to talk among themselves about their being short of bread. That was the one thing that filled their thoughts; they could speak about nothing else, and that mention of the leaven set them all talking about the one loaf, and wondering what they would do. Some one had forgotten to order the bread that day, and now there was only one stale little oaten cake left. They did not mind about the false teaching; they forgot all about the miracle of feeding the multitudes. The one loaf was all they could think about. The new trouble, the little disaster of the bread running short, closed their eyes, so that they could see nothing but the one loaf.

Just so; little things occupy our attention and fill our minds and hearts, so that we can neither think or talk about anything beside. Some small trifle will hide great things if held close to our eyes. A man's hat in a crowd may hide the Queen from some spectator. A person once went to see the boat-race, and took up a good position, and waited long in patience, until, just as the people cried "here they come," one of the barges moved a little, and the crowd swayed, the boats passed, and nothing was seen of the race.

If we close one eye and put a penny before the other, we shall see nothing but the bit of money. So some small thing may come before our mind or thought, and fill up the whole field of vision. Some tiny object comes into our heart and absorbs all our attention. The one loaf in the boat will obscure every other interest.

Some little disappointment happens, and we are full of trouble, we can talk about nothing else. Some trifle creeps into our thoughts at church, and we are deaf to all that is said. Some vexing thing lays hold of our mind, and it draws everything to itself. We forget the past with its blessings and the lessons of to-day, and we have no heart, ears, or eyes for anything in the whole world. So the one loaf in the boat hid the teaching of Jesus from the disciples.

Hence Jesus says to the disciples: "Why do you do nothing else but talk about the one loaf; though you have eyes you do not see; and ears, yet you do not hear. Do not trouble and worry over the one loaf. Do you not remember when I broke up the five loaves for the 5,000, how many baskets full with broken pieces you took away?"

And they said "twelve."

"And when the 4,000 were fed, how many then?"

And they said "seven."

How is that you do not see and understand that I still care for your wants, and I was not meaning any thing about the bread you spoke of when I mentioned the leaven, but about the false teaching and bad influence of the Pharisees? Have all my signs and wonders, my miracles, and works of mercy, been for nothing? Cannot you trust me, though you have but one loaf in the cupboard?

The one loaf in the cupboard may be a blessing or a curse; if it only leads us to fret and complain, we shall make a big calamity out of a little difficulty, but, if we trust Jesus and remember all his goodness and mercy, we shall not grumble and fear, we shall know if He is with us all will be well, and we shall not let little trifles hide from us the teaching and warning of his truth and love. J. Johnson.

19th Quarterly Prize Competition.

July to September.

RULES.

Will parents and teachers kindly see that each of the following rules is strictly observed, especially Nos. 7 and 10? The only help permitted is to explain the meaning of the rules or questions, if necessary.

1. Only those may enter whose names appear in the list below as having been right nine times out of twelve.
2. Competitors will be divided into Four Divisions:—
   - I. Those under ten years of age.
   - II. Those over ten and under thirteen.
   - III. Those over thirteen and under fifteen.
   - IV. Those between fifteen and eighteen.
3. Write outside your envelope in large letters the words "Prize Competition," and the Number of the Division to which you belong; and address it to "Uncle Tom," as usual.
4. At the top of your answer paper write very clearly your Division, your Full Name and Address, and your Age last birthday.
5. Number your Answers exactly to correspond with the questions.
6. Every paper must be signed by a parent or teacher to testify that Rule 7 has been observed.
7. No Concordance and no help allowed; only the use of a Reference Bible. ☞ Competitors must not help each other.
8. The last day for answers to reach the office is Tuesday, October 9. The results will be announced on October 18.
9. Marks will be given for accuracy, neatness, writing, spelling, &c., the rewards being: First Prize, Second Prize, First Certificate, and Second Certificate.
10. Chapter and Verse must be given wherever possible.
11. Those who cannot do all the questions set for their division must do as many as they can, and will receive marks accordingly. No papers can be re-examined after the lists appear.

☞ Any seniors who are over Eighteen years of age may do the Competition, and have their names included in the lists, but will not be eligible for the prizes.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 30.

"Our Foolish Excuses" (Luke xiv. 15-24).

OUR Saviour's table-talk was becoming too personal, and one of the guests, hoping to turn it aside, and to establish a reputation for holiness, made an unctuous and sanctimonious remark, which was of the essence of cant: "Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God." And our Lord answered the remark by this terrible parable, which shows that men are judged not by their pious platitudes, but by their actions, and which also shows how inept and frivolous are the excuses behind which they will screen the bluntness of their refusal to accept the free provisions of God's grace. We may speak long and much of heaven, may congratulate ourselves that we have been invited thither, and may reply in flattering terms, but we may be so tied by the things of time and sense, as to come short.

Apparently the real temptations of life lie in three directions. First, Our Property. So long as we are pilgrims and strangers, with no settled piece of land to call our own, with no stake in the country, with no accumulation in the bank, we are willing to reach out our hands towards the city that hath foundations (Heb. xi. 9, 10). But directly we buy the field, we begin to settle our thoughts on it. We must lay it out for building, or plan the crops we are to raise. We think how we can sell it again at some advantage. We hope the railroad company may need it. We plan to build our family home upon it. And so, though we outwardly are courteous and friendly towards the Gospel, our affections are no longer set on things above, where Christ sitteth at God's right hand (Col. iii. 1-4). Really, in our heart, we give God the go-by, being pre-occupied and engrossed with our field, and all it stands for.

Secondly, Our Activities. There is no harm in having a team of oxen; on the contrary, it is a great and noble thing to plough up the virgin soil of the prairie, and make corn grow for the sustenance of the toiling millions of our fellow men. The oxen of Christ's time have their counterpart in the steam-plough, the traction engine, the motor car of to-day. But all these things marvellously pre occupy men's minds. They become so deeply interested, that they appear to have time and energy for nothing else. Though they would not think of saying an absolute No, to the invitations of the Gospel, their urbane and polite excuse covers a practical refusal. "I pray thee, have me excused." There is the tone of polite and sorrowful regret, but there is no intention to be present at the feast.

Thirdly, Our Home and Family Life. Our Lord intended to say no word against the marriage tie. Did He not honour a wedding feast with his presence and first miracle? But He knew that men are apt to postpone all thought of heaven when they are surrounded by all the joys and comforts which a happy home life affords. I have sometimes seen the flaring lights of a market square extinguish the celestial constellations; and too often the joys of earth make us indifferent to the attractions of fellowship with God. This third man is blunter than the two former. How often we find that those who are most polite in social life are most dogged in their refusal of Christ!

But after all, the excuses which these men made were very shallow. The land would not have disappeared if its owner had postponed visiting it for another twenty-four hours. The cattle had surely been proved already, or they would never have been bought. And as to the newly-married wife, there would have been no reason against her accompanying her husband. There was plenty of room for them both. It is clear that they were mere excuses, meant to cover a very real distaste for the society and provision of the Host. So with the excuses, which men make in the present day against becoming religious—that they are too young, or too old; that they are not sure of their election, or have been prevented by their education, circumstances, or the inconsistencies of others. All are thin veils to conceal a real alienation and enmity of heart. But look into the lives of such, and you will know in a moment where the real centre of their nature lies.

It is among the well-to-do, the wealthy, the religiously-nurtured, that this state of mind is most often discovered; whilst those who seem beyond hope and help, those whose condition is abandoned and wretched, those who are weary and heart-broken, are only too thankful to accept that which promises rest from life's fever, and satisfaction from its hunger.

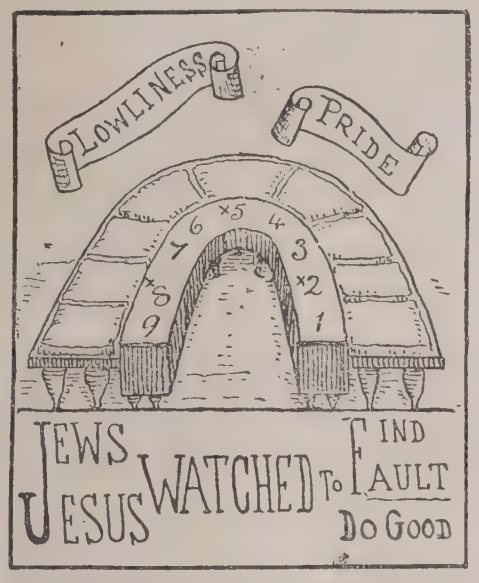
"Jesus dining with a Pharisee."—Luke xiv. 1-14.

Golden Text.—"Whosoever exalteth himself shall be abased, and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted."

Introduction.

ANOTHER Pharisee's house; another feast; another kind deed done by Jesus; another opportunity to learn lessons from the Master's words.

Feasts and social gatherings were often held on the Sabbath day; but no cooking was allowed (Ex. xvi. 23). This Pharisee was a great man. (1.) "Chief." Notice how often Jesus healed people at feasts (Luke vii. 37, 38, &c.). Anyone could enter and look on, as the rooms all opened into court-yards.



Key to Blackboard Plan.—The way a table was arranged. Chief seats (v. 7) are marked thus (*). Guests reclined on cushions, with feet outward. They could easily talk to each other. We learn two principal lessons, about "lowliness" and "pride."

The Jews Watched to Find Fault.

They were always trying to catch Jesus in his talk and in his deeds. (1) Matt. xxii. 15, "entangle"; Luke vi. 7, "to find accusation"; Luke xx. 20, "sent spies"; John viii. 6, "to accuse Him." But they could find nothing to build upon. Jesus said nothing that they could disapprove of. In fact, we read several times they could not even answer his questions (Psa. xxxvii. 32; Isa. xxix. 20).

Jesus Watched to Do Good.

(2, 4) Jesus was always looking out to see how He could help people and do them good. This can be illustrated from numbers of instances in the four Gospels.

Pride.

(7, 8) These Pharisees always wanted to be first, to be taken notice of, to be praised by their fellows, to be put in the chief seats at feasts. In Matt. xxiii. 6 it is said, "They loved" the chief seats, &c. This is well illustrated in 3 John 9, "Diotrephes loveth to have the pre-eminence. (12) Another point in their pride was to disregard the poor and those below them in the social scale. Their care and aim was to attract the great and high people, to be rich, and popular, and grand (Matt. vi. 1, 5, 16). "To be seen, to be seen, to be seen," (2) "that they may have glory of men." Let us examine ourselves and see if there be any of this pride in our hearts; and should we find ever such a little, let us pray earnestly that it may all be cleared out, and that we no longer do any kind or good deeds, or any Christian work, "only to be seen of men."

Lowliness.

This is the much-needed lesson our Saviour would impress. (10-14) Take the lowest place; give where you do not expect any return or recompense; be very humble in all you do (Neh. viii. 10; Phil. ii. 3). Christ Himself set us an example about lowliness (James iv. 6). This verse only carries out many of Solomon's proverbs about God's hatred of pride, and love for the humble. Peter, too, in his first Epistle, v. 5, says: "Be clothed with humility."

Result of Christ's Parable.

(11-14) The reward and praise is all for the humble-hearted, and none for the proud man. Those who are little in their own eyes are the people God loves to crown with honour (1 Sam. xv. 17). See also the story of Haman (Esther vii. 10), for an example of punished pride; Luke xviii. 14; Prov. xi. 2, xvi. 18, xxix. 23, &c.

The Children's Home.

THURSDAY, September 20, was observed at all the branches of the Children's Home as the annual day of prayer. The absence of the hitherto most prominent figure in the Home, was keenly felt. At the morning prayers at Bonner Road (8.30), conducted by the new Principal and Rev. Henry Martin, M.A., the newly appointed minister, a letter was read from Dr. Stephenson to the workers and children of the Home, in which he said that he and his family were observing the day at Ilkley. The governor of the branch, Mr. Pendlebury, also could not be with us; but he, too, was joining us by conducting the prayer meetings at our Ramsay branch.

At eleven o'clock the workers and children came together again in the little chapel, and were joined by several friends of the Home, amongst whom were Revs. Nehemiah Curnock and F. Tunbridge. A stirring address on the power of prayer was given by Rev. J. E. Watts Ditchfield, the vicar of St. James-the-Less, an ever welcome guest at the Home; and a few earnest and kindly words were spoken by the senior General Treasurer, Mr. J. E. Vanner, whilst Rev. Arthur E. Gregory showed how the burden of debt of £20,000 now weighing on the Home could be lifted only by prayer.

In the afternoon the "all day prayer meeting" was again resumed. Rev. H. Martin gave a brief address to the children present, and the rest of the time was spent in prayer for the Home, and all the details of the work, for the old boys and girls, and, above all, for the conversion of the children now in the Home. In the evening in Victoria Park Chapel, the Principal of the Home spoke again of the need of depending on prayer for the future prosperity of the work. The meeting was a large one, and the prayers many and earnest.

The General Election.

DEAR SIR,—In view of the General Election, should not Christians be urged to unite so as to throw their united vote together? I feel there is a danger of those interested in one reform voting for one candidate, while others interested in some other equally deserving reform voting for the other candidate, and thus the influence they have is nullified. If, as we heard recently, the Christian Endeavourers in one place in America were able to influence the election, surely there must be many places in the United Kingdom where the Christians could do the same. Moreover, the candidates would be much more inclined to make concessions if they heard a large number were voting solid.

CHRISTIAN PATRIOT.

DEAR SIR,—Will you allow me through your paper to make a short but earnest appeal to all Christians at once, by either united prayer and individually, to plead with God that He would so intervene as to prevent militarism becoming the dominant factor in this election. We are threatened with this in a marked manner, to the exclusion of that righteousness which exalteth a nation. I earnestly plead with all Christians, men and women, to besiege the Throne of Grace that such men may be sent to Parliament who will put God and his righteousness in relation to the Government of our Empire before any other consecration.—I am, Dear Sir, yours truly,

WILLIAM GREEN.

Moorlands, Bickley, Kent.

Personalia.

Mr. CHARLES COOK has once more taken the Metropolitan Theatre, Edgware Road, for evangelistic work.

Dr. L. W. MUNHALL is to give a series of addresses at Exeter Hall, October 1-12, noon and evening; also at Aldersgate Y.M.C.A., October 21-29, afternoon and evening, and at the noon prayer meetings.

Rev. ROBERT WARD (Man Sukh Lal) of the M.E. Mission, Godhra, Panch Mahals, has broken down in health, as a result of over-work during famine relief operations. Mr. Ward has been for some weeks in a hospital at Bombay.

Rev. JOHN SHARP has been appointed to take charge of the editorial or linguistic department of the Bible Society in succession to Rev. J. Gordon Watt. Mr. Sharp was appointed clerical secretary to the Society about twenty years since, and the duties of the post which he now vacates, that of senior general secretary, will be discharged by Rev. Arthur Taylor, assistant secretary.

Major D. W. WHITTLE, so widely known as an evangelist and writer of Gospel hymns, still lies in great weakness at his home in Northfield, Mass. The American papers describe a touching incident which took place just before Mr. Sankey's departure on his present visit to Great Britain, In company with Mr. George C. Stebbins and Mr. and Mrs. James McGranahan, Mr. Sankey paid a friendly visit to the Major. After singing with the invalid each visitor prayed, and then the Major offered an earnest petition. The scene was most touching, as these members of the Old Guard joined their voices in prayer and praise, each one feeling that they would probably never all meet again on earth.

The Y.M.C.A.

AN Association has been inaugurated at Dudley, under favourable auspices. The local temperance society is accommodating it with rooms in a suitable building in the High Street, and already a large number of young men have been enrolled as members.

Mr. C. S. Wilson recently gave an "At Home" at the Sunderland Y.M.C.A., in connection with the farewell meeting of Mr. and Mrs. Michael Coates, who are returning as missionaries to South Africa. The large hall was crowded with friends, many of whom had been fellow-workers with Mr. Coates a decade ago in the Association.

One of the most needy districts of London is Southwark, and it was here that a band of young businessmen met at the beginning of the present year to consider the solution of this problem, and as the result formed the Southwark Y.M.C.A. Through the kindness of a Christian gentleman, the members have since been meeting in his drawing-room for various gatherings of a spiritual character, principally for definite Bible study and preparation for special evangelistic work. An effort is now being made to secure more suitable and central accommodation, and for this purpose £300 will be required; the hon. secretary is Mr. William Reed, 112, St. George's Road, Southwark, S.E.

The Churches.

Church of England.

Rev. E. F. Allworthy, M.A., formerly of Drumcree, Portadown and St. Aidan's, Belfast, has been appointed to the important curacy of St. Silas', Liverpool.

Rev. S. A. Selwyn, in making the announcement of his approaching departure to his congregation at St. John's, Boscombe, said that he had felt that the strain of ill-health generally had been considerably hindering his work. He had accepted the living of Holy Trinity, Hampstead, because personally it would be a grand sphere for work, because the place was more suitable to the health of his family and himself, and because he had felt it to be a call from God.

At a recent meeting of the Ladies' League, at Felixstowe, Rev. W. Hay Aitken said that he was one of those who had shrunk from touching this controversy in other years, feeling the difficulty of indicating the line beyond which his fellow-Churchmen could not go without disloyalty to their position. But the time had come, in his opinion, in which there was no longer a question of drawing a line. The principles of the Reformation were being practically renounced, and the Reformation itself repudiated by men who still retained their position in the Church. They made no longer any attempt to conceal the fact that they went behind the Reformation; Anglican teaching was now spoken of disparagingly as "insular," and it was plain that we must substitute for it what was Continental. Under these circumstances, it was obvious that this thing must be cleared out of our Church, and all who value the great truths of the Reformation must bear their share in doing this.

Rev. J. L. Evans, in his annual report on the work in the poor parish of Holy Trinity, Lincoln's Inn Fields, has an encouraging story to tell. Rents in the parish are high, 4s. and 5s. per week having to be paid for one room. Overcrowding is common; ventilation bad and light insufficient, while the sanitary arrangements are imperfect. Drunkenness is specially noticeable among women, and is increasing among young girls. A great deal of effort is put forth to stem the evils. On Sundays there are services in church and open-air, and schools and Bible classes; while on weekdays there are meetings for men and women; day schools clubs for boys and girls, temperance meetings, house-to-house visitation, &c.

Congregational.

Re-opening services have been held at Westminster Road Church, Liverpool, the preacher being Rev. Stanley Rogers. The building, which for some weeks has been closed, has been renovated and beautified.

One of the best known of Welsh Congregational ministers, Rev. Dr. Owen Evans, of London, has decided to retire from the pastorate of the Welsh Church, King's Cross, London. Dr. Evans is a preacher of eminence and a writer of repute. Under his care the church at King's Cross has thriven and flourished.

The Congregational Union of England and Wales will open its autumnal assembly in Newcastle-on-Tyne on October 15, under the chairmanship of Mr. J. Carvell Williams, M.P., who is announced to preach twice in Newcastle churches on the previous Sunday. The annual sermon of the Union will be preached on the Monday evening, in Bath Lane Church, by Rev. J. H. Jowett, of Birmingham.

Associated with Cliftonville Congregational Church, Brighton, of which Rev. Ambrose D. Spong, is pastor, a new mission hall has been opened at Hove. It is to be called Rutland Hall, and its seating accommodation is for 300 persons, and practically the whole of the £2,000 required for it has been subscribed by the Cliftonville Church. Rev. G. Campbell Morgan preached the opening sermon to a crowded congregation, and a public meeting was subsequently held, at which Alderman Colman presided.

Call (accepted).—Rev. T. Hireson, of Mitcheldean, to Oldland Tabernacle, near Bristol.

Baptist.

At Lagos, West Africa, Princess Awaion, a granddaughter of King Alin, of Ilorin, a Mohammedan city within the sphere of the Nigerian Government, having recently visited Lagos, was, on profession of faith, publicly baptized by Dr. Mojola Agbebi, at the Lagos Marina. Some hundreds of people witnessed the ceremony.

Rev. Alexander Gordon, president of the Liverpool Baptist Union, has resigned the pastorate of Egremont Baptist Church, Liverpool, and has accepted a call to the church at Dunedin, New Zealand. Mr. Gordon's decision is in accordance with medical advice. He intends to leave England early next month.

The "Dr. J. A. Spurgeon Home of Rest for Baptist and other Ministers and Missionaries," founded in memory of the late Dr. Spurgeon, was opened on Monday last, by Rev. W. Cuff, President of the Baptist Union, at Brighton. The Home is situated in Arundel Terrace, Kemptown, and overlooks the sea. Mrs. J. A. Spurgeon presented Mr. Cuff with the deed of gift, which he accepted in the name of the Union.

Rev. T. Graham Tarn's presidential address to the Yorkshire Association at Haworth was on "The Spiritual Condition of our Churches." He said there were many things needed to enable the churches to deal with the appalling indifference of men, but he wished to suggest four things especially: (1) The need of a nobler type of Christian character; (2) An intense passion for souls; (3) A more effective use of spiritual forces; and (4) a more practical appreciation of the importance of individual dealing.

The anniversary of the church at Rochester was celebrated on September 16, when sermons were preached by Rev. J. W. Davies to large congregations. On the following day meetings for the "Deepening of Spiritual Life" were conducted in the afternoon and evening by Rev. W. Fuller Gooch. Many Christians of other denominations were present, and much blessing experienced. Arrangements are being made for a series of similar meetings in the Corn Exchange, Rochester, in consequence of the deep interest awakened.

Bristol College has held its annual meetings. The proceedings began with a reunion soiree by invitation of the pastor (Dr. Glover) and deacons of Tyndale Church. This gathering was followed by the annual public meeting, presided over by Mr. T. S. Aldis, M.A. From a statement made by Dr. Glover, hon. secretary of the College, it appeared that seven of the students have settled during the past year, five in home churches and two as missionaries abroad, while six men have been accepted as probationers. A very gracious and appreciative reference was made to the late Dr. Culross, the former president.

The esteem in which Pastor Douglas Brown is held at Kensington Tabernacle, Bristol, was evinced by the crowded congregation which assembled to celebrate the first anniversary of his pastorate. On Monday afternoon a sermon was preached by Pastor Archibald G. Brown to a congregation numbering fully one thousand people. At the public meeting in the evening, Pastor Archibald G. Brown, Rev. H. Moore, and Pastor Douglas Brown delivered addresses. The keynote of the report was praise to God for the blessing which had rested on the church during the past year. The Sunday congregations have so grown that on Sunday evenings many people fail to gain admittance to the Tabernacle.

Resignations.—Rev. C. Sirett, Cutsdean Church; Rev. S. M'Alister, Cranfield; Rev. G. W. Bloomfield, Stanningley.

Calls (accepted).—Rev. E. Last, of Cambridge Street Church, Glasgow, to Battersea Park Tabernacle, London; Mr. D. J. Lawrence, of Bristol College, to Lichfield Street Church, Willenhall; Rev. G. Bass, of Martham, Norfolk, to Foulsham; Rev. J. Miller Hamilton, of Lowestoft, to Darlington.

Methodist.

A new mission is being opened by the Seaton Delaval Primitive Methodist station at Annitsford. A large number of children have already been gathered into the Sunday school.

A new Primitive Methodist chapel and school, giving accommodation for 550 persons, and erected at a cost of about £5,500, has been opened at Harrogate. The preacher at the opening service was Rev. J. Odell, president of the Conference.

Mr. W. Sampson (Wesleyan) has held meetings at Falmouth, with the result that many have professed Christ as their Saviour. Rev. J. Goudie addressed the converts, giving them encouragement and counsel. The majority are young men, whose ages vary from fifteen to twenty-five. At the close about forty joined the existing classes.

The services in connection with the opening of the People's Hall, Newcastle Wesleyan Mission, were very enthusiastic. The workers were early astir on the Sunday, first at a prayer meeting and then in the open-air. Large congregations gathered in the Hall morning, afternoon, and evening, many having come from distant places in the country. Rev. Thomas Allen, D.D., president of the Conference, took two services.

Rev. Dr. Allen, president of the Wesleyan Conference, has visited Sheffield, opening the new church at Walkley, and re-opening Brunswick Chapel. The alterations at Brunswick have been very considerable. For many years the congregation has been regarded as the largest Nonconformist gathering in the city. Every Sunday evening the gallery is filled with young people. But the internal arrangements have not been suited to a people's service, and the trustees have been alive to the necessities of the future. Early in July the chapel was closed, and ever since the overhauling process needful to bring it into line with modern requirements has been going on.

Presbyterian.

At Watford Church, on Sunday week, services were conducted by the Chief Aquah II., who reigns over the Winnebah Settlement, Gold Coast.

Rev. J. B. Meharry's temporary ministry at Woollahra, Sydney, was very fruitful. The closing services were crowded to overflowing. Mr. Meharry is expected to reach home early in October.

The church at Plymouth has been re-opened after undergoing renovation. The services were conducted by the pastor, Rev. W. Harvey-Jellie, and were attended by very large congregations. The morning theme was taken from Psa. xcv. 6, and the sermon was a thoughtful exposition of the nature of Christian worship. The evening discourse was based upon John vii. 17, and treated of the validity and reality of the experience and the faith of the believer.

At the Synodical Conference on "Spiritual Life and Work," to be held on October 15, 16, and 17, in Mount Pleasant Church, Liverpool, there are to be five Sessions of Conference. On Monday evening the subject for discussion will be "Hindrances to Spiritual Life in Ourselves;" on Tuesday forenoon, "Hindrances to Spiritual Life in Our Church:" and on Tuesday afternoon, "Hindrances to Spiritual Life in Present-Day Society." On Tuesday evening "Our Resources, Encouragements, and Hopes," will be discussed. The Conference will close on Wednesday morning with a thanksgiving service, and the observance of the Lord's Supper.

Society of Friends.

Alfred Wright has attended the Quarterly Meeting of Essex and Suffolk. On a recent first-day he attended the morning meeting at Colchester, also the evening mission meeting.

Samuel J. Alexander went from Belfast to Rathfriland, and attended one of the series of meetings which for many weeks has been held in a tent about three miles from the latter town by Robert Bass, W. E. Gregory, and Ernest R. Davies, under the Ulster Friends' Home Mission.

Fallen Asleep.

Aged eighty-four, Mr. JOHN WILLIAMS, a deacon of the Congregational Church at Chester.—Rev. ALEXANDER CHARLES BULKELEY, M.A., vicar of Audenshaw, near Manchester, aged fifty-nine.—At Hinton Rectory, near Alresford, Hants., Rev. JOHN HEBERDEN, for twenty-two years rector of Hinton Ampner, aged sixty-four.—Mrs. SCOTT, wife of the Bishop of North China, has succumbed to dysentery. She left the Embassy at Pekin to lay the stone of a new church only a few days before it was impossible for any one to leave the capital.—Rev. WILLIAM LAW, rector for fifty-three years, of Marston Trussel, Northamptonshire.—Dr. ALEXANDER STEVENSON, an esteemed elder of St. Paul's Presbyterian Church, Westoe Lane, South Shields.—Rev. THOMAS WIGLEY, who was for twenty-one years pastor of the Ashley Lane Congregational Church, Manchester.—Rev. J. C. WHARTON, for fifty years Vicar of Gelling, Richmond, Yorkshire, aged eighty-five.—Rev. THOMAS HUGHES, of Kenchester, a much-respected Calvinistic Methodist minister. Mr. Hughes was ordained in 1860, and had laboured well and faithfully in the ministry.—Mrs. AGBEBI, who with her husband, founded the Ilesa Mission, passed away on August 7, at Oke Onoge, Ilesa. The deceased lady, mother of Dr. Mojola Agbabi, was an Aboriginal native of Sierra Leone. She was a devoted missionary in the hinterland of Lagos.—At 97, Windsor Road, Forest Gate, Mr C. J. BEHARELL, sen., for many years an earnest Gospel worker, especially in East London; able as a musical helper, and powerful as a preacher.—At 130, Buccleuch Street, Edinburgh, "full of years," WILLIAM LAING, long known as the author of booklets on the Lord's Return and the Coming Kingdom, with allied themes; beloved in a large circle, and widely esteemed as a courteous controversialist.

Religious Training of Youth.

ONE of the most interesting meetings of the year, in connection with the Free Presbytery of Glasgow, is usually the gathering in the interests of the different schemes dealing with the youth of the Church. On Tuesday of last week, there was a goodly gathering in Free St. John's Church, under these auspices, of the teachers and members of Bible classes from all parts of the city.

THE POWER OF SINCERITY.

At the outset, Mr. A. Cameron Corbett, M.P., gave some thoughtful, earnest advice on "the best influences which can be brought to bear on the youth of our Church." In his experience the most noticeable feature about the "older young people" of the present day had been that "they are inquiring for themselves, and are not quite satisfied with the purely authoritative method of learning. As a result of such inquiry not properly safeguarded, we hear people speak as though scientific opinion were against Christianity, and it is well that our young people should become familiar with the fact that the weight of current opinion is upon the side of Christianity, not against it. We used to hear also that there was something arbitrary in the conditions of the acceptance of Christianity, talk as if faith were more than conduct. I think we might almost appeal to the reasonableness of our young people, and ask them whether after all faith is not a deeper test of character than conduct. A man may pursue a correct course of conduct from selfish, interested motives, but faith goes deeper and represents the attainments after which the heart is striving. The impression that the teacher as an individual makes is more important than all the mental ability he can show. Young people will remember the impress of the character of their teachers. All the little meannesses and hypocrisies will be seen. They will find out how far you are sincere and honest. When, in after life, they come to feel as if all the world were against them, the imprint of one kind generous character, associated with religion, will come back long after the teaching itself has passed away. Let no man or woman who sincerely loves the young people give up because the teaching they can give is not great, for the effect of a sincere life will last through all time."

THE PREPARATION OF THE SOIL.

The Chairman — Rev. Dr. Walter Ross Taylor, Moderator of the General Assembly — revived his own remembrance of the time when the Assembly first issued instructions to regard Sabbath schools as a part of the work of the Church, and of the subsequent developments of that interest. "Everyone feels the importance of having the young brought up in the knowledge of Christ and his truth; but we must recognize that a great deal also depends on what we are training the young people to become afterwards. The great end in view in this work is the forming of a thoughtful and devout character in their minds. Their religious life will largely depend on the degree in which such a character is formed while yet they were young. The Sower and the Seed were the same, but the results were different; and our Lord, when speaking the parable, had in view different classes among his hearers. The difference was in the character of the soil. We have to endeavour so to work upon the hearts and minds of our young people that they will earnestly and thoughtfully turn a receptive heart to the message of God.

"Men rub shoulders every day who yet are living in different worlds. The covetous man sees his generous neighbour doing something which he tries to explain from selfish and sordid motives. He has not the eye to see nor the heart to discern what is kind and generous. We must look up to the Spirit of all grace for his Divine power, and yet at the same time we must use the means to cherish this thoughtful, devout spirit. Parents have paid too much attention to the cultivating of the intellect, when the great thing we have to do is the training of the will. It is of great consequence that a boy should have a strong will, as well as that he should be taught to be reverent to authority, and to yield to those wiser than himself. Then, when the Father in heaven comes with his calls, his laws, and his messages, the youth will be the more disposed to turn a receptive heart."

THE DUTY OF PROTESTANTS.

Professor James Denney put forward the peculiar importance of the training of the young in a Protestant Church. "There are churches which lay no responsibility on their members at all, churches which tell them what to believe, and which will supply them with spiritual directors to tell them what to do at any time. The members of such churches are taught that they do not need any spiritual intelligence or conscience of their own. In a Protestant church, on the contrary, it is necessary that all should be trained to be capable of taking these responsibilities upon themselves. The burden of directing the policy of the Church must come, in the long run, on those who are young now. We cannot afford to have large numbers of immature members, persons in whom Christian intelligence and conscience have never come to any kind of maturity; and it must always be important so to educate our members that they will be independent in the Church, though not of it, and be able to take their place as Christian persons in the community.

THE PLACE OF THE BIBLE.

"Why is it we devote ourselves exclusively to the study of the Bible with a view to producing this particular kind of capacity, intellectual and moral? The reason is because we believe the Bible has a virtue in it that no other book has for producing this result. That is what we mean when we say the Bible is inspired. It brings us a message that no other book in the world brings because it puts us into communion with God. There is one question the answer to which we can find in no other way—the question, 'What must I do to be saved?' It answers this question by telling the story of Jesus Christ; and the soul of the man who asks the question leaps up into the life of God when he hears the answer. We want everybody in our Protestant Churches to study the Bible, and to get in that way into communion with the mind of God.

THE LIVING MESSAGE.

"I can imagine young people giving attention to the text of a particular passage they are studying, and losing that spirit of inspiration in the Bible. When that is our experience—that we are parsing and construing away, and getting nothing out of it—we must lift up our heads and look at the whole, see both the beginning and the end. Then the breath of God will pass over us, and teach us that Message from Him that the Bible brings. The way in which we become sure of God's presence and voice in Scripture always has something practical about it. It is not attained by getting an idea into our heads. It is in something that has the nature of an action about it that God comes to us. It may be an inward action, of renunciation, or a joyful welcoming of something God brings, by which we commit ourselves and our wills. Then we feel our life united to the life of God Himself.

"Perhaps the first great effect of this is an extraordinary power of emancipating the mind, giving it the exhilaration of freedom, with a great sense of responsibility. When we get into contact with the Word of God in the Scriptures, we submit ourselves to that educating influence. There never has been any kind of Christianity popular in Scotland which was pietistic—that is confined, so to speak, to the soul—and not allowed to go out into the life. If our religion is to be real it must cover the whole breadth of the things in which we have an interest."

Haddon Hall, Bermondsey.—A series of mission services are to be conducted at Haddon Hall, Bermondsey, by Mr. W. Olney and Mr. F. Spencer Johnson, from October 21 to 26. The new school and class rooms are nearing completion, and it is hoped that before long the adult services will be transferred to this building until the new hall is ready for use.

Scottish Soldiers.

A MEETING was held in Dundee a few days ago for the timely purpose of directing public attention to the work of the Army Scripture Readers' and Soldiers' Friend Society of Scotland. The Society has at present a staff of ten readers at work—eight in Scotland and two with the troops in South Africa—nine of whom have themselves served in the ranks. Lord Provost Hunter, who was chairman, expressed his regret that, although Dundee is closely associated with the camps at Barry and Buddon, both lying within ten miles, practically no support has been given to this Society by the city. During the season now closing over 22,000 men have been under canvas in the two camps, the number in residence at one time having risen as high as 9,040. As indications of the amount of work done among them by the reader, it was mentioned that 130 Gospel addresses had been given, 2,000 New Testaments distributed in particular cases, and 120 temperance pledges issued. Help of many kinds had been placed within the reach of the men, 34,570 letters being written in the readers' special tent, £516 remitted through the reader to relatives, and over £100 deposited with him for safe custody.

As secretary of the Society, Captain Morrison (Edinburgh) gave an interesting account of the work in Scotland, and paid a high tribute to the help given by Rev. A. J. Campbell at Barry. He mentioned a number of Scottish depôts—including Perth, Glencorse, Berwick, and Inverness—at which it has not yet been possible to station readers on account of lack of funds.

The Scripture reader at Barry Camp—Mr. James Mathers—explained the different ways in which the army chaplains and the Scripture reader are regarded by the soldiers. The chaplain, however excellent he may be, is an officer, whereas the reader has usually been a private himself; Mr. Mathers was twenty-three years in the Gordon Highlanders. Readers rejoiced that they were soldiers of the Cross, and tried to befriend everyone. Many friends of the men had come and thanked him personally for the good that was being done. If the work were known and appreciated in Scotland as it deserved to be, no regiment would go under canvas without such a worker to help the chaplain in his important duties.

"The Soldier Evangelist"—Mr. J. W. Moodie—related how, in 1882, he himself had been picked up severely wounded, on the field of Tel-el-Kebir, by Mr. Mathers, and prayed over; and how from that day he had devoted himself to the work of God. He then proceeded to describe his experiences, in connection with the present war, among the troops on shipboard, and in South Africa up to the point of the relief of Ladysmith—after which he was stricken down by disease and invalided home.

Sir John Leng, M.P., warmly commended the Society to the support of the city; and Colonel Smith testified to the desire of commanding officers that there should be a Scripture reader in every regiment. On the motion of Rev. G. H. Morrison, seconded by Major W. H. Fergusson, a local committee was formed. Rev. A. J. Campbell expressed the hope that the Government would by another year allow the Society to erect a large hut at Barry, similar to the one on Lanark Moor, because it would be of great service to readers and men alike. He invited the police authorities to co-operate with the officers in dealing with any "black sheep" who wandered into the city from the camps.

Hanley Christian Mission.—It has been found advisable to remove the headquarters of this Mission to the chapel in Birch Terrace, where the work in its numerous branches is maintained with unabated energy and devotion by the members. In the open-air preaching, the Sunday school, visitation of the homes of the poor, the mission-hall services, and cottage meetings, there have been tokens of Divine blessing, and the winter's work is anticipated with fervent hopes and expectations of a gracious revival. Tracts for distribution and other help may be forwarded to the superintendent, Mr. W. J. Taylor, 5, Grafton Street, Hanley.

Dundee Christian Conference.

THIS annual gathering of God's children took place for the thirty-third time in the city of Wishart and McCheyne last week, and it is pleasing to record that, though the number of such gatherings is constantly increasing in Scotland, Dundee still holds its own as a centre of interest and blessing. Indeed, we believe that never since the days of the Apostles has there been such a widespread fraternization of believers as in these closing years of the century.

Lord Kinnaird presided at the opening of the Conference on Tuesday, and introduced as the subject the Apostolic injunction, "Pray without ceasing." He stated that, except in the Christian Church, there had been far too little recognition of God in our recent national calamities. Our inability to prevent famine in India had shown how much we depended on rain from heaven; and the Chinese mystery had so puzzled us that we felt as never before the need of light from heaven to enable us to deal effectively with international complications. The subject was therefore all-important. If our Saviour spent whole nights in prayer, it was needful that his followers should pray much. There are multitudes around us whom we seek to influence but cannot, and hence rather than in God. We might well hope that the new century might witness a return to the prevailing prayer of the first.

Rev. W. Y. Fullerton, of Leicester, dealt with the text as a command and a privilege. Quoting the words of Psalm lxxii. 15, "Prayer also shall be made for him continually," he said the New Testament injunction was the counterpart of the Old Testament prophecy. Prayer is to be regarded not as a pious exercise merely, but as a vital force that effects some real purpose. As such it is ordained by God It is not something that mitigates the working of his machinery; it is part of that machinery. And it is necessary to man. In many of the gifts that pass between man and man there is neither donation nor possession apart from the asking. The man who has conquered a woman's heart cannot have the sweet gift of her maiden love unless he asks for it. If this is true of God's creatures, why not so between God and man? Many common blessings, such as life and food, come to us without asking, but the best gifts are conditional on prayer. Nor does prayer fail. The answer coming again and again cannot by any method of reasoning be called a coincidence. And its reflex influence is such that it prevents us from frustrating by our actions what we seek to further by our prayers.

Rev. Alexander Brown, of Pollokshields, followed, speaking on "Continuance in Prayer." He said prayer must be of the Christian life. There is the sense of need in one's self, and then the sense of power in God. The need cries, and the power listens, and in this inter-communing lies the whole secret of the prayer life.

In the afternoon a conversational meeting took place, the theme being, "Prayer, its hindrances, helps, and results." Mr. Fullerton pointed out the various hindrances to prayer which were outlined in the Epistle of James. Rev. J. Bissett spoke on the "Prayer Life of Jesus," showing that He prayed in solitude, that He spent protracted seasons in prayer, and that He prayed at every great crisis of his life. Mr. J. E. Taylor, of Aylesbury, showed the danger of unreality in prayer, as illustrated by Israel of old. Mr. J. H. Smith spoke against praying in a hurry, and using set phrases. Mr. Gilchrist, from the Congo, stated that the great test of the African's sincerity was his prayerfulness.

On Wednesday, the subject was a second Apostolic injunction, viz., "In everything give thanks." Mr. J. E. Taylor occupied the chair, and commended the thankful life as the most useful life. Rev. J. D. Watt, Aberdeen, spoke on thankfulness as leading to contentment. Rev. John Pollock, Glasgow, followed on thankfulness as the outcome of gratitude.

On resuming in the afternoon, Mr. Taylor spoke of methods of living a thankful life. He observed that many people cast their burdens of sin on the Lord, but insist on carrying their burdens of care, and, as a consequence, have no joy. A profitable discussion followed on the benefits of a thankful life.

The concluding meetings of the Conference were held on Wednesday, under the presidency of Dr. Ferguson, Kinmundy. Rev. Professor Robertson expounded a third Apostolic command, viz., "Quench not the Spirit." Dealing chiefly with the work of the Spirit in the Church, he said the Church was God's instrument for doing good in the world. It was the prolongation of Christ's work in the earth, not as a formal external power, but as a spiritual force which applied Christ's redemptive work to fallen humanity. As such it was indwelt by the Spirit, and the multitudinous attempts to evangelize the world were simply the practical outcome of the plenitude of the gifts bestowed on its various members.

Rev. Prebendary Webb-Peploe, of London, followed on "Quenching the Spirit," in the individual life. God wants, not passivity but power; the inventor is honoured by the usefulness of his machine, and the Spirit is glorified when believing men and women are instinct with his presence.

An interesting missionary gathering took place in the afternoon. Rev. Dr. Husband, of Ajmere, gave a graphic description of his personal experiences among the famine-stricken peoples of India. Though the famine had been an unprecedented calamity, yet the results would be beneficial. It had drawn Christians nearer to each other in a united effort to relieve distress, and it had opened doors of usefulness among tribes who hitherto had rejected the Gospel.

Rev. Donald Fraser, from Livingstonia, described pioneer missionary efforts in Central Africa. He affirmed his belief that the world was to be evangelized not by foreign but by native agency, and that the best work of the Church would be the training of native Christians and the sending of them out as teachers and evangelists among their own kindred. He pleaded with great power for a deeper interest in the work of the foreign field.

An evangelistic meeting took place on this as on the previous evenings, and so passed into history our closing Conference of the century. Many testimonies were given after the Conference as to blessing received.

Irish Notes.

THE Irish Baptist Home Mission has chapels now in Cork, Limerick, Athlone, and Waterford, and it has been resolved to prosecute the work with great vigour in other towns in the South and West of Ireland; while, during the winter, meetings are to be held in hired halls, barns, and kitchens. Two new chapels, one at Lurgan and the other at Dublin, were opened during the year, but they are burdened with debt, and, during the summer, tents of the Mission were usefully employed.

Rev. Dr. Robertson, who has just been elected President of Belfast and District Christian Endeavour Union, is pastor of Knock Methodist Church, and has spent twelve years of his ministerial life in Belfast, where he is highly esteemed by a large circle of friends. It is hoped his year of office will be a very successful one for the Christian Endeavour movement in the district.

The Irish Colportage Association owes much to the ladies of Belfast, who in 1888 contributed £100 to the Association, but last year their contributions reached the noble sum of £1,724 10s. 2d.

The Methodists of Belfast form a considerable section of the population, and pay a large share of the taxes. The action, therefore, of the Board of Guardians in resolving to appoint a Methodist chaplain for the local workhouse was only just and right, as there were already Episcopalian, Presbyterian, and Roman Catholic chaplains in that institution; and the appointment removes a long-felt grievance.

The annual conference of the Belfast Branch of the Church of Ireland Young Men's Christian Association has just been held and has passed off successfully. This Association has a well-situated and excellently equipped building, and its secretary is an earnest and energetic worker, yet it is said that many of its ordinary meetings are very poorly attended, and that something must be done to make the meetings more popular.

A Methodist Soldiers' Home has been opened at the Curragh Camp by General Upton Prior, commander of the district. The Home has cost about £1,200, and Rev. William Crawford, M.A., of Dublin, and several others took part in the proceedings.

Welsh Notes.

WE recently drew a dark picture of Roman Catholic aggression in Flintshire. It is gratifying to present the other and brighter side—that of Protestant activity in the same district. Some forty years ago the upholders of the Evangelical faith established schools to counteract the evil influence of the educational establishments of the Roman Catholics in the Asaph Valley. A recent report declares the work of the schools to be decidedly satisfactory. They are five in number. The attendance ten years ago was 365; now it numbers over 500. The contributions for last year amounted to nearly £700.

Preaching associations are a leading feature of the religious life of the Principality. One of the most important of these gatherings took place in connection with the Welsh Congregational churches of Liverpool on September 7, 8, 9. Some of the best-known ministers of the denomination took part in the services. The statistics of Welsh Congregationalism in the Liverpool and Manchester districts showed an increase of 593 church members and of 59 Sunday-school scholars during the year.

Speaking on the occasion of laying the foundation-stone of a new Presbyterian Forward Movement Hall in Newport, Monmouthshire, a few days ago, Rev. Dr. Pugh declared that the Mission, of which he is superintendent, was becoming increasingly popular among the working classes. That it is effective in reaching the masses of the people, is demonstrated by the fact that there are now forty centres in connection with the movement, and these are attended by an aggregate of 35,000 persons, many of whom would never attend regular places of worship.

A recent number of the Drych, the leading Welsh American newspaper, contains a long and highly-appreciative notice of the visit of four Welsh ministers to the United States. These were Revs. J. R. Jones (Pontypridd), Charles Davies (Cardiff), J. W. Price (Troedyrhiw), and D. Phillips (Treharris). The sympathy between the various evangelical bodies in America seems to be of a closer nature than is the case in the old country, for the above-named ministers were welcomed to the pulpits of all denominations.

The rector of Gelligaer, in the course of a sermon in memoriam of the late Canon Evans, of Rhymney, took occasion to speak in strong terms of the distribution of ecclesiastical patronage in Wales. The protest has been made none too soon, for the charge often brought against the Church of England in Wales of being alien and out of touch with national thought and sentiment, has been occasioned by the fatuous policy of electing monoglot Englishmen to high office, and the passing by of capable Welsh clergymen.

The latest report of the North Wales Baptist College shows that endowments to the value of £5,000 have been founded by Alderman R. Cory, of Cardiff, in connection with the College. The endowments are for the purpose of furthering theological and Biblical study.

Recent statistics compiled by the four leading Nonconformist denominations in Wales, go to show that there are about 225,000 Welshmen scattered abroad in various parts of England. In Liverpool alone there are 50,000, while Lancashire and Cheshire between them account for another 40,000. In the counties of Gloucester, Hereford, Shropshire, Staffordshire, and Warwickshire, 60,000 are to be found; while in the Metropolis and its environs there are 50,000 exiled Cymry.

A few months ago, Rev. James Owen, of Swansea, the well-known Baptist minister, announced his intention of retiring from the pastorate of Mount Pleasant Baptist Church—a pastorate which he has filled so ably and well. Pressure was brought to bear upon Mr. Owen to reconsider his decision, and now he has intimated to his people that he will remain with them.

Theatrical Employees.—About 100 theatrical women and girls accepted Mr. William Forbes' invitation to tea on Thursday last, in Bloomsbury Chapel Lecture Hall. After tea, hymns and solos were sung, and brief addresses were given. The Bible Flower Mission sent flowers with texts attached. Mr. Forbes is anxious to get several women into a convalescent home. "Many," he writes, "are in great straits. One young woman and her mother are living on a shilling a day. Some could not pay their 'bus fare to the tea." Mr. Forbes' address is: 71, Tollington Road, N.

Dublin Medical Mission.

AN evidence of both the need and utility of the Dublin Medical Mission is afforded by the increase year by year in the number of patients attending the dispensary. According to the annual report, in 1899 these numbered 10,037, while the visits paid by the doctors reached 3,484, and those of the nurse, 806. To witness the crowd of poor patients gathered for medical treatment and to learn of the Great Physician, is to realize the Christ-like character of the institution. An address is given daily, followed by personal dealing, and many seeking relief from physical pain and suffering, have also found peace with God.

In the impoverished homes the work assumes a more pitiable aspect. One case mentioned in the report serves to illustrate how into the gloom of privation and trial the ministry of loving help brings a welcome ray of sunshine. "In the top back room of a woman once in good circumstances, now in absolute want, lies on a straw bed covered with rags. She tells you of her pain, asks for a drop of milk, but there is none to be found. There is no coal for the fire, and she will die of want and cold. There is no chair to sit upon, and you stand beside the poor sufferer pondering over the love of Christ, that brings doctor and nurse to attend a case like this, she listens as you sing

'WHAT A FRIEND WE HAVE IN JESUS.'

The twenty-third Psalm is read, and you thank God that the mission can reach such as she."

Dr. PIGOTT, in the course of his address at the annual meeting, recalled many instances indicating the definite and real character of the work accomplished. At a mission held a short time ago, several testified to having received blessing. A poor washerwoman, who had been helped herself, found a homeless girl on the stairs of the tenement house in which she lived, gave her shelter, and took her to the Mission services. The girl became deeply affected, and sought the Saviour. The poor woman was not satisfied, but brought others to the meetings, for which she had to SUFFER PERSECUTION.

Her religious instructors (Roman Catholics) endeavoured to dissuade her from going to the meetings, adding, "Is it not enough for you to go yourself without dragging that girl there?" The woman and girl confessed to having found Christ, and could not be persuaded to give up attending. Finding that the woman's determination could not be shaken, the priest left, exclaiming, "You are drinking their medicine, and damning your soul." Threats and admonitions having no effect, the Romanists took away the woman's washing, and finally she was compelled to give up her room. When telling the story to one of the workers, she said in a bright, cheerful voice, "No matter what they do, I'll never give up Jesus; and it is not much to bear for Him, who bore so much for me."

Thus it will be seen that dealing with the mass of sorrow, suffering, destitution, and sin, the workers of the Medical Mission have many and while the religious instructors of the people forbid their attendance at the Mission, where, as they say, "nothing but good is heard," they are allowed to frequent the public-house, where nothing but evil exists.

The needs of the Mission are manifold, not the least important being warm clothes for patients of all ages, blakets and shawls being always valuable. There are invariably many cases of bronchitis and pneumonia, especially requiring warm clothing during convalescence. The poor people beg for work more than anything else. Day after day the cry is, "Could you get me daily work anywhere?" In every department of the Mission's operations, progress has been made, the kindly ministry of the workers having often proved the first link in a chain of lasting blessing to both body and soul.

Communications may be addressed to Mrs. E. J. Figgis, jun., Hawthorn, Sidney Parade, Dublin.

Welcoming the Reservists.

THIS has been a busy year for the workers here, and though it seems but the other day that we were saying good-bye to the Reservists and others going to South Africa, we have now for nearly three months been welcoming home the returning convalescents, hundreds of whom come to Fort Brockhurst for a few days before going on furlough.

By kind permission of the commanding officer, we visit these men on the arrival of each troopship, often going three or four times a week with our bicycles, laden with books, magazines, &c., for distribution. For the most part the men are greatly benefited by the voyage home, and being allowed out after four p.m., large numbers have gladly availed themselves of the invitation to our Home. The tramcars bring them from the Fort to within a short distance. The reading, writing, and coffee rooms are well filled, and the hot baths much appreciated. It is no uncommon sight now to see the "gentlemen in khaki," and we have had representatives of nearly every regiment in the service, besides Imperial Yeomanry, Volunteers, Canadians, and Colonial troops.

Several times we have been able to taken in for a few days the wives and children of men returning from the front. A good many of the Reservists had been to the Home before on their return from India, and remembered our visiting them at the Fort. This has been a specially interesting branch of the work during our twelve years here. We have had every facility from the successive commandants for visiting the home-coming soldiers, and each trooping season the Home has been much used by these men. In the meantime, the men in the garrison have also attended in good numbers, both young recruits, Marines, and the old soldiers of the Royal Reserve. While the latter were in camp, permission was obtained for some open-air meetings which were attended. Our visits to camp, hospital, forts, and ships give a wide field for work, opportunities of speaking for Christ and sowing the seed of the Word. We have been greatly encouraged in this work, and many have been led to decide for Christ during the past year. We are able to distribute books and papers in great quantities, and shall be glad to receive suitable gifts for this purpose.

M. SOPHIE RIDOUT.

Soldiers' Home, Avenue Road, Gosport.

A Question.

A HOME missionary who, since his conversion, has been the means of much blessing to his fellow-men, gave up some years ago a good annual income in order to devote himself with his family entirely to the service of Christ.

The family lives upon the weekly rent of a few small cottages occupied by mining people who do not always pay. It happens sometimes that the very same tenant who professes his inability to pay his rent may be out on an excursion when the collecting day comes round.

What is the landlord to do? As a Christian he shrinks from taking the law to his aid; but is it just that he should be deprived of his own? All his and his family's services to the Mission are gratuitous. Ought he to put the tenants who could pay but will not, into the Court, or is he forbidden to do so?

A CONSTANT READER.

The Twenty-first Annual Conference is to be held at St. George's Cross Tabernacle, next Saturday, Sunday, and Monday. Those expected to take part include—Rev. J. Stuart Holden, Dr. D. Duncan Main (China), Mr. J. G. Logan (Egypt), Mr. W. B. Sloan, and others.

Ex-Salvationists. — A number of isolated workers, formerly belonging to the Salvation Army, and now connected with religious or philanthropic undertakings in various parts of Great Britain, have felt the need of linking themselves together for prayer and mutual encouragement. It has been decided that a Union shall be formed, with correspondents in New York and Toronto, the object being the preservation of "the out and out spirit" among its members, and the helping forward of the work of rescue and evangelization to which they feel God has called them. Particulars may be obtained from Mrs. A. E. Harding, 43, Hillmarton Road, Holloway, N.

About Books.

Darton's Leading Strings is a nursery classic. The new issue is as bright as its predecessors, and the large-type readings will match the merry pictures. (1s. 6d. Wells Gardner, Darton, & Co.)

Sidney H. Beard, of "the Order of the Golden Age," has compiled A Comprehensive Guide-Book to Natural, Hygienic, and Humane Diet (1s. Ideal Publishing Co.). It should be of service in many a home.

Mrs. Septimus Buss gives us some tender lines in Passing Thoughts (Elliot Stock). First come some social verses, then others of the meditative order. In the former section some of the great evils of our time are dealt with.

The Seeking Saviour, and other Bible Themes, by the late Dr. W. P. Mackay, of Hull, is a little work of peculiar value. We welcome the third edition, completing the tenth thousand. (1s. 6d. Hodder & Stoughton).

Our Harvest Festival will be appreciated by conductors desiring a complete seasonable service, with tuneful compositions, a thoughtful meditation, and Scripture readings. (4d. R. Culley, Wesleyan Sunday School Union.)

Not for the first time has the ground been covered which W. H. Broom surveys in The Church of England Prayer Book Compared With the Word of God (3d. James Carter, 13, Paternoster Row). The pages are critical, and will doubtless have many readers.

Sunbeams through the War-Cloud is a volume of short poems on special incidents in South Africa, by Rev. F. J. Hamilton, D.D. The tone of the pages is patriotic and religious. Some of the pieces are well suited for recitation in public. (2s. net. Elliot Stock.)

The Young Woman is an entertaining magazine, though not specially appealing to serious or busy Christian people. The stories and sketches alike are fully illustrated, and there are semi-confidential chats and papers such as the generality of young women like to read. (Horace Marshall & Son.)

Somebody, by Stella Austin (1s.), is a bright little tale for the young folk. So also is At the Foot of the Rainbow (2s.), a tale of adventure, by M. H. Cornwall Legh. Another volume, for the same large constituency, is Left to Themselves, by E. M. Green (2s.), a story of lively interest, admirably illustrated by Arthur Hopkins. (Wells Gardner, Darton, & Co.)

From the Free Age Press, Maldon, Essex, has been issued a deeply-interesting little book, entitled Christian Martyrdom in Russia: Persecution of the Doukhobors. The pages contain papers and letters edited by Vladimir Tchertkoff. Already the book is in its second edition, and some account is given of the deliverance of the people by emigration, organized in large measure by members of the Society of Friends.

There is no more reliable writer on Ritual in the Church of England than Rev. N. Dimock, M.A., sometime vicar of St. Paul's, Maidstone. What is more, this authority regards ceremonies in their right relation to Divine worship. He quotes with approval Bishop Hall's testimony: "We hold preaching an essential part of God's service; ceremonies none at all." We heartily commend to a circle of readers wider than those who merely follow questions of law or decorum, a substantial pamphlet entitled Ritual; its Use and Misuse, considered especially in view of the Church's Debt to the Lost World (1s. net. Elliot Stock). The chapters were originally published in The Churchman. They are a model of controversial style, and have much to teach regarding the relation of shadow and substance in religious worship. Another useful work by the same author, is Light from History on Christian Ritual (2s. Charles Murray, 7, Paternoster Square). Rich in facts and cogent in reasoning, this little work should do something to clear the air of wild statements and bold assumptions on points of Ritual. It is issued under the direction of the Council of the National Protestant Church Union.

A useful booklet is HINTS TO OPEN-AIR WORKERS, by C. N. B. Muston. (6d. per doz. Edinburgh: W. Nicol, 67, High Street.)

Messrs. J. Sears & Sons, Crane Court, E.C., are issuing a new periodical, to begin next year, entitled THE BAPTIST HERALD, for church and home. It is designed for denominational localization.

A new series of timely tracts are being published by the Convent Inquiry Society, 3, Gray's Inn Place, W.C. In lucid and powerful terms these leaflets expose the secret methods and characteristics of convent life. (3d. per doz.; 1s. 9d. per 100.)

Rev. A. G. Townshend, vicar of Sileby, Leicestershire, has written a searching tract for the times, entitled ROMANISM IN THE S.P.G.: Reasons why Evangelicals should not support the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. (5d. per dozen. Carson, Grafton Street, Dublin.)

Imperial Protestant Federation.—There have been still further additions to the ranks of the Imperial Protestant Federation recently, the Countess of Huntingdon's Connexion and the Free Church of England having joined it. The demand for copies of the petition against the proposed Irish Roman Catholic University shows no sign of abating, and over 28,000 copies have now been despatched to all parts of the kingdom. The electoral rolls of the Federation are now being worked by fourteen Protestant societies in about 400 places. Applications for petitions or electoral rolls should be addressed to 3, Palmer Street, Queen Anne's Gate, London, S.W.

Death of Mr. Robert Rae.

MANY will hear with sorrow of the death of Mr. R. Rae, for many years secretary of the National Temperance League; he died at Westgate-on-Sea on Saturday last. Born in Hamilton, N.B., in 1823, Mr. Rae entered a Glasgow business house in 1841, and about the same time commenced his contributions to the temperance journals. In November, 1846, he became secretary of the newly-formed Scottish Temperance League, and, along with three friends, established the Glasgow Commercial College, for which he acted as secretary. His first visit to England was in 1848, when he went to British Temperance League meetings at Manchester. Next year found him in Ireland, and London welcomed him in the year of the Great Exhibition, 1851. In October, 1853, he retired from the League secretaryship to devote himself to to the Commonwealth newspaper. When its career closed, in 1861, he accepted an invitation to become Secretary to the National Temperance League, in connection with which he laboured without intermission until quite recently. In July, 1887, an illuminated address, influentially signed, was presented to Mr. Rae. It referred to the remarkable progress made during his connection with the temperance movement, and was accompanied by a cheque for £1,500. A couple of years ago Mr. Rae was knocked down by a cab in the City, and from the effects of the injuries he then received he never thoroughly recovered.

A Story of a Hat.

GOD told me at Leeds to wear a silk hat, and have on it in gold letters, "PREPARE TO MEET THY GOD." My heart rose against this. Now see: 14s. was the price of a hat. I said, "Lord, I have not got 14s." A gentleman said to me, "Day, I have a hat upstairs. Would you accept it?" "What sort?" said I. "A top hat," said he. "Capital," said I. "Now, God made my head, and if this is of Him, it will fit." I tried it; it did.

In Sheffield, a lady beckoned to me at Central Station. "What do you want, madam?" "Oh, that hat upsets me." "Nay, it cannot be the hat; you mean the words on it." "I have made no preparation," said she.

Dining in the same city, a gentleman called me: "I think, sir, I ought to speak to you about your hat. Were you not dining at such a place? Did you not eat your dinner wearing the hat?" "Yes," said I. "Well," said he, "the barmaid read the solemn words. The next thing I saw, she was wiping the tears away."

The first to encourage my heart was a sergeant of police near the General Post Office; numbers were reading the words. "God will use that," said he; "I will pray for you, my brother." In the Strand, late at night, I quietly walk, respectably dressed (for my Father, who paints the pansy so gay, looks after my raiment). A poor harlot looked at the words, and turned deadly pale. Doubtless her past life came up.

Is not the following grand? An official said, "No religious books can be given away; but this man has stolen a march on the magistrate. There is no bye-law to deal with a hat." A gentleman is having the words, "Prepare to meet thy God," written on a conspicuous space, paying £5 per year for rent. This is the outcome of the hat. He is a convert of precious Richard Weaver. Two other spaces will be thus used.

The bookmakers have declared that they will "do for me." Ever since Ben Alberto's conversion last year, they have tried to break the pole of my Gospel banner.

Notes & Comments

THE break-up of the Boer armies, and the passing of Botha's commando into Portuguese territory, where they will be practically prisoners, clearly presages the end of the wearisome war in South Africa. As soon as the "marauding bands" that are left are disposed of, a new era will begin in this deplorable racial conflict. It should be one of conciliation, wise government, and gradual elimination of the causes of race-animosity. The task before the administrators of the South African dependencies in the near future will be a very difficult but a very honourable one. It will be to "slay the enmity" that remains, and establish a new sense of mutual confidence and co-operation between the Dutch and English. A nobler task could not be entrusted to them. Those who wish well to South Africa will pray that it may be fulfilled in the spirit of true justice and religion.

Rev. E. G. Gange, in a recent sermon, said that while conscription had its strenuous enemies in some quarters, it was, at least, significant that in France and Germany, where the system prevailed, there was much greater dread of war than in this country. The existence of a military class was a great danger, because, in times of excitement, the people clamoured for war without any sense of personal danger, and considered that, as they had paid the piper, they had a right to call the tune. But there are surely better ways of deepening the sense of responsibility in so serious a matter as this. The war in South Africa, which has brought death and sorrow into so many homes, and will soon press so hard in extra taxation on the resources of millions more, will probably make war an unpopular cry for many a year to come—and this will be one of its few beneficent aspects. There is, in addition to this, a special call on all who have any educative influence on the people to preach the neglected doctrines of peace and brotherhood among the nations.

The Archbishop of York's distinction between a "sacrifice of memorial" and a "sacrifice of propitiation," as applied to the Lord's Supper, made in his Church Congress sermon last week, does not seem to help very much the controversy which is rending the Church of England into opposing camps, and filling the country with increasing disquietude. In the first place, he was giving his own reading of the question, and in the same sermon he pleaded for the right of others to differ from him. In the second place, what precisely are we to understand by the phrase, "sacrifice of memorial"? If, as he said, "the one, perfect, all-sufficient sacrifice had been offered once for all"—in what sense can the celebration of the Lord's Supper be anything but a "memorial" of that one sacrifice? One thing is certain—that this deliverance will not hinder the Romanizing party from pursuing its tactics, for it is clear that the highest dignitaries in the Church have no authoritative direction to give to anyone.

The Bishop of Southwark spoke very strong words about the appointments that are frequently made to offices in the cathedrals, the men often being chosen not for the Church's sake, but for the man's sake, and even for his family's sake. He was right in proclaiming the law that in the matter of patronage no one could plead that "he could do what he liked with his own." It was an office of sacred trust, and the Church would never get efficient men for her work till every patron from the Crown downwards chose men with reference to their fitness for that particular office. When to the "family" interest is added that of ritualistic bias, the chances for right and true appointments are further minimised.

Meanwhile, as is shown by a Parliamentary return made at the suggestion of Lord Hugh Cecil, the sale of advowsons continues briskly, in spite of the recent prohibition of the disposal of "next presentations." As many as seventy-seven livings were sold last year, ten being disposed of to clergymen and nineteen to ladies. This traffic in the right of appointing spiritual teachers and pastors is a great affliction to the Church. It is doubtful how long the present condition of things can be allowed to go on. The attempts of Parliament to deal with this and other ecclesiastical questions piecemeal have been singularly and significantly unsuccessful.

The Baptists, who are holding their autumn assembly in Leicester, are looking forward to the new century with hopefulness. The president of the Union, Rev. W. Cuff, delivered on Wednesday morning an address characterized by deep spirituality and vigour. Referring to the Simultaneous Mission of the Free Churches, to be held next year, he said:

> The most elaborate preparations are being made for it. Many large cities and towns have been selected, and preachers appointed to conduct the services. We supremely desire all the churches to join in the mission. It is not a mission to the poor churches in the slums, but to all the churches in centres and suburbs. We earnestly plead with our best people to come to the meetings, and help in the work. All the leading preachers, pastors, and evangelists are giving their time and strength to the mission. We mean to preach the Gospel, and more, to take it to the homes of the people and verily seek their souls.
> It is not a mere outside mission, but a mission of the churches, mainly conducted by their pastors, and mostly in our places of worship. We shall gather in the sheaves. We believe the confession of faith to be of the greatest importance. "With the heart man believeth unto righteousness; and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation." Our prayer and fondest hope is that our own children may be saved and added to the Church.
> This mission may bring to us other things. Some churches that are doing next to nothing may learn how to mission their own immediate neighbourhood, and get the people in to hear their own pastor. In some chapels there is plenty of room, and if vacant places were filled there would be unbounded joy. Pastors are weeping before the Lord because so little is done to gather in the people. This mission may teach us all how to do much more holy work for Christ.

With these facts in mind, the churches may well betake themselves to prayer. Where they are so engaged, let them throw themselves with ever-increasing faith upon the mercy and faithfulness of God.

A Daily Express "special" of last week, upon the value of a licence, marshals facts of serious import. A drink licence obtained for a house increases the value of property to an abnormal extent.

> Thus in Newcastle there is a small public-house consisting of two storeys only, situate opposite the gates of a large factory. As a house the place is worth about £250, yet two years ago it fetched at a public auction the sum of £28,100! In London two public-houses realized £112,000; £59,000 was paid for a forty-nine years' licence in the Walworth Road; £105,000 for two houses in a squalid part of the docks district; and recently a house at Clapham has been valued at £130,000.

The value of the licences in the United Kingdom is enough to pay off the National Debt.

The Express writer, dealing with the situation entirely from a national point of view, urges that these licences should be taxed, since "the value of a licence granted is unearned increment." Pending the time when a strong Government will grapple with the drink question on the ground of morality, it is certainly reasonable to demand that a check should be placed upon > the enrichment of fat tavern keepers, who sit behind their bars and grow wealthy out of the natural weakness for drink.

At the present moment the country is practically giving, through licences, its wealth to the worst sections of the community.

One of the worst features of the liquor business is the creation of immense vested interests directly a new licence is granted. Lord Gray the other day found himself the sudden possessor of £10,000 through a case of this kind. He has declared his intention of devoting all the profits to local objects. This is a practical illustration of the Gothenburg system on a small scale. The question whether the same method might not be carried out on a larger scale is a very relevant one, especially in view of the powers given to the new governing bodies of London which are just coming into existence. This would possibly be a step towards the gradual extinction of licences, so restricting the temptations to drink. It would at least secure that private speculators should cease to make enormous fortunes out of the drinking facilities of the nation.

Naturally, the "Beer and Wine Trade National Defence League" and "the United Parliamentary Council of the Retail Liquor Trade" are in arms at the present political juncture, and in their communications in regard to the General Election have some strong things to say in regard to "the Teetotal Party," the greatest prominence being given to the question of compensation "if for any sound reason of public policy any such licences should at any time be withheld." The fallacy of the arguments in regard to "private property" is easy to see, and that in such cases "the compensation should be provided out of the revenues of the State"—or, in other words, out of the pocket of the sober citizen—is opposed to common sense and common honesty, seeing that a licence is simply an annual concession. The Liverpool Bench certainly do not seem to attach much importance to such illogical contentions.

Dr. Dawson Burns has once more tabulated the painful and startling returns of the drink traffic, and it appears from them that the national expenditure upon intoxicating drink in 1899 exceeded £162,000,000 sterling, including £46,000,000 upon wines and spirits. Dr. Burns says that, in calculating the amount thus spent by the working classes, he has considered it fair to assign to them "a total of £84,000,000 as the amount expended by industrial manual classes in one year upon intoxicating liquor." With such figures before us, it is not difficult to trace the source of a large proportion of the poverty and crime which disgrace our national life, or to recognise the terrible responsibility incurred by Government in not only permitting the existence in our midst of such an evil, but in even fostering its growth and development.

It is painful to observe that the crime of suicide continues to increase both in Britain and upon the Continent. In France the number of cases has grown during the last half century over 200 per cent., although the population of that country has increased only 18 per cent. In Germany and Belgium also the rate has nearly doubled, while in Denmark it has remained stationary. In England and Wales it has grown by about a third as compared with the period covered by the first twenty years of Her Majesty's reign; but this increase, happily, is not so serious as it would otherwise appear when the large growth of the population has been allowed for. In any case, however, it is a lamentable side of modern life.

Dr. Lorimer, of Boston, U.S.A., writing on the "Modern Distress of Nations," discusses three things which, he declares, are at the bottom of the difficulty, the race factor, the thirst for riches, and religion. Speaking of the element of greed, the Doctor says:

> Money, greed, the thirst for riches, has played a considerable part in the development of the present crisis. The Asiatic is not a fool. He knows as well as we do that the white man's interest in the coloured man, with the exception of Christians and philanthropists, is largely, if not altogether, determined by the question of gain. We must admit that there is a good degree of smug hypocrisy in our talk of "benevolent assimilation," for the fact is, except in speech and to quiet the Republican conscience, there is very little benevolence in our dealings with alien and inferior tribes. We rush in among them for purposes of trade, and we convey to them in exchange our special vices.

This is a factor which many refuse to deal with in the consideration of the present crisis; but it is there, and it must be dealt with before the strife will die out. The really important thing is not to suppress rebellion (although that has to be done), but to remove the causes which have led to the present outburst of hatred, and chief amongst these causes is an unholy greed.

The question of diminished attendance at Sunday schools, to which we recently called attention, is provoking a correspondence in several religious papers. Certain enthusiasts will not admit the damaging facts at all, others are exaggerating them in a ridiculous manner. What is needed is a sane and honest attempt to get at the facts in every case, and then to seek for the real reason of the decline in attendance. Nearly all the letters in one journal take the line that young people are tired of Sunday school because the teachers, for the most part, do not teach the "advanced" views which regard the Bible narrative of the Fall as a myth, and evangelical teaching as crude and out of date. It is pretty evident that such correspondents read their own fads into the situation. It is far more likely that the "broad" teaching accepted by many parents has destroyed their interest in their children's conversion, and that the apathy of the parents has acted unfavourably upon the children.

There is a "breadth" of thought and of life which is a very poor kind of narrowness; and there is what men term "narrowness" which is really the truest breadth. The tendency of all fruit trees is towards "breadth"—i.e., if they are allowed to grow in their own way, they spread out in all directions, to their detriment; but wise gardeners restrict their outreach, and narrow the trees within certain limits, so that better fruit may be borne. It is much the same with men and women: minds and hearts which are so "broad" that they can go out equally towards truth and error fail of the highest results. To obtain the best and to accomplish the best in life it is necessary for persons to rigorously apply the pruning-knife. Of course there is a false and a petty narrowness which is always harmful; but the true narrowness, which limits life so as to concentrate its forces, is absolutely necessary for the true Christian.

Prevailing Prayer.

Rev. THEODORE L. CUYLER, D.D.

THERE are several other good women named in Bible biographies to whom we owe our gratitude besides Hannah, the model mother; Ruth, the model daughter; and Dorcas, who sanctified the needle. One of these was that Syro-Phœnician woman who came to Jesus, and besought him to cast the evil spirit out of her afflicted daughter. For a time the Master seemed to hold her, as it were, at arm's length, in order to try the mettle of her faith. Like Bartimeus, she only cries the more importunately for mercy; and like him she carries the day. "Go thy way," saith the compassionate Jesus: "O woman, great is thy faith; be it unto thee even as thou wilt." And so He granted to a great faith what He might have denied to a little faith.

Prayer is not a teasing and a coaxing of an unwilling God; it is the fervent plea of weakness and of want into the open ear of One who knows just what is best for us. One of the things that it is best for us to have is a complete trust in God. He does not cheapen his mercies; nor does He toss them to us as a foolish father flings money to a spendthrift son. We must come into and stay there. An honest, trustful faith—a faith that works while it prays—a faith that is not baulked by discouragements—does not plead without securing some real and precious blessings. Such faith creates such a condition of things that it is wise for God to grant what would otherwise be denied.

There are many things in the loving providence of our heavenly Father to which we ought to submit. We ought to submit unconditionally and without murmurings to certain chastisements and bereavements. "I opened not my mouth, because Thou didst it." A child-like faith has often written that line with eyes swimming with tears, and has often carved those words on the monument that covered a darling of the heart. But there are many things in our pathway that we must not submit to; we must wrestle with them and overcome them. If Apollyon strides across our road we must fight him out of the road. If a difficulty blocks our path of duty, then is the time for a stout faith to "remove the mountain." A parent whose children are yet unconverted has no business to sit down in silent submission to such a state of things. Neither has a pastor or a church any right to sit down submissively to the terrible fact that the Gospel is powerless, and no souls are converted. The reason why there are no revivals in some churches is that they actually vote not to have them!

The Syro-Phœnician mother would have done egregiously wrong if she had gone home submissively under a first seeming discouragement. "There's nae gude done John, till ye get into the close grups." So said Jeems, the doorkeeper to Dr. John Brown, who gave us the immortal "Rab." There lies one secret of prevailing prayer. The woman of Canaan carried her point and got the demon expelled from her daughter because she came into a "close grip" on the Divine Healer. God is a wise and supreme Sovereign up yonder, and we are responsible free agents down here. As a sovereign,

HE HAS COMMANDED US TO PRAY, and to pray without ceasing. The ceasing would be a sin. God reserves to Himself the right to grant our requests when He chooses, and just as He chooses. It is our duty to pray, and it is God's right to bestow the answers that seem best to Him; i.e., such answers as are for our good and for his glory. The right kind of faith is that temper of the soul which submits to what God orders, but never submits to what God can make better. If we yield to temptations and yield to discouragements when we ought to struggle against them; if we are tamely content to be without spiritual blessings, and neither labour nor pray persistently for such blessings, we deserve to suffer.

Prevailing prayer must always be accompanied with prevailing effort on our part. God never puts a premium on cowardice or laziness, or palpable neglect of duty. There is no haphazard in prayer. All of God's promises have their conditions; we must comply with those conditions, or we cannot expect the blessings coupled with the promises. No farmer is such an idiot as to unless he has ploughed his field and sowed his seed. Be sure, my Christian friend, that you are honestly and perseveringly doing your part, if you expect God to do his part. He promises his Holy Spirit to his ministers and his churches when they are willing to co-operate with the Spirit; if they quench the Holy Spirit, they pay the terrible penalty.

What a magnificent epic are the triumphs of prevailing faith! The Bible history shines with the glorious record. The early church was "continuing with one accord in supplication," when the Pentecostal baptism of power descended upon them. Prayer opened Peter's prison-doors; and I have seen awakened sinners come into meetings and inquiry-rooms who were just as truly delivered from Satan's prisons as the Apostle was, by fervent intercessory prayer. That Syro-Phœnician mother's message to the churches to-day is—prayer is power! Everything with Jesus; less than nothing without him! Two things our churches must do if their barrenness is to be exchanged for harvests. The one is to quit the companionship of a self-indulgent corrupting "world;" for, as long as the world has influence on Christians, they will gain none on the world. The other is to come into closer companionship with Christ Jesus. Closer in clean, godly living; closer in self-sacrifice; closer in love labours for the salvation of souls. Then the "close grups" in prayer will bring down the sought-for blessings.

Whitefield and Moody.

THE appearance of the Life of Dwight L. Moody in June last, and of a new Life of George Whitefield in September, may be said to constitute a sign.* They remind us that mighty men of God have been among us, that the truth which has conquered men's hearts in crowds has been what John Wesley called "a bleeding Lord," and that we and our children's children may see greater things than were seen either in Whitefield's or Moody's days. It is not possible to read the two lives without at once beginning to compare and contrast the two great evangelists and their work. In some things the similarity, in other things the dissimilarity, was remarkable.

POINTS OF RESEMBLANCE.

The root of each man's life as a Christian worker was a clear and definite conversion: in Whitefield's case, the termination of long and bitter struggles in his own soul, not unlike those of John Bunyan; in Moody's case, the fruition of very ordinary experiences, and thoughts, and longings. But both started fair and square, never hampered with misgivings and questions as to their own relation to God and to Christ their Saviour; they knew in whom they had believed; they knew that they had been turned from darkness to light, and the light never so faded away as to cause anxiety as to their own salvation and consequent vacillation in work. Come what might, they always realized that they belonged to the Saviour, that He had called them to be disciples and servants.

They practically held the same faith—evangelicalism, with a leaning to Calvinism. As Wesley described Whitefield's belief, so might Moody's be described, in these words: "All men are dead in trespasses and sins; all are by nature children of wrath; all are guilty before God, liable to death, temporal and eternal. All power to think, speak, or act aright, is in and from the Spirit of Christ; and all merit is in the blood of Christ. May they not be summed up as it were in two words—the new birth and justification by faith?"

Whether these men were right or wrong, this was their belief, and this was the truth they proclaimed with such marvellous power and results the whole of their lifetime. Whether anything can create a revival of religion, or call into existence a preacher with the necessary zeal, steadfastness, courage, and unselfishness to head a revival, other than this belief, the world has yet to see.

It is also to be remembered in the cases of Whitefield and Moody, that they drew from their belief such a realization of the love of God as made them almost irresistible in tenderness. Whitefield's tears seldom admitted of such a thing as "a dry meeting," and no one who ever saw them can forget the melting affection of Moody's eyes. Both men were and while others, professing what they call a broader and more intelligent creed, say a great deal about love, and make only a faint impression, they impressed and won by the thousand persons of all classes and of every shade of culture and of no culture at all. This fact also has to be accounted for.

Naturally they were both of an affectionate disposition, impulsive in temperament, and large-hearted; just the kind of men to exert a deep and wide influence. They were the men who may be used in great movements intended to be catholic, in the best sense of that word. Whilst John and Charles Wesley never fraternized with Dissenters, as Free Churchmen were called in their day, Whitefield, from the very first, went among them freely, and ultimately became one of them in practice, although he never formally disowned the Church of England nor was disowned by her. Indeed, he lived on terms of warm friendship with many of the clergy, and they heartily co-operated with him both in consecrated churches and in unconsecrated chapels. He was the most liberal-minded man of his day. So also Moody, who was by preference a Congregationalist, just as Whitefield came to be one of the same order, was no narrow bigot who believed that he alone was right, and everyone else wrong. As became an evangelist, he was a brother of all those who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity.

The unconventional freedom of the two men, their warm-hearted ways of doing good, procured for them the same epithet of "honest" and "crazy" at the beginning of their careers. In England men said it was "honest, crazy Whitefield" who was preaching; in Chicago they said it was "honest, crazy Moody" who was rushing about after his philanthropic and religious schemes. Curious it is to see how the wise men, the prudent, the discreet, who never get excited save over a "boom" or a "slump" in the stock and share market, always hit upon the idea of some mental defect as the explanation of unselfish devotion. Paul was "mad;" Jesus was "beside Himself." And everyone who lives well up to his Christian faith is

"A BIT GONE ON RELIGION."

Yet wisdom is justified of all her children. Jesus is owned, even by enemies, as the one peerless Character of the ages; Paul is one of the deepest of thinkers; Whitefield retained for more than thirty years the unwavering confidence and attachment of a man so shrewd as Franklin, of a people so "canny" as the Scotch, of colonists so independent as the New Englanders, of a city so cosmopolitan as London; and Moody was acclaimed in his own land and by the keen merchants of every great city in Britain, "the incarnation of common sense." In his own day a man may be accounted "a fool for Christ's sake;" but time brings round the judgment that he was wiser than any of his generation.

It may be safely conceded that both these evangelists gave no little colour by the audacity of their campaigns to the charge of "crazy." But can "works of faith and labours of love" ever be measured by the standards of the world?

In a beautiful humility that was willing to confess faults in the most open way, these two Christian workers were strikingly alike. If they grieved wittingly or unwittingly the lowliest person, they would seek to atone for the wrong and undo it. The Spirit of the Saviour is as conspicuous in the courage which trampled upon pride as in their exhausting and unintermitting labours. Neither of them ever shrank from saying:

"I DID WRONG: I AM SORRY FOR IT."

They resemble each other in the lowly beginnings of their work, and in the lack of intellectual distinction in their deliverances. Whitefield was thankful to preach to prisoners, to a few village people, to scattered colonists; and Moody found his first audiences in rough boys whom he gathered from the streets and among the humble toilers of Chicago. But God granted them both to speak to some of the greatest and most distinguished of their day. They had a surpassing power for impressing truth on all types of mind; they had "an unction of the Holy One" which made them preachers of consummate ability.

Two men may speak the word "love"—one in such a way as that you pay no heed, the other so that your heart is won for ever. Garrick would have given a hundred guineas to be able to say "Oh" as did Whitefield. The exclamation must have had depths of tenderness, of entreaty, of anxious love, of eager concern, of mighty yearning, which Whitefield's spiritual vision saw and penetrated, but which Garrick's worldly mind saw not, and of which his tones could therefore give no hint. And Moody's voice, too, said much in common words.

THE POINTS OF DISSIMILARITY

between these men are just as striking as the points of similarity. Whitefield burst at once into power as an orator; Moody never was an orator at all. Whitefield was eloquence personified; Moody was only a talker. In Whitefield, the voice, the look, the gesture, the whole man uttered the message; in Moody, you simply had a man who was in supreme earnest, as sincere as the day, pressing home a truth of momentous import. Whitefield's instant triumph as a preacher in his first sermon—which was preached largely to persons who had known him from boyhood, and was said to have made fifteen "mad"—showed how true it is that "the orator is born, not made." But Moody at first could with difficulty get through a five minutes' talk to a class. Slowly, but steadily and surely, he pressed on until more liberty and power were gained.

The spiritual dissimilarity between the two souls is remarkable. From the very moment when Whitefield saw Jesus as his Saviour by faith he surrendered all to Him, and had no ambition, no desire, to do anything but proclaim Him to everyone. From that moment also he was filled with the Spirit. His first sermon was preached with liberty and with what he calls "Gospel authority," and with saving results. For five-and-thirty years that converting power flowed through him in an unbroken stream. This is awesome—a preacher who from the first sermon to the last never seems to have preached a sermon but souls were saved. But Moody had worldly ambitions, even after his conversion, which had to be surrendered before power came upon him, and still further discipline and teaching had to be passed through before he reached those ample spaces of peace and joy and fellowship with God, where he, too, became

A UNIFORMLY USEFUL PREACHER.

The eloquent orator was no organizer. Moody was consummate at organizing. The spirit of our mechanical, methodizing age was incarnated in him, much to the advantage of his work, still more to the advantage of the generations that shall follow, and that shall enjoy the privileges of his great institutions. The conditions under which the two men laboured were a perfect contrast. Whitefield could find nothing swifter than a horse on land and a sailing-vessel on sea; Moody travelled by the fastest of trains and steamboats. Whitefield, when he was shattered with disease (and he was a sufferer almost from the beginning of his labours), had nothing more comfortable than a rickety carriage to ride in over pre-macadamized roads; Moody had the comfortable, smooth-moving saloon carriage. Whitefield many times rode 2,000 miles, from Savannah to York in Maine, or vice versa; swimming wide rivers, creeks, and estuaries; tracking his way through forests and swamps; preaching as he went along through hunting for souls." Moody encountered no such exposure. Whitefield had to gather his congregations from widely-scattered farms, hamlets, villages, and small towns; Glasgow had only 20,000 persons; and, the great cities of the manufacturing counties had to be made. Moody found in his own country and in this country the people massed in huge cities, easily accessible through posters on the hoardings and advertisements in daily papers. Whitefield had to use the open fields for his huge audiences; Moody generally had his under some kind of cover. It is true that buildings of some size were raised for Whitefield at Boston and Philadelphia, but they would not compare with the structures possible in our day. And then, it remains to be said, that Whitefield had no aid from music such as Moody enjoyed from the singing of his friend, Mr. Sankey. And Moody seems to have had money far more freely placed at his disposal than had Whitefield.

The mighty evangelist of the last century used to say that God's people were justified in expecting greater things than the world had ever seen, and that greater and greater would follow. Moody's work is greater than Whitefield's. What will the next work be? Who will be the worker? What will be his methods? All this remains in the unknown. But is it unknown how the work will begin? Will it not then, as heretofore, begin as a grain of mustard seed? And will not the worker be some unknown man, like the youth who came from the Bell Inn, Gloucester, and the youth from the Boston and Chicago boot-stores?

Reflections on the War.—II.

By AVARY H. FORBES, M.A.

MAGNANIMITY.

THIS virtue, which is a much rarer one than bravery, has, however, been perhaps as proportionately conspicuous in the present war. The most difficult form of magnanimity is, perhaps, to appreciate the good qualities of the foe, especially after reading the English newspapers of the later months of 1899. Yet our soldiers have recognised repeatedly how deceived they had been in their estimate of the foe. Of this there is ample testimony; but the following must suffice:—

"I see by your letter that you think the Boers curs and cowards. Do not run away with that idea, as it is not all Gospel that is printed in the home newspapers. We, who are actors in this great drama, know and think differently. Of course there are a few isolated cases of Boer treachery; but take them all through they are a brave lot." (From a Corporal, East Surrey Regiment, February 8.)

"I am now in the Boer Ward. I was much surprised on coming in contact with these men. From what I had read previous to coming out, I had imagined they were a rough, uneducated lot; but those I have seen are quite the contrary. Without exception, they are a very decent lot of fellows, well educated, and will talk on any subject except the war." (From a Private of St. John's Ambulance Brigade, March 22.)

"I never wish to meet a braver general than Cronje, and I have never served in a war where less vindictive feelings existed between the two opposing armies than in this." (From Lord Methuen, March 20.)

"The Boers showed great kindness both to the wounded and unwounded on that day." (From the late Mr. Steevens, war correspondent of Daily Mail, March 2.)

"No matter what the English papers say to belittle the Boers, they are a brave, stubborn foe, and not nearly so bad as they are painted." (From Sapper J. M., 26th Company Royal Engineers, March 8.)

A higher note is struck in the following simple facts, more eloquent perhaps than pages of eulogy.

"One would hardly have thought they were enemies. They talked to us quite freely, and helped us to dig the graves and to carry our dead. There was one very touching incident. After our Major had read the burial service, one of the Boers stepped out and said a short prayer, hoping the war would soon end, and while we stood with heads uncovered, they sang a hymn in Dutch. It cut our fellows up very much; in fact they could hardly speak for some time." (From an officer of Army Medical Corps, March 20.)

Nor was this an isolated case. Corporal Ambrose, of the Suffolk Regiment, writing home about the disaster which his regiment suffered, says:

"The Boers helped to dig the graves and bury our dead. They sang two hymns over the graves of our dead" (February 19).

MORE THAN CONQUERORS.

It is a remarkable fact that there has been more fruitful Christian work amongst soldiers during this war than, perhaps, there has ever been before in our Army. The work began, indeed, on board the troopships going out.

"Something like thirty conversions," writes a soldier (who was also a member of the Salvation Army), "had been recorded by the time the vessel dropt anchor in Table Bay" (War Cry, March 3).

"We have seventeen professing Christians on board," writes another. "We have had a meeting every night since sailing. . . God is with me, and is blessing me; and even on board a transport—gambling, cursing, and swearing on either hand—He keeps me with a clean heart" (War Cry, January 20).

It is to this poor fellow that the following refers:

"MacLaine is numbered with the slain. . . The soldier's spirit has conquered, and gone to spend an eternity with God" (Ibid).

Every one knows the anecdote of Sir Philip Sidney at Zutphen—refusing the drink of water in favour of a wounded soldier, while he himself lay mortally wounded. Its heroism has, however, been paralleled—and more than once—in the present war. Take the following from the War Cry of February 3:—

"Bob Drysdale passed away singing hymns to the last. Every man in the regiment (Black Watch) is talking about him. One man went to give him a drink, but he refused, saying, 'Give it to another lad; I have got the water of Life.'"

A member of the Naval Brigade was killed at Graspan:

"When he fell, one of his comrades offered him some brandy, but he pushed it from him with the remark, 'No, I belong to God; He will take care of me.'" (War Cry, February 27.)

Leaguer Scott, of the Black Watch, had some remarkable escapes.

"His kilt was fairly riddled with bullets, and his can was struck twice. To the astonishment of his comrades he kept singing, steadily and calmly, as the bullets whizzed by him, 'Safe in the arms of Jesus.' Truly salvation makes a man a hero at such times as these." (War Cry, February 3.)

Mr. Wheeler, the late devoted secretary of the Soldiers' Christian Association, sent much glorious news from the front. After visiting the field of Magersfontein, he said:

"I could not help thinking of the many lads who had fallen, who had taken part in our conventions at Exeter Hall. Among them was Colour-Sergeant McMillan, of the Black Watch (who spoke last year in the afternoon). When his officers were cut down he called out, 'Men of A company, prepare to meet your God. Forward! Charge!' Then he himself fell mortally wounded, and died singing hymns." (The Christian, February 8, and News from the Front.)

In the same report, Mr. Wheeler wrote further:

"We soon erected a large tent, and from the moment it was put up it has been thronged with men. . . It is not too much to say that men are pressing into the Kingdom. There has not been a night without several conversions to God, and backsliders being restored." (Ibid.)

In a booklet, entitled "At Modder River," issued by the South Africa General Mission, we read:

"The opportunities for spiritual work were very many, as there was no need to open the topic. Men started it unasked, and were glad of any kind, helpful words. Night after night in our Soldiers' Home the 'old, old story' is told forth, and many a British soldier is to-day thanking God, and experiencing that Modder River battle has since become the scene of wonderful deliverance from the bondage of sin."

Very much more similar testimony might be given from the Wesleyan, Presbyterian, Church of England, and other Christian agencies evangelizing at the front.

Neither were the Boers strangers to this work.

"I am on guard over the Boer prisoners, but, of course, cannot speak to them. They have a prayer and a hymn before they go to sleep every night; so, you see, they know about the Master."—War Cry, March 3.

"It is very interesting to know that several Dutchmen who have been blessed in our work at Johannesburg are seeking to do work for Christ amongst the Dutch troops, though quite on their own account."—At Modder River.

Thus we see that, while in this war many have been sent to a sad and early grave, many, both of friends and foes, have been made "more than conquerors, through Him that loved us."

South Arcot Mission, India.—The address of Miss Bazett, mentioned in a recent issue, in connection with this Mission, should have been 19 (not 29) Argyle Road, Ealing, W.

The Late Mr. Rabinowitch's Mission to Israel.—The London Council for the late Mr. Rabinowitch, in a supplementary report, announce the termination of the mission in Kischeneff so far as their oversight and responsibility are concerned. Through the kindness of friends the treasurer has been enabled to remit to Mrs. Rabinowitch the sum of £385. The question of the use to be made of the Somerville Hall in Kischeneff is to be decided by the trustees in Scotland.

Clapton Mission Home of Rest.—It is anticipated that the new Primitive Methodist Home of Rest which is being erected at Southend-on-Sea, in connection with Clapton Mission, will be opened for the reception of visitors in the Spring of 1901. Last year over 200 were assisted and entertained at the temporary home. The new institution will provide accommodation for forty visitors to be in residence. It is estimated that the cost of the building, including site, will amount to £3,000, and strenuous efforts are being made with a view to presenting the Home of Rest to the Connexion free of debt. The superintendent is Rev. Thomas Jackson, 58, Rushmore Road, Clapton, London.

"Friend, Lend Me. . ."

DURING this last year the Lord has laid on my heart a question which I believe He would have me hand on to you. "How far are we Christians now-a-days worthy of the name He gave us—'Friends of Christ?'" When I was home on furlough a short time ago I could not help noticing the large amount spent by "Friends of Christ" on the beautiful things of this world, and my heart was sad as I thought of the loss this meant to our Master, and of what glory and joy that wealth might have brought to Him if it had been spent to advance his kingdom.

And during this year my heart has been made still more sad at the contrast between the millions gladly given for England's honour and glory and the thousands of volunteers eager to risk their lives for her, and the comparatively small self-sacrifice shown in order to uphold and increase the honour and glory of our Lord and King.

We hardly realize, I think, how our King depends on us for the spread of his kingdom. He has entrusted all the stores and supplies to us to use for Him, and if we keep for ourselves that which should be used in fighting his battles, the great enemy comes off victorious when the victory might have been for Him. Each open door not entered, each suffering body not cared for, each orphan not gathered in, means a victory for Satan, where there might have been defeat, if the volunteers and the supplies had been at hand. Ours is a great responsibility!

A letter from Mafeking says: "We have received a letter from the Queen to-day, with great pride that Her Majesty should think of us in this little hamlet of the veldt. It helps us to eat our black bread, and sweetens sickening horseflesh, when we know that the Queen herself is watching and waiting for news from Mafeking."

Is our devotion to our King so much less, or shall not we too endure real privation joyfully and gladly for his sake?

HE NEEDS OUR WEALTH

for the carrying on of his great warfare. May we not hear Him saying to us, "Friend, lend Me three loaves, for a friend of mine is come to me, and I have nothing to set before him." Do we joyfully reply, "Here, Lord, use all I have. I rejoice to give them to Thee for thy friends." Or do we sometimes reply, as the so-called "friend" of old did, "Trouble me not. I am very comfortable, and do not wish to be disturbed. Besides, I must think first of the children and provide for them?" Or perhaps our reply is, "I gave some during the day; now the door is shut, and I wish to rest undisturbed?"

Sometimes, when the call has come to me literally at night, after a long day's work, and the Master has needed me to go with love and help some poor sufferer, I confess that my first thought has been, "How can I go, I am so tired?" But the thought, "For Jesus' sake," has made it easy, and after a few hours I have come back to bed, comforted and rested as only He can rest his children, so that I have felt quite ashamed of my momentary hesitation. He only asks us to lend, and He repays even now by wonderful peace and joy in self-denial for his sake, and by sweet consciousness of his love as He lets us share in his travail and in his joy. His promise and command are, "Lend, never despairing." (Luke vi. 35, R.V.)

Do you ask what does the Lord need for his work? Writing from India, I reply, He needs your help to provide for the sick and suffering and starving, to care for the orphans and destitute. He needs consecrated helpers to carry on his work, and to proclaim the good tidings of life and pardon. Money, as well as sympathy and prayer, is needed for the carrying on of his great battle. May we be worthy of the name of "his friends!" May his loving voice constrain us to give, and give abundantly, so that his work may go on without delay. "Friend, lend Me. . ." "Yea, Lord, I gladly give Thee. Of thine own have we given Thee."

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, October 7. Isaiah xxxv.

AN idyll of the coming time, when the long travail of Creation will be over, because the sons of God will be manifested. How Nature has suffered and groaned under the pressure of human sin! How deep the scars upon her surface! How unwilling to bear the thorns and thistles, to be swept by blizzards and hurricanes, to yield her neck to the yoke of the destroyer. She was made subject to vanity, not of her own will, but by reason of him who subjected it, i.e., the devil, or man through the devil's agency; but she cherishes a great hope in her heart, that she shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the children of God.

Weak hands, which tremble as they hold this paper; feeble knees, which can hardly sustain the weight of the body they have carried so long; hearts which are fearful and nervous, because of the responsibilities of life, are bidden to be strengthened and comforted, inasmuch as what they lack in human energy is more than compensated for by God's all-sufficiency. And when He comes, his salvation more than suffices. It seems, indeed, as though natural infirmity and failure were permitted to bring out qualities of God's saving health, which otherwise had not been recognized; so that, as Paul says, we have good reason to glory in our infirmities, to take pleasure in weaknesses, in injuries, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses for Christ's sake; for when we are weak, then we are strong.

The way of holiness lies through this world for us to tread. It may be found by fools, as judged by the world's intellectual standards, but not by the unclean. It is the way of absolute safety; "no lion shall be there." It it the way of song; "the redeemed shall come with singing." It is the way to perfect bliss.

MONDAY, October 8. Isaiah xxxvi.

At last the long-threatened blow fell, and Sennacherib's emissaries and armies began to threaten Jerusalem, which, in accordance with Hezekiah's policy, in pursuance of Isaiah's counsels, stood absolutely by herself. And there was no security in her own prowess, or resource against the mighty Assyrian.

The enemy still comes up against Mount Zion, threatening the Spouse of the Lamb with utter destruction, and vaunting his superiority. He does not bate his breath, or stifle his voice. Bold and blasphemous are his threatenings and slaughter. Perhaps our best policy is still, like Hezekiah, to answer not, but to trust in Him who is pledged to help his own, "when the morning appeareth." It was in this dark hour of threatening that the 46th Psalm was composed: "God is our refuge and our strength, a very present help in trouble; therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed, and the mountains carried into the heart of the seas." Amid the roar of the hurricane pious hearts detected the music of the river that makes glad the holy place of the tabernacles of the Most High.

"O God, of unchangeable power and eternal light, look favourably on thy whole Church, that wonderful and sacred mystery; and, by the tranquil operation of thy perpetual providence, carry out the work of man's salvation, and let the whole earth feel and see that things which were cast down are being raised up, and things which had grown old are being made new, and all things are returning to perfection through Him from whom they took their origin, even through our Lord Jesus Christ."

TUESDAY, October 9. Isaiah xxxvii.

Beneath the surface we can see the movement of the human soul, amid and beneath all the turbulent tides of human affairs. Before the shock of Rabshakeh, and his proud rude words, we shrink, in natural timidity. We fear every day because of the fury of the oppressor, as though he were ready to destroy. Then we betake ourselves to the Word of God, opposed as a rock to all the illusions and threatenings of this vain world, and in spite of the stormy petrels that come on shore we are not afraid to meet the full brunt of the storm.

Then again when letters come, full of bitter and shameless vituperation, let us lay them out before God, so that He may read them, line by line, and deal with our correspondents on our behalf. It is better thus, a hundred times, than to rush headlong into print, to answer with words full of vinegar. Throw the responsibility of your matters upon God. It is for Him to deal with those that curse and hate you, and He will presently send you an answer as satisfactory as that which Isaiah sent to the perturbed monarch (21-35).

The inspired muse seldom rose to a higher note of minstrelsy, than in the sublime ode, in which the virgin daughter of Zion, whose purity had hitherto been inviolate of any conqueror, laughed the proud Assyrian to scorn. Ah, those may laugh indeed, who are entrenched in the safe-guarding care of Jehovah! Dear troubled soul, cast thy burden on the Lord, and He shall sustain thee; He will never suffer the righteous to be moved. He will be your protection, who is your redemption, directing your mind by his gracious counsel, and watching over your path with guiding love, that by the track of faith you may come at last to be where He would have you be.

WEDNESDAY, October 10. Isaiah xxxviii.

The Psalm of Hezekiah is like the going down and return of the shadow on the sun-dial. Verses 10 to 16 tell the story of the decline of the shadow cast by the westering sun; verses 17-20 of its return.

For the Jew, however pious, life and immortality were not brought to light. There was as yet no clear and open vision of the destiny of the soul after death. Hezekiah could not say with Paul, "To depart and be with Christ is far better." There are some among us who think, in spite of many texts to the contrary, that the soul sleeps from the moment of death to that of resurrection; such must content themselves with the expressions of this chapter.

Note the pathetic imagery! Life removed as the slight shepherd's tent; the web cut off from the thrum; the loneliness of the crane, the migratory habit of the swallow, the mournful note of the dove, are emblems mete for an oppressed soul. But what a prayer is here for him, who cannot find words, "Undertake for me." We are reminded of the ancient prayer: "We beseech Thee, Almighty God, to receive with Fatherly tenderness thy people fleeing from thine anger to Thyself; that they who dread the scourge which comes from thy majesty may be enabled to rejoice in thy forgiveness; through Jesus Christ our Lord."

Presently, at midnight, the tide turns, and sets in towards the soul. It realizes that the discipline of sickness was necessary for the development of its best life. Instead of crying, "All these things are against me," it confesses that by these things men live, and that the great bitterness has been the condition of its peace (17, R.V). You can detect the returning throb of life, as "the living, the living" begins a psalm of praise, which sounds through all after days.

THURSDAY, October 11. Isaiah xxxix.

There is no harm in having beautiful things, when they are not used for luxury and display. Articles of furniture and personal use may better be beautiful than ugly, tasteful than coarse and clumsy. The physical creation around us is sufficient proof of this. Place the most loathsome animal under the microscope and you can hardly refrain from exclamations of admiration and delight. The meanest flower that blows is adorned in robes of surpassing delicacy and loveliness. God, who gave us the love and appreciation of the beautiful, is glorified when we educate and nourish his gift. It is a good thing for ourselves, and especially for our children, when our homes contain beautiful things, with engravings and pictures, with reminiscences of the lands we have visited, with objects that appeal to our taste. Christ did not refuse the sweet ointment.

We must, however, guard against extravagance and ostentation. To spend money, which might be more wisely administered, on ourselves or our homes, merely to satisfy the greed of acquisitiveness, to outvie our neighbours, or to display our wealth, is as grievous in God's eyes as this sin of Hezekiah, and it will have a similar punishment. God must teach us that the things of this present evil world are totally inadequate to satisfy the soul which He has created for Himself. Besides, the world passes away and the lust thereof, that is, the power of enjoyment, and only he that does the will of God abideth for ever. The beautiful is only harmless when it leads the soul to the inner meaning and truth of things.

FRIDAY, October 12. Isaiah xl.

The scene is changed. The people of God are now in Babylon; or, at least, the Prophet cast himself forward in anticipation into the future, when they would be there, and addresses himself to the task of comforting them. The cup of punishment has been drained to its dregs, the discipline has fulfilled its end, the hour of emancipation and exodus is at hand.

It may be that you have long been in bondage and depression. Be of good comfort; the end is near, and you shall go forth into liberty. Do you say it is impossible? Do you point to valleys that are too deep to be passed, and mountains too lofty to be climbed? Do you say that crooked places can never be straightened, and rough ones never levelled? Hush your doubting words! The Word of God shall stand for ever. The hatred and opposition of men are as grass before the scythe, as the flower before the sirocco. The one answer to every fear, to every foreboding and dread, is, "Behold your God."

What a combination there is between majesty and meekness, between greatness and gentleness in this marvellous chapter. His mighty arm rules, but He carries the lambs in it; his recompense is before Him, but He gently leads those that give suck; He weighs mountains in scales, but He gives power to the faint; He brings princes to nought, but He increaseth strength to them that have no might; He counts and calls the stars, but He renews the strength of fainting ones that wait for Him. Therefore, in early life they mount up as eagles, in middle life they run, in old age they walk by his grace which is always sufficient for them.

SATURDAY, October 13. Isaiah xli.

In the first instance this prediction refers to Cyrus, whom God raised up to break the power of Babylon, that the yoke might be snapt from off the neck of the chosen people. But in a deeper sense, which indeed can alone fulfil the music and meaning of these words, our thoughts are turned to that greater Deliverer, who comes to save us from a worse bondage than ever weighed on Israel.

Yes, child of God, though thy circumstances have gone hard with thee, God has not cast thee away. He is with thee still. He will hold thy right hand: He will help thee. Though thou hast denied Him with oaths and curses, and brought shame and sorrow on thyself, yet He will make thee to become a new sharp threshing instrument, having teeth; "thou shalt thresh the mountains." Oh ponder that word, I will make. What He did at Pentecost for the Apostles, He can do for thee. He can give thy words a new biting power, so that those who hear shall be cut to the heart, and constrained to cry, "Men and brethren, what shall we do?"

The chapter closes with a challenge to the false gods of the heathen. They could not anticipate nor foretell the future. They were impotent to do good or evil. They were vanity and lies. An idol is an appearance, something one can see. Ah, this is our temptation still, to trust in the seen, which is illusion, deception, a shadow that passes away; and to miss the unseen and eternal God, who alone is the enduring portion of the soul. "Give strength, O Lord, to those who seek Thee, and continually pour into their souls the holy desire of seeking Thee, that they who long to see thy face may not crave the world's pernicious pleasure."

CONFERENCE IN NEW YORK.

[From our own Correspondent.]

A VERY important Conference was held on Friday, September 21, at the Presbyterian Building, 156, Fifth Avenue. It was attended by thirty representatives of the Protestant Mission Boards in the United States and Canada, conducting operations in China. Rev. Dr. Henry N. Cobb, of the Reformed Church, occupied the chair, and Rev. Dr. Arthur J. Brown, of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, acted as secretary. The proceedings were conducted behind closed doors, but at the close of the afternoon session Dr. Brown gave a statement to the representatives of the Press.

On the previous day the Presbyterian Board held a Conference with eight missionaries from different parts of China, gentlemen considered among the "best and strongest" in the Empire.

Dr. Brown's report of the days work was as follows: "It was unanimously voted that while the outbreak in China, of course, seriously interferes at present with mission work, yet there is no ground for discouragement; but there is reason for believing that mission work can be resumed, and that it should be resumed at as early a date as may be wise.

"A committee, consisting of Dr. R. P. Mackay, of Toronto, and Drs. Judson Smith and P. F. Barbour, of Boston, was appointed to prepare an address to the Churches of America on the present situation in China, and summoning the Churches to beginning October 28, with appropriate memorial services for martyred missionaries and Chinese Christians, and suitable offerings for the re-establishment and pushing forward of the work.

"It was reported that only two of the Boards represented in Conference had lost missionaries by death. The American Board of Foreign Missions had lost six men, seven women, and five children; and the Presbyterian Board had lost three men, two women, and three children—in all eighteen missionaries and eight children.

"It was unanimously voted that no general recall of missionaries in China is either necessary or expedient; but that, in anticipation of an early resumption of missionary work, and for the guidance and comfort of Chinese Christians, and for the care and restoration of property, missionaries should await developments in Japan, Korea, and such Chinese ports as may be safe, except where ill-health or special isolation form exceptions, each Board determining such exceptions for itself.

"Deep sympathy was expressed for the Chinese Christians. The Conference was deeply moved by the reports of their fidelity under the

to which they have been exposed; and the Conference heartily endorsed the appeal of United States Minister Conger, and representative missionaries, for relief contributions; the opinion being expressed that these Chinese Christians were deserving of sympathy similar to that given to the sufferers by famine in India.

"With the exception of one member who did not vote, it was unanimously agreed to be the judgment of the Conference that when the Governments (British and United States) ask for information as to the objects to be included in the claims for indemnity, there should be named only the actual loss of property and the special expenses incurred in consequence of these troubles.

"By a vote of twelve to seven—one not voting—it was held that in exceptional cases indemnity might also include (damages for) loss of life which has destroyed the means of support for wife and children.

"It was unanimously voted that claims for indemnity should be presented only through the Boards, and not directly through individuals.

"Concerning a specific request (from China) that the Conference should protest to the (British and American) Governments against the withdrawal of the troops from Peking and the reinstatement of the Empress-Dowager, it was unanimously voted that no action be taken; it being held that expressions to the Governments concerned, on such a subject, were not within the functions of a missionary Conference.

"It was further voted that a committee consisting of Dr. Ellinwood (Presbyterian Board), of New York, and Dr. Sutherland (Presbyterian), of Toronto, be appointed to formulate a statement on the relation of the missionary to the civil power, and report to the joint conference of Mission Boards in the United States and Canada, to be held in this city next January.

"It was the judgment of the Conference that the resumption of the mission work in those parts of China where it has been interrupted would afford a favourable opportunity for putting into practice some of the

which have been approved by the general consensus of opinion among missionaries and boards; especially with regard to the overlapping of fields, printing and publishing, higher education and hospital work; the conference commended this subject to the favourable consideration and action of the different boards and their missionaries."

Dr. Brown, after dictating the foregoing, expressed his desire that it should be made perfectly clear that the Conference was purely informal in character, and that it had no final authority to take action on the subjects discussed, but that its conclusions were to be reported to the various boards concerned. Under all the circumstances of the case, however, the conclusions of the Conference are likely to have great weight with the boards concerned, unless some very great and unexpected changes take place in the general situation in China.

MEETING IN LONDON.

As the first Protestant organization to enter China, and having successfully developed extensive missions in southern, central, western, and northern China, it was only natural that the London Missionary Society should recognize the present stage of the upheaval of that land as an opportune moment for setting forth the exact condition of things. With this object in view, the meeting held in the City Temple on Monday evening was arranged.

Mr. Arnold Pye-Smith presided, and the proceedings were marked by a deep sense of gratitude to God for the protection vouchsafed to the workers. There was sorrow, however, for while no deaths of missionaries connected with the Society have been reported, the roll of native converts who have succumbed to the ravages of the Boxers, for the sake of their profession, must be numbered in hundreds.

Rev. Geo. Cousins (secretary) announced that the first message from Pekin had been received that day from their staff, and it was a matter of devout thankfulness to God for the noble stand made by and for the fact that none of the missionaries had perished. Mr. S. Lavington Hart, M.A., speaking of the progress of Christian education respecting missions, repudiated the idea of missionaries being responsible for the Chinese revolt. He wished it were possible for 1,000 of their critics to be present, and hear from the lips of native converts, who were daily sacrificing all they possessed rather than give up their religion, what the labours of the missionaries meant to them. Mrs. Bryson, in touching words, spoke of what women were doing for their sisters in North China, and described painful and heartrending scenes of the persecution to which the converts were subjected.

Dr. G. P. Smith described the terrible experiences of the missionaries and Chinese Christians during the bombardment of Tientsin, and the joy which attended its ultimate relief. In answering the question why he was returning to Peking, Rev. Geo. Owen touched many hearts by his tender references to the bonds between China and himself. At the age of fifteen he had received the call to go, and for thirty-five years that country had exercised over him a powerful fascination, acting as a spell, drawing him to her, like a mysterious magnet. The young Church in China had had to pass through a terrible baptism of blood, and the banks of the rivers were covered with blood; the native Christians had been hacked to pieces, and cast into the streams. "I return to China because I cannot help it, and because I take that which she needs most—the Gospel of Christ. China needs the builder, the merchant, the schoolmaster, the doctor, but above all she needs the missionary to go with the Gospel of Christ—the one and all-sufficient remedy for her ills."

In a few closing words, Rev. R. Wardlaw Thompson appealed on behalf of the numbers of refugees, and announced that the collection taken during the meeting amounted to £83.

THE CHINA INLAND MISSION.

A telegram received on September 24, says: "Shensi telegram received [at] Seh-chev, Taning, Joh-iang, eleven missionaries killed—probably Mr. and Mrs. Peat, two chlldren; Miss F. E. Nathan, Miss Dobson, Mr. Woodroffe, Mr. Barratt, Miss Heaysman, Miss Huru, Miss M. R. Nathan."

A Missionary's Difficulties.

IT is not often that we hear of a missionary encountering such obstacles as have of late beset the path of Mr. Karl Cederquist, of the Swedish Evangelical National Society, labouring in British East Africa. Native chiefs and high civil authorities have concurred in the judgment that Mr. Cederquist is a devoted and trustworthy worker, and brother-missionaries agree in holding him in high esteem. Yet it is painful to learn that many and great hindrances have been put in the missionary's way. We give the points of a long letter of complaint sent by Mr. Cederquist to Sir Arthur H. Hardinge, H.M.'s Commissioner and Consul-General in the British East Africa Protectorate:—

Sir Arthur had expressed himself favourably with reference to a proposal for a pioneer trip into the interior; but when Mr. Jenner, the sub-commissioner, was waited upon, he made difficulties, while Dr. Radford, another district officer, said he should not allow the journey! The main purpose of the trip was regarding the roads, also to buy camels, and, if possible, secure the services of a Galla lad. At length, when all preparations had been made, and Mr. Jenner's several stipulations adopted, Mr. Cederquist and a fellow-missionary started with a party of Somali and Galla, and one Arab. Mr. Jenner disavowed responsibility; but the missionaries were content.

That was at the beginning of July. On the second day of the journey, Mr. Jenner sent a disquieting letter, calling the missionary's attention to certain regulations as to entering Kenia, Ukamba, and other districts. Though this caused much anxiety, the party went on its way from village to village with perfect safety, being received in a friendly manner by the natives. At El-Madarr, however, four askaris (armed men) overtook the party, saying they had been instructed to take them back. This was to the surprise of the chief Abdiliban, who said he had heard of in giving medicine to the Somali, and dressing their wounds—though they were not of the same religion. When it was explained that this kindness was because of God's love, the chief took the missionary's hand, and said: "We are brothers; my land is open before you. Go through my land—to Wajehr, to Boran, where you like."

The askaris proceeded to frighten the men, and talked the chief round; and the friendly Sultan of Afmadu said that Mr. Jenner had written asking him to turn out the missionaries! Returned to Kismayu, on July 13, Mr. Cederquist was scolded by the district officer, and his men were thrown into prison. Mr.

Cederquist demanded that the men should be liberated, as if anyone was in the wrong in undertaking the journey, it was himself, who commanded the expedition. Mr. Jenner then threatened to punish the men, and said that later on the missionaries also should be imprisoned. Immediately afterwards one of Mr. Cederquist's servants was arrested; and all appeal to Mr. Jenner was forbidden by the askaris, who declared that from a certain day, the missionary should be denied the liberty of buying food on the market!

After these experiences, Mr. Cederquist asks Sir Arthur Hardinge for protection against his subordinate official. He says: "Mr. Jenner has told me that he is going to take revenge for my visit to you in 1898; and I am sure that he has DECIDED TO STAMP OUT OUR MISSION.

I therefore humbly beg you to send me a letter, protecting us and giving us right to work; also to set our men free, and to allow them to go about peaceably in their own land, on a journey which you, and (as far as I understood) Mr. Jenner agreed to permit."

For thirty years the Swedish Evangelical Society has been endeavouring to reach the Galla tribe in Abyssinia and the region now included in the British East Africa Protectorate. It is sad that one of their missionaries should have had to send to his society a report upon recent endeavours, which reflects most seriously upon British rule, and is only consistent with an utter disregard of Britain's great duty towards the natives of Africa. Mr. Cederquist implies that it is Mr. Jenner's habit to treat missionaries with discourtesy—indeed he has declared that "he will have no missionaries in Kismayu."

Sir Arthur Hardinge has ever treated the missionaries with kindness and consideration, but his subordinate officer is said to have insulted and injured them in a manner which assuredly calls for explanation. It is hoped that the matter will receive attention in the Parliament now in course of election.

The Indian Famine.

MISSIONARIES AND THE FAMINE.

IN the course of a letter to missionaries and others who are labouring in the famine districts, the Bishop of Calcutta says: "Half the money which I have been permitted to collect for distribution, through the missionaries in the famine-stricken regions, has come to me from persons who are not members of the Church of England. May the 'love of the brethren' which has been thus quickened by mutual charity grow deeper and holier year by year!

"The suffering in India has, I think, drawn non-Christians nearer to Christ. While we have watched with admiring sympathy the patient endurance of the people in their long and painful affliction, they, too, have learned something that they knew not before, of the of our faith as inspiring Christian men and women in the love of Christ to make great sacrifices, and, if need be, to lay down their lives for those who, in race and religion, and in moral ideas and social custom, are widely separated from themselves. When the famine is passed the tie of sympathy will remain."

REV. DENNIS OSBORNE'S MOVEMENTS.

Rev. Dennis Osborne is vigorously pursuing his important mission to this country. His appeals on behalf of the suffering, and the information he conveys on the general subject of Indian famines, have resulted in arousing a large measure of public interest and sympathy. Mr. Osborne is to speak at Hare Court Chapel, Canonbury, on Sunday morning next (October 7), and in the evening at Mildmay Conference Hall. He is to be at the missionary meeting of the Star Hall Convention, Ancoats, Manchester, on October 13, and visits Edinburgh October 21. He will be glad of other opportunities to voice the urgent need of the famine and disease-stricken people of India.

NOTES FROM WORKERS.

Dr. Wm. Huntley writes from Deoli Mission, Rajputana:—"Poor stricken women, with husbands dead and homes gone, turn piteously to us. They have not strength to work, and their rags are not enough to cover them. With some of the help sent by your readers, we have been able to purchase some clothing for them. A coarse petticoat is the most needed garment; it costs about a shilling. The poor motherless and fatherless bairns come in to us every day with their wan faces, and already our Mission has of them to care for, while the weak, destitute women have to be fed back to life. In one village, some five miles away, almost the whole of the villagers are mere living skeletons, and it is to keep alive those who have survived these long months that our efforts must be directed. For many months to come, the missionary who has to go among the poor in their villages will find the naked and the destitute, so I trust that the news of the rains will not raise the belief that the time for giving help has passed away."

A statement by Dr. A. H. Browne (C.M.S. Amritsar Medical Mission), issued by the Punjab Famine Relief Committee, refers to the condition of the Bhils in Gujarat. Dr. Browne says: "Skulls, skeletons, recently-dead bodies (generally partly eaten by dogs, jackals, &c.), and a little older corpses have been more or less met with in all the journeys I have taken. The only comments corpses found on the road elicit is how to arrange to get them disposed of. The day Rev. E. Herbert arrived at Baulia he had thirty-five bodies picked up and burnt.

Mr. John Lampard, who is in the district of South Rampur, Gujarat, writes:—

"Communication with a number of missionaries and others shows a practical consensus of opinion that out of a former population of some two millions of Bheels, not more than one-fourth, at the most, will survive the present year. So far from the rains having resulted in a diminution of the present distress, the number of applicants for relief, here at least, is increasing daily, while a large proportion of such applicants are in an

and disease. Our relief operations consist of (1) a children's refuge where nearly 400 boys and girls, mostly quite small and without parents or guardians, are fed and clothed and, where possible, the rudiments of education are imparted. (2) A poor house, the inmates of which are mostly adults, numbering over 350; anything more absolutely wretched than the condition in which most of these poor creatures come to us it is impossible to imagine; emaciated, almost naked, covered with filth and sores, and often suffering from some form or other of bowel disease, they are a heart-breaking spectacle. (3) Food grain, supplied to villagers in their own homes; these number over 600. (4) Supplying to a selected number of ruined cultivators bullocks and seed grain for the approaching winter crop cultivation—an important measure if the remnant of Bheels is to be saved."

At the noon prayer-meeting, at Aldersgate Street Y.M.C.A., on Monday last, it was resolved, with regard to the fearful details given on the previous Monday by Rev. Dennis Osborne—"That the chairman be requested to insert a paragraph in the forthcoming number of The Christian, calling upon all electors to endeavour to influence any candidates for the new Parliament by whom they may be solicited, and, if possible, obtain their promise of support to any practical measures that may be introduced into Parliament for the prevention, if possible, in future years of so awful a calamity as the famine of 1900."

It was objected that by the time The Christian came into circulation the elections would be nearly over. It was, however, replied that the electors could urge upon their representatives, after election, the extreme importance of the above recommendation.

Soldiers in South Africa.

MR. JAMES TAYLOR, of the South Africa General Mission, and Mr. Fleming of the Soldiers' Christian Association, have been the means of very much blessing amongst the men of the 1st Cavalry Brigade stationed in Natal. The meetings have been of a most encouraging character, the numbers at the evening gatherings ranging from three to six hundred every night. During the last two months numbers in the 1st Royal Dragoons, 5th Dragoons, 13th Hussars, and A Battery, R.H.A., have come right out for God, many of them being men who had gone deeply into sin. It appears that the workers had determined to hold no after-meetings, arranging that if men were really anxious they should come to their tent for further conversation, the result being very satisfactory. One evening thirty came.

Lately the soldiers in this brigade have suffered greatly in health, especially the 13th Hussars, large numbers having been laid aside with fever and other complaints, and not a few have passed into eternity. The work amongst the sick has often been from early morning until late at night. Through the kindness of friends in Durban, and others, the workers have been enabled to provide field hospitals with many comforts, having distributed some 900 sleeping suits, thousands of pairs of socks, caps, arrowroot, cornflour, and some 2,000 clean white scented handkerchiefs. Large quantities of fruit have been distributed amongst the men, also hot coffee and biscuits and buns.

One day they had to march from "Camp Drift" to Sundays River, a distance of some twenty-three miles. Here they found a large number of the troops encamped, the S.A.L.H., Leicester Regiment, Devons, Gordons, Rifle Brigade, King's Royal Rifles, and Mounted Infantry. It was too late for a meeting when they arrived, and the men were all very tired; so Mr. Taylor took the big acetylene gas lamp of 300 candle power, which had been given him as a present, and gave the men a light, much to the satisfaction of the officers, as much had to be done, and it was very dark. After the men had fastened their horses, they came round to our waggon, and tea and biscuits were given away. At Dannhauser they found the 2nd Battalion Rifles. One man came over to Mr. Taylor, but was not recognised at once. "I know you, and will never forget you," he said.

"I WAS WOUNDED

at Lombards Kop, and you picked me up, and helped me." Mr. Taylor then at once remembered him. This was only one of many other similar cases.

God continues to bless the work of the S.A.G.M. on the Western side in a very marked way. Lieut.-General Sir F. W. Forrestier-Walker, being deeply interested in the spiritual welfare of his men, has just formally opened our new Soldiers' Home in Cape Town. The opening ceremony was attended by several officers, a large number of non.-coms. and men of the forces in Cape Town; there were also a large number of civilians interested in the work of the Mission. Dealing generally with the subject of soldiers' homes and institutes, which were absolutely necessary, Sir Forrestier-Walker remarked that a great feature of the Home was that all soldiers were welcome, and that it was run on strictly undenominational lines.

Miss Sinclair briefly explained the objects of the Home, and Mr. Frank Huskisson gave a résumé of the general work of the Mission amongst the troops, mentioning that it was proposed to establish permanent homes in such towns as Johannesburg, Pretoria, and Kimberley. Col. Seton Churchill referred to the beneficial effects that such homes exercised on those for whom they were provided.

Rev R. F. Y. Pierce, D.D.,

CARTOON PREACHER.

A PREACHER and teacher who has made a position peculiarly his own in America is Rev. Robert F. Y. Pierce, D.D., minister of Penn Avenue Baptist Church, Scranton, Pennsylvania. He is a man with a mission, and diligent in the exercise of his special gift. He is renowned far and wide as a blackboard illustrator, and many Sunday school teachers and other workers have been glad to follow his very striking method of instructing the young and ignorant in the things of God.

Dr. Pierce is a native of Salem, New Jersey, and was trained for the teacher's profession. In this line of service he was very successful. He early exhibited energy and tact, and had been principal of two academies before he was twenty-one. At his majority he was chosen principal instructor in the Pennsylvania Institution for the Blind at Philadelphia.

He gave much attention to convention work among secular teachers, and organized the American Normal Institute—a home school for the education of teachers—which was afterwards embodied in Chautauqua work. For several years during his work as a teacher he pursued the study of medicine; but while engaged in these studies and pursuits his heart was much drawn to the Gospel ministry. Yielding to the imperial call, he gave up all else in 1884. His first pastoral work was the care of the great Mission in Philadelphia, organized by the Christian philanthropist, Mr. John B. Stetson.

He passed on to pastorates at Mount Holly (New Jersey) and Rockford (Illinois), meeting with much encouragement. After two years in the ministry as an evangelist, in connection with the Grace Baptist Temple of Philadelphia and the great rescue work of that city, he accepted the call of the Penn Avenue Baptist Church of Scranton, Pa., where his ministry is greatly blessed.

For several years Dr. Pierce has been deeply interested in all kinds of Sunday school work, and in developing the religious life of the young people. He was for some time national secretary of the Baptist Young People's Union of America; and he designed the badge now worn by thousands of Young Baptists in the United States and Canada. His broad Christian spirit makes him a favourite in young people's gatherings of all denominations. At the great Christian Endeavour Convention in San Francisco, thousands attended his daily lectures. In July last he was with us in London, attending the World's Christian Endeavour Convention at the Alexandra Palace.

The three illustrations on this page show how Dr. Pierce uses the blackboard to teach spiritual truth. The globe, with the name of Jesus in the centre, was used to illustrate a Christmas lesson, showing how light and peace and good-will have come from Him whose advent the angels proclaimed to the shepherds. The globe with the projecting hand served to impress the duty of foreign missions. Christ's command to preach is on the one side, and the hand between the words of the Macedonian cry implies the readiness of the world to receive the Word. The third illustration conveys the idea of the cleansing of the heart by removing its dark, sin-stained, sin-hardened covering, under which is the heart, soft and white, ready for the entrance of the Holy Spirit. Such illustrations as these make an appeal to the eye, and live in the child's memory after the spoken words are forgotten.

A correspondent writes to us:—"I met Dr. Pierce in connection with the Sunday Breakfast Association, one of the greatest philanthropic efforts in Philadelphia. One thousand men of the lowest and most hopeless class are provided with a free breakfast, following which is an almost unique gospel service. As you doubtless know, Dr. Pierce was practically the originator of the higher art pictures now used to illustrate Sunday school lessons. He is, I believe, the only preacher of any eminence who illustrates his addresses by means of crayons. Some of his illustrations are truly marvellous, and are executed with all the skill of a true artist. As the lesson he seeks to teach grows verbally, so also does the picture illustration grow upon the blackboard or card."

Dr. Pierce devotes the cartoonist's genius to Christian teaching. His pictures tell a story which makes its way to the mind. He faces large audiences of the common people; but he does not regard that as exhausting his mission. He would have others follow his method; so he has given courses of lectures, explanatory of preaching by illustration—among other places at the University of Chicago, the Baptist Missionary Training School, and the Moody Bible Institute. On all hands he was privileged to see students charmed by the novelty of his work, and desirous of following his lead in a new and hopeful line of ministry. We trust that a future of growing usefulness is before this esteemed worker, and that those who imitate him may enter into more abundant labours for the glory of God.

A Memorial of Dr. Spurgeon.

A HOME of Rest for ministers and missionaries, beautifully situated at Kemp Town, Brighton, was formally opened last week by the President of the Baptist Union, as a memorial of the late James Archer Spurgeon. The Home represents an enterprise which the co-pastor of the Metropolitan Tabernacle had in his heart to carry out during life. With a philanthropic zeal and womanly devotion to her husband's memory, which command our admiration, Mrs. J. A. Spurgeon has given and collected the large sum necessary for the purchase of the commodious mansion, which is henceforth to serve a most beneficent purpose. The house is substantially built and well-appointed, and has accommodation for thirty visitors. The dining-room, the drawing-room, and the reading-room are fine apartments, and from all the front windows a most extensive sea-view is obtained.

The large reading-room was crowded on the occasion of the opening ceremony, the chair being occupied by the President of the Union, Rev. William Cuff. After referring to the fact that his late friend had visited him in sickness, and had preached at his recognition at Bury St. Edmunds in 1867, Mr. Cuff added that C. H. Spurgeon had declared that his brother James was the best friend that God had ever given him. He had rendered great service at the Metropolitan Tabernacle which ought not to be forgotten. He was specially pleased that Mrs. J. A. Spurgeon had raised that Home in memory of her husband—a man who was so good and true.

After Mr. Shakespeare had mentioned that although the enterprise had throughout been the work of Mrs. Spurgeon, and that he had last week received from her a cheque for £400 on account of furnishing, that lady handed the deed of the property to Mr. Cuff, thus formally presenting the Home to the Baptist Union. The president returned thanks on behalf of the denomination for "the splendid gift. We are thankful to God and to you," he added, turning to the founder. "We are delighted with it altogether." The Mayor of Hove—Mr. J. Colman, J.P.—also gave a word of welcome, and in the name of himself and of the Mayor of Brighton, wished the enterprise God-speed.

Dr. A. T. Pierson characterized the Home as an expression of Christian beneficence, and a memorial of one who was great and good. His late friend had filled a very difficult position at the Tabernacle with tact and delicacy. He would have looked on that Home with joy; it was a noble tribute of a wife to her husband's memory.

A Cricklewood Mission.—In view of the encouraging results of the open-air evangelistic services at Claremont Road, Cricklewood, which have been held during the summer for the convenience of the employees on the Midland Railway living in the vicinity, the directors of the company were approached with the object of obtaining a site for the erection of a mission hall. After twice refusing, the directors have consented to grant a site for this purpose, and as it is desirous that no time be lost between the cessation of the open-air work and the opening of the hall, strenuous efforts are being made to raise sufficient funds to meet the outlay. In addition to the £40 already subscribed, £30 is required before the erection of the building is commenced. The superintendent is Mr. Frederick L. Grosvenor, 22, Lichfield Road, Cricklewood, N.W.

Principal W. Edwards, B.A., D.D.

THE SOUTH WALES BAPTIST COLLEGE, CARDIFF.

FEW men are better known, or more universally esteemed in South Wales, than Principal Edwards. He was born in the hamlet of Login, Carmarthenshire, on March 16, 1848, and is the youngest son of John Edwards, an eminently pious, gifted, and devoted man, "mighty in the Scriptures." Though but a quiet unobtrusive farmer, with no early training, yet John Edwards so mastered the English language as to be able to translate off-hand into pure Welsh almost any English book.

Professor Edwards' mother was a strong-minded, noble woman, possessing remarkable conversational powers, and was very gifted in prayer. The combined talents, that slumbered in the parents, have fully unfolded themselves in the subject of our sketch and his talented brother, Rev. D. Oliver Edwards, Trefgarne, Pembrokeshire, whose prolific pen has for a long time done service for the readers of The Star of Wales.

Principal Edwards began preaching when fourteen years of age, entered Pontypool College in 1865, and was the first student who matriculated from the Welsh Baptist Colleges. This he accomplished in 1869, coming out in the First Division. He gained his first B.A. in 1870, and the final (First Division) in 1872. He had the privilege of spending a short time at Regent's Park College, under the tuition of Dr. Angus and Dr. Davies.

In 1872, he was appointed classical tutor at Haverfordwest College, and in 1880 was elected president of the Pontypool College, situate on the picturesque hill of Penygarn, "beautiful for situation." The college was afterwards removed to Cardiff, and is now known as the South Wales Baptist College, Cardiff.

Shortly after his appointment, Principal Edwards organized a scheme to widen the constituency, and to put the college on a firmer and better financial basis, and later a Jubilee Fund was started, which is to be permanently invested, and now reaches to several thousand pounds.

Principal Edwards is much loved by the students, for in him they find not only an efficient tutor, but a sympathetic brother, loving friend, and wise counsellor, ever ready to enter into their trials and inspire them to overcome difficulties.

Among his old students may be mentioned his able colleague, Professor Davies, M.A., Principal Morris, M.A. (North Wales Baptist College, Bangor), Rev. John Thomas, M.A. (Liverpool), and Rev. G. Hay Morgan, B.Sc. (London). Dr. Edwards is an indefatigable worker, and though his tutorial and other duties connected with the College might tax the powers of any man, yet he finds time to take an active part in temperance work, to plead the cause of small churches, assist in evangelistic movements, and every effort put forth in the Principality for the social, moral, educational, and spiritual elevation of the masses. He is a fluent and interesting speaker, in the pulpit, and on the platform, both in English and Welsh—not a dry commentator, but an earnest, powerful, living, Gospel preacher. This makes him a favourite, and the people hear him gladly.

He has the pen of a ready writer, and has published two volumes of a new translation of the New Testament, with critical and explanatory notes. When completed, the work will be unique, as nothing of the kind was ever attempted before in the Welsh language. His handbook on "Christian Baptism," in English and Welsh, has had a large circulation; so also have his "Ritualism," "The Answer of the Church to the Bitter Cry of the Poor," "Home Missions," "Life of Christmas Evans," and "Notes for Sunday Schools." These works are true to principles which are firmly held by Welsh people; and it is gratifying to know that they have been so widely read.

Dr. Edwards is the editor of The Sower, a Welsh monthly for the use of Sunday schools, also is editor of The Baptist Record. His sterling worth and self-denying labours were recently acknowledged by a valuable testimonial, subscribed by all sections of the Christian Church in Cardiff. Mrs. Edwards was also the recipient of a mark of esteem at the same time. May his useful life long be spared to serve the Church of Christ in the "Land of my Fathers." T. M. W.

The Anti-Infidel Tract Enterprise.

MR. W. R. BRADLAUGH, of the Anti-Infidel Tract Enterprise, writes:—"Scarcely a day passes but what we receive numerous appeals from Christian workers for free grants of our Anti-Infidel Tracts. This season alone we have made nearly 300 of these free grants, but are now unable to continue these distributions, as our stock of tracts is exhausted, and we are absolutely without the means to reprint.

"Should anyone doubt that atheism is sufficiently widespread to create alarm, a visit to our parks, or other places where the public assemble, will undeceive them. Moreover, atheistic and impure literature is being disseminated in a way which behoves parents and those responsible for the welfare of the young to be watchful as to what comes into their houses, as it is easy to receive 'Poison through the Post.'

"To disseminate this class of literature the atheistic party is raising the sum of £5,000, of which amount no less than £3,000 has already been subscribed. The Christian's Armoury is the only magazine that is published directly to counteract the baneful influence of six infidel papers. Freethinkers readily provide funds for the purpose of attacking Christianity, but what are Christians doing to stem this flood of error? Surely it is the height of folly to cry out about the prevalence of infidelity, and the spread of atheistic literature, unless efforts are made to supply the antidote." Mr. Bradlaugh's address is 70, King's Cross Road, W.C.

Mr. Sankey's Movements.

THE only difficulty that arises in connection with Mr. Ira D. Sankey's visit is that of obtaining buildings sufficiently large to who throng to hear. The recent remarkable gathering at the Great Assembly Hall, Mile End, supplies an illustration of this. An hour before the time fixed for commencing the service, an audience of over 5,000 persons filled Mr. Charrington's capacious hall, and thousands more were unable to obtain admission.

The same problem presents itself in the provinces, and requests for the services of the esteemed Gospel singer are pouring in from all parts of the country.

On Wednesday of last week Mr. Sankey visited New Court Chapel, Tollington Park. The large building was densely crowded. Long before the time announced for opening the doors the entrances were besieged by a crowd which increased in numbers as the time elapsed, until every approach to the chapel was thronged.

The pastor, Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, gave Mr. Sankey the heartiest of greetings to North London, and mentioned that everyone present had made written application for admission. Mr. Sankey, on rising to give his service of Sacred Song and Story, received

AN ENTHUSIASTIC WELCOME.

He again introduced some of his best-known solos into the service, including the ever-welcome and effective "Ninety and Nine," the refrains of which were taken up by sections of the congregation according to Mr. Sankey's direction.

Mr. Sankey followed his message of song with an earnest personal appeal, couched in solemn terms, which again disclosed his evangelistic sympathies and aims, and must have proved a source of spiritual stimulus to many. Mr. Sankey pleads the merits of Christ as the Saviour of men in words which tell upon the hearts and consciences of his hearers.

An overflow meeting held in the building was densely crowded; and with earnest attention and warm appreciation, the congregation listened, after several to Mr. Sankey's words and songs.

Under the auspices of the York Y.M.C.A., services were held in that city, in the Theatre Royal, on Sunday last. Mr. Sankey's associations with York Y.M.C.A., on the occasion of his first visit to this country, were recalled by many, and deep interest was manifested in the present meetings by Christian people of all denominations. The attendances were very large, especially in the evening, when many hundreds in vain sought admission to the capacious building. Mr. William Bentley presided, and was supported on the platform by Alderman Agar, Mr. Simpson (secretary of the Y.M.C.A.), and a host of friends. Mr. Sankey's reception was of a most enthusiastic character. In the course of his address, he referred to his last visit to York, and spoke in pathetic terms of his departed friend and co-worker. The solos were received with many expressions of satisfaction, especially the "Ninety and Nine."

Mr. Sankey's engagements are as follows: Thurs., Oct. 4, Middlesbrough (Temperance Hall); Sun., Oct. 7, afternoon and evening, Sunderland (Victoria Hall); Tues., Oct. 9, Newcastle-on-Tyne (Brunswick Chapel); Thurs., Oct. 11, South Shields; Sun., Oct. 14, North Berwick (two meetings); Tues., Oct. 16, Edinburgh; Thurs., Oct. 18, Dundee; Sun., Oct. 21, Greenock (Town Hall, at 9.30 a.m. and 7 p.m.).

Hospital Letters.—We have many applications for letters for hospitals, surgical aid, &c. We shall be glad to take charge of such as may be entrusted us by friends, who have not the same opportunities of placing them, at the service of Christian workers.

The Church Congress.

AFTER an interval of nineteen years, the Church Congress has again met at Newcastle-on-Tyne, and amid the strife and clamour of a General Election. But the turmoil of a political campaign is, happily, outside the primary purpose and actual work of the assembly. The subjects discussed covered a wide field, and included almost every topic connected with the Church—music, art, decoration, history, clerical training, discipline, and Biblical criticism. Much attention was given to the consideration of evangelistic effort among the populations of large cities, and the further development of the religious and civil life of the community. Another distinctive characteristic of the fortieth Congress was the earnestness and enthusiasm evoked, and the spirit of charity, brotherhood, and amicable co-operation which marked the proceedings.

The Congress opened on Tuesday with the usual municipal formalities. In the Cathedral, the Archbishop of York preached a sermon on the words of St. Peter: "Finally, be ye all of one mind." The discourse was of a doctrinal and devotional character, and touched upon controversies which have of late been so prominently before Church people.

The inaugural address of the President (the Bishop of Newcastle) was preceded by an interesting incident. About a dozen ministers, representing the Nonconformists of the city, were conducted to the platform for the purpose of presenting an address of welcome, which was listened to with deep attention, and loudly cheered. After further preliminaries, rose to deliver his thoughtful and comprehensive address. Having recalled the Newcastle Congress of 1881, and reviewed the history of the see, the Church's work, her educational policy, her relation to the war, the president referred to the fundamental questions which were to be considered. We are bound to discuss (the Bishop reminded the assembly) principles and politics, organizations and methods, ethics and life; but we are conscious all the time that the real foundation of our work lies above, and that the temple will only rise with the true architecture and equipment as we copy "the pattern in the Mount." The conditions of life are perpetually changing. This year has witnessed convulsions that have affected all the nations of the world. But they who have firm hold of the foundations of Christianity are content to believe that—

> The Lord sitteth above the waterfloods,
> The Lord remaineth King for ever.

THE HOME WORK OF THE CENTURY.

This was the first subject discussed by the Congress. The Bishop of Ripon in his paper confined himself to the second half of the closing century, and reviewed its decades of progress and enlightenment. The last ten years have been the decade of knitting together in closer bonds the families of the English-speaking race; it is the decade in which the sense of destiny and duty has been deepened, and when, in the stress of war, an empire has been born; it has been the decade in which the problems of the world have become more simple and yet more complex; in which more clearly than ever the factors which are working out the future destiny of the world may be marked and measured.

The Bishop then surveyed the growth of the Church at home and abroad, and having quoted statistics relative to the results of missionary enterprise, said that more important than all external tokens of growth is the unseen hold of Christianity upon mankind. Within the last thirty years an enlargement of the scope of Christian aim has taken place, and during the last generation the thoughts of men have turned towards Christian and social ethics in a way unknown before. To meet the new century with its fresh problems, its old-age questions, its perplexing difficulties, its overmastering responsibilities, and its splendid possibilities, there is no better motto for the Church than: "Christ be with me, Christ within me."

Canon Overton treated the subject generally, and dwelt upon activity as the note of the Church in the nineteenth century. He wished he could add internal unity as another note, but truth compelled him to own that the activity had been too much wasted in disputes among themselves.

At the evening meeting "the Church's Policy in Elementary Education" was considered. The subject was introduced by Mr. E. Flower, a member of the London School Board, who remarked that the Act of 1870 was intended by Mr. Forster as an attempt to supplement, and not supplant, the voluntary system. The Bishop of Coventry severely criticised the organization of primary and secondary education, and described a scheme adopted by Birmingham Churchmen.

The C.M.S. breakfast was the first gathering of Wednesday. Canon Tristram presided, and Rev. H. E. Fox and Mr. Eugene Stock spoke. The usual followed, at which Mr. Fox gave an inspiring address on "Peace." The company, at ten o'clock, adjourned to the Congress Hall for the discussion on "The Reformation in England; (1) What was it in its essence? (2) To what has it committed the Church of England."

Rev. W. H. Hutton believed that the Reformation had left us laws, rules, and a theology based upon Bible truth. It was meant not to destroy, but to restore the Church to primitive order and godly discipline. "A death unto sin and a new birth unto righteousness"—that was the Reformation; a purification, not an apostasy. Mr. F. S. Stevenson dealt with the question under its first heading, and gave an historical epitome of the events leading up to the Reformation during the reigns immediately preceding that of Queen Elizabeth.

Professor Handley Moule dispensed with the method of dealing with the entire field, but preferred to follow "one ancient path" across it. He dealt with the representative work of English Reformation literature, Bishop Jewell's "Apology," from which he deduced many practical and thoughtful suggestions. The English tendency to idolatry was strongly deprecated by Professor Lock, of Keble College, Oxford; and a paper read by Rev. Henry Gee, D.D., was heartily appreciated. Prebendary Webb-Peploe referred to the late Archbishop Benson as being a warm believer in the Reformation, and went on to state the things to which that movement had committed the Church. The speaker was heartily cheered, and his stirring and eloquent message received sympathetic and attentive hearing. On being announced, there was a scene which can hardly be regarded as creditable to the Congress. Mr. Kensit appeared oblivious of the uproar, and when the Chairman had insisted upon him being heard, the speaker went on to show that the Reformation committed the Church to Catholic and Apostolic truth, as defined by the Book of Common Prayer, especially in the Sixth Article, which he wished all Churchmen would earnestly consider. The Reformation swept away all functionaries coming between us and God, and committed to the Church the finished work of Christ. Mr. Kensit then quoted from the magazine of a parish (to which the Archbishop of York had promised £2,000 for a new church), announcements of "Sung Mass," "High Mass"—Masses which are described in the Articles as "blasphemous fables and dangerous deceits."

The afternoon session was devoted to the consideration of "Old Testament Criticism." Professor Ryle dealt with the subject from the standpoint of an advocate of the Higher Criticism. Professors Margoliouth and Bernard forcibly reasoned against accepting facts which were nothing more than ingenious guesses. Canon Watson acknowledged that some of Bishop Colenso's arithmetical Bible puzzles were impossible to solve. Critics are supposed to have weighed the Old Testament in the balance, and found it wanting. They had not even been able to get it into the scales! Rev. Prebendary Wace made a weighty attack upon the Higher Critics, whose teaching he declared gave a flat denial to the historical value of the Pentateuch. He would not discourage criticism. Where there are erroneous conclusions in criticism the way to defeat them is by better criticism.

In the evening among other gatherings was a meeting for men. It was addressed by the Bishop of Newcastle (who presided), the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of Derry, and the Bishop of Thetford. The addresses were earnest and eloquent discourses on the claims of Christianity upon the reason and heart of man, and its power to elevate him in his self-respect and ennoble his nature.

The Congress on Thursday had before it the question of "Church Autonomy." The afternoon sitting was devoted to a review of the Church's progress during the nineteenth century. The Bishop of Trinidad dealt with mission work in the Colonies. The Colonial Church to-day consists of ninety-four bishops, 4,000 priests, 500,000 communicants, and over 4,000,000 registered Church members. The paper by Right Rev. E. R. Johnson, read in his absence by Bishop Hornby, dealt with the progress and present needs of India.

Sir Charles A. Elliott spoke on missionary work as distinguished from official Church organization, and referred to the development of the agencies through which missionary societies worked. Mrs. Bishop recalled the inception of missionary effort in the Far East, and traced from that time to the present day the progress and history of missions in China, Japan and other countries. She believed that Korea presents far greater opportunities for Christian work at the present time than either India, China, or Japan.

On the last day of the Congress (Friday) the gatherings were largely attended, while the papers attained a high standard of excellence. The subject of the devotional meeting was "The Ascension of our Blessed Lord." Archdeacon Diggle, in a thoughtful address, maintained the Ascension was the development of the Incarnation, the completion of the Cross, the crown of the Resurrection. The materialism of the age is a pathetic disease, but there is one, and only one, sufficient and effectual remedy—a strong healthy faith in not in a Christ of the past, not in a human historical Christ, long since dead, but in a present Christ, a hearing, seeing, loving, pleading Christ. The same theme was the subject of discourses from Canons Bernard and Body, and Revs. F. S. Webster and E. A. Stuart.

Practical philanthropy was the afternoon topic. Rev. J. W. Horsley spoke of his eleven years' war against insanitary conditions in his two parishes of Woolwich and Walworth. Professor Steggall reviewed the history of legislation on the subject, and declared that the remedy lay in breaking up aggregations in large towns. Remedies were also suggested by Sir T. Wrightson and Councillor Thompson; while Canon Moore deduced from statistics that nearly forty per cent. of London's population was overcrowded. Rev. W. H. G. Holmes caused considerable sensation and horror by stating that he had just come from a house in his parish of Jarrow, where a young girl lay dead from consumption. In the same room four adults and five children were obliged to sleep. He did not report such a horribly dangerous and insanitary practice to the local authorities, because "every house in the parish would then be closed against him!"

Though not officially a part of the Congress, the United Christian Conference filled the Town Hall on Friday evening. The meeting was one of Churchmen and Dissenters for considering the subject of Home Reunion. Lord Grey presided, and urged that the first step to be taken is to create a desire and aspiration for reunion. Addresses were delivered by the Dean of Ripon; Rev. F. W. Macdonald, late President of the Wesleyan Conference; and Rev. E. A. Stuart. The Congress has been singularly free from disturbing elements in its deliberations, and both Anglicans and Dissenters will unite in prayer that it may prove a source of strength and unity to the Church of Christ.

Dublin Christian Convention.

THE twenty-seventh of these annual Conventions was held last week in the spacious buildings now the property of the Evangelical Alliance, and which have been lately renovated at a cost of £2,000.

The services were inaugurated as usual by a conversazione, after which addresses were were delivered by Rev. John Stewart, B.A. (Presbyterian), Rev. Phineas Hunt, M.A. (Episcopalian), and Rev. John O. Park, B.A. (Methodist).

Mr. Samuel M. Comas, J.P., who occupied the chair, referred in touching and grateful terms to the memory of the late Mr. Moody, to whose suggestion and help they were indebted both for the building in which the Conventions were held and to the conception of the gatherings themselves.

On Tuesday, Rev. Pastor Brown, of Dublin, spoke on the Journey to Emmaus, and referred to the sin and sorrow of the two disciples through not believing in the resurrection of their Lord, but their sorrow was sorrow for Him. As they talked about the Lord, He Himself joined their company and entered into conversation with them. Talking about Jesus always ends by talking with Jesus.

Rev. William Goudie, missionary to the Madras district, delivered two most impressive missionary addresses. In Madras, two classes of people are beginning to feel the touch of truth, the aristocracy and the outcast classes. Speaking of the former, he said that it is true that amongst the Brahmins they are making very few converts, and that is quite as much a trial of their faith as it is to those at home who see so few converts amongst Roman Catholics. Reasons for this aversion to Christianity amongst the upper classes in India he found in the fact that they are so woven together in caste institutions and superstition. Then their life is so different from ours, their views of good exclude the root idea of Christianity, viz., the personality of God.

In this country the unit of the life is the individual. By degrees the young man finds that even his father is not the keeper of his conscience. With them the unit is not the individual, but the family, and not even that, but a group of families, the caste, and he is bound hand and foot by the customs of the community. He has lost, in consequence, all the fibre of life through the loss of personal responsibility.

WHAT IS HOLINESS?

Rev. James Stalker, D.D., spoke on "What is Holiness?" It is (1) Sinlessness. Instead of loving sin, it is a trouble to the seeker after holiness; and the perfection of happiness to such is to get rid of it, whether the Christian believes that this is possible in this life or no. It is (2) Godliness, the positive aspect; (3) Christlikeness, the most fascinating and suggestive of all descriptions of holiness. The abstract holiness of God is too majestic and distant for us, but in Christ it is brought down to us. The imitation of Christ must rest upon the appropriation of Christ. (4) It is Unworldliness. Far back in the Bible we find its root in separation, and still a holy man is separate from the world. The character of an ordinary man of the world is most opposed to holiness. He sneers at the word "saint," and identifies it with "hypocrite." (5) It is Spiritual Power. The saint ought in a good sense to be a man of the world, but he must have spiritual power. We are not only to suffer the will of God, but also to do it. (6) It is Spiritual Beauty. This is the flower and the perfection of the whole.

Rev. Peter Thompson, of the London East End Mission, followed on the same lines, and referred to his own experience, and how that from his childhood he had been taught that he belonged to God, and that if he fell into sin it was getting away from God. The Scripture which affected his life most was the twelfth chapter of Romans. Mr. Thompson also gave a most interesting account of his work in East London.

Rev. Wm. Crosbie, LL.D., of Nottingham, addressed the meeting from Acts iv. 31-34, which he designated the account of the first recorded prayer of the Christian Church. Its characteristics were: (1) United, (2) believing, (3) earnest, (4) Scriptural (based upon the 2nd Psalm), (5) definite, (6) Christ-honouring prayer. Their supreme desire was that Christ might be glorified in the further extension of his kingdom. The answer was twofold—in the realm of the physical and of the spiritual, for both realms are God's. The immanence and the transcendence of God are both articles of our creed. Force is but the expression of his will. The shaking of the place was for the encouragement of those praying men, and it was a promise and a parable of mightier shakings.

THE SECRET OF POWER.

Rev. J. Monro Gibson, D.D., of London, delivered three beautiful addresses on "The Secret of Power for the Christian—in the Church—and with the World." The last of these, which was delivered to a crowded audience on Thursday evening, was on the subject of Peniel. The commonplace Jacob received his name of Israel at Peniel, and then his power began. The indirect influence of that power was seen immediately when Esau, who had come forth with 400 men to meet him as an enemy, fell on his neck and kissed him. There is hope for the Church, the Christian, and the world in Peniel blessings. It seemed absurd that we should exercise our minds in such a great and stupendous thing as the salvation of the world, yet were we not taught to pray, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth." One chief reason for this is that we do not see any feasible way by which it can be brought about. All power is His, but how is it to become available? We have some revelation of that in the old word "Israel." The secret is there.

Addresses were also delivered by Rev. J. W. R. Campbell, A.M., on the text, "Ye are not your own;" Rev. Canon O'Connor, and the Ven. Archdeacon Galbraith. A most telling application of Eccles. xii. 1 to 7, by Rev. Dr. Stalker, concluded the Convention.

On Friday afternoon Rev. Dr. Crosbie conducted a Conference on prayer for the Holy Spirit, in which he gave a striking account of the manifest and widely-spread blessing which the history of the Church of the last century and a-half has manifested as the result of the establishment of prayer unions. Rev. Dr. Monro Gibson, Rev. Dr. Newman Hall, Rev. Dr. McCheyne Edgar, Rev. J. C. Trotter, and others took part in the discussion which followed, and a resolution was unanimously adopted to request the Evangelical Alliance to inagurate a Union for prayer in view of our near approach to a new century.

Friendless and Fallen.

THE work of Prevention and Rescue carried on in our five Homes and "Open-all-Night" Refuge is maintained with manifest blessing.

Respectable friendless young women and girls have been saved from moral ruin; some have been placed in the Jubilee Training Home, while others have been started afresh in life in suitable situations, or have been restored to their friends. The desire to live a purer life has been fostered in many, and we are glad to believe that the Gospel message has not been delivered in vain. At the Open-All-Night Refuge (our "ever open door") homeless and friendless wanderers have been received, and to a large proportion of those who have been thus promptly succoured the Refuge has proved to be the stepping stone to permanent help.

Several hundreds have been assisted in various ways since the beginning of the year, when the executive of the Homes resolved, in reliance upon God, to admit all suitable cases, day and night, Sunday and week-day, irrespective of the state of the treasury, believing that He would send them help through his servants. This faith has not been disappointed, for, while there is an immediate pressing need for current expenses, and a small loan has had to be obtained to tide over the autumn months, the executive are confident that all their need will in due time be supplied.

An occasional paper, entitled "Notes by the Way," has been issued, and will be sent post free on application. It gives several instances of the good which has been accomplished by the Mission to friendless and fallen young women and girls.

Scripture Readers' Society for Ireland.

IN their endeavours to carry the Word of God to the homes and hearts of the people of Ireland, the agents of the Scripture Readers' Society have done much to reach those who seldom if ever hear the Gospel. The work divides itself into two parts—the city, and country districts. There are in and around Belfast nearly twenty readers working among a large population, since it is impossible for the clergy to administer to the needs and claims of all. Since the disestablishment of the Church, and owing to the lack of clergymen in the south and west, there are in some cases as many as four parishes united. In these districts the readers are placed, receiving their instructions from the clergy superintendents.

The Archbishop of Dublin recently wrote: "In crowded centres of populations in the north, and among the in parishes in other parts of the country, the Readers of the society are, I believe, quietly doing work for God, which is a great help to the parochial clergy, and which, without their aid, could hardly be done at all. There is room for the employment of many more Readers in Ireland if means to maintain them were forthcoming." The Bishop of Ossory and Ferns also commends the efforts of the Readers in his diocese, where the enormous distances to be travelled between parishes, and the absence, in many places, of schools, creates the necessity for much effort as rendered by the agents of the Society.

The present time is one of extreme anxiety, as many additional Readers are required, and there is now more need than ever of concentrated work among both Roman Catholics and Protestants. The secretary and joint treasurer is Captain J. Kearney White, 27, Lower Pembroke Street, Dublin.

Irish Notes.

REV. C. H. BLOUNT has resigned the incumbency of the parish of Nenagh in order that he might take the assistant chaplaincy of the Falkland Islands. Mr. Blount was ordained in 1893 for the curacy of Carlow, and his future headquarters will be Stanley, a town of 700 inhabitants.

A fruitful evangelistic mission has been held in Aughrim by Rev. Canon Harley. The power of the Gospel to attract when plainly and earnestly preached was evidenced by the fact that several people drove a distance of eleven Irish miles night after night while the mission lasted in order to be present at the services which, it is believed, have been made a blessing to many persons.

The annual Convention has been held in the Methodist Church, Drimoleague, co. Cork, under the presidency of Rev. Stewart Smith, of Bandon, and was largely attended. The history of this Convention is an interesting one. A few years ago, through the instrumentality of a gentleman now deceased, a remarkable religious awakening took place in the neighbourhood, which previously had been one of the darkest and the deadest that could be imagined. Whole families decided for Christ, and there was scarcely a house in which one or more persons was not converted. At that time there was no Methodist church in the village, but a site was soon afterwards obtained and a church erected. Here an encouraging congregation meets regularly for worship, and a Convention is held annually. At that which has just taken place, much blessing was received by those who attended.

In view of the approach of the twentieth century, the Secretary of the Methodist Sunday School Committee, Rev. T. E. Gibson, of Armagh, has issued an earnest appeal to all Sunday School workers to do what they they can to lead their scholars to decision for Christ. Many deplore the way in which young men wander away into sin, and the best method of counteracting this evil is to begin with the children and bring them to Jesus. This will solve every difficulty from which our country suffers.

The Bishop of Kilmore, Dr. Elliott, has delivered an interesting address at his Diocesan Synod on Christian Union. He does not think that Christian Union at the present time is possible or desirable, but he urges that all Christian communities should think charitably, speak kindly of, and act rightly towards those who differ from them in any Church government or religious beliefs, and cultivate the spirit which will enable them to say, "Grace be with all those that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity."

The Singing Gipsy Boy.

TWO years ago, during the hop-picking season, a little gipsy boy, seven years of age, Bobby C——, came into the mission tent; his mother was a widow. Bobby was an ignorant, dirty, ragged child, but with a remarkably musical voice. Night by night he came regularly and enjoyed the hot tea and lantern pictures, but it was the singing that most attracted and delighted him. He quickly learned to repeat and sing several hymns, "Jesus loves me," "When He cometh," but his favourite song was (351 S.S. and S.)

Fair is the morning land,
Bright is the shore,
Where all the saints of God
Dwell evermore.
Come to the shining land,
Come, come away;
Come with the angel band,
Beautiful as they.
Come, little children, come,
Hear the angels say,
Come to the shining land,
Come, come away.

Distinct and clear as a silver trumpet, the child's voice vibrated and thrilled above all other voices in the tent, and wretched women and men were entranced and affected as he sang—

Fair in the morning land,
Sweetly they sing:
Jesus its glory is,
Jesus our King.

On the day of the closing tea meeting, the City missionary went into the hop garden, and invited Bobby and his mother to the feast; but, said the missionary to the mother, "Bobby's trousers and shirt are so rent and torn, perhaps you will try and make him decent, as several young ladies are expected to be present." Savagely the gipsy woman replied, "He's good enough for anybody to see." Fearing that the child might not be permitted to attend, the missionary put up some cake and buns, and at the tea Bobby was nowhere to be seen.

After tea, the Children's Hymn was announced. Instantly Bobby's sweet voice took up the lead, and his soul went into the song. The effect was marvellous. There was not a dry eye in the tent.

The missionary went to the spot from whence the voice proceeded, and there was Bobby, wearing his sister's clothes!

Last year the mother came alone. She said that Bobby was in Salisbury Infirmary suffering from cancer in the mouth. This year my gipsy friends told me that Mrs. C. died last November, and that Bobby died in March.

There in the morning land,
All, all is fair.
This is the joy they feel,
Jesus is there.

Tabb's Dolly.

A LITTLE girl, nine or ten years old, sat on the kerb-stone, one summer day, in the city of Chicago. They called her Tabb. I suppose her real name was Tabitha. She was so busy with a poor little rag-baby that she seemed not to mind the heat or the glare.

One of the baby's arms had been torn off, and its head fell over on one side, and every time it was moved the sawdust fell out of a hole in its foot. As the child sat there, trying to make the poor baby whole again with a darning-needle and some string, a boy about twelve or thirteen years of age came along, and stopped to look at her.

The boy snatched the doll out of her hands, in spite of her efforts to prevent him.

The eyes of the poor girl filled with tears, and her chin quivered as she said,

"Is your mother dead?"

"Not as I knows on."

"But mine is, and she made that dolly for me when her hands trembled so much and her eyes were so full of tears that I had to cut the clothes for her. That's why the baby looks so bad,"

"I remember now 'bout seein' the crape on your door. I'm awful sorry I was rough. This 'ere linin' in my cap will make that baby a hull dress, and if you won't say nothin' to nobody about how I acted, I'll give it to ye."

Out came the lining with one pull. He laid it down by the doll, and then put two coat buttons down with it. These were all he had in his pockets.

The Secret of Being Happy.

"IT'S so hard, mamma, to be good; I just make up my mind to be, oh! just as good as I ever can be, and then the evil spirit steps in and it's all over," said little Jessie, with a wave of her hands. "I know the verse Miss Fuller told us to remember, 'The eyes of the Lord are in every place beholding the evil and the good,' but I don't remember long enough. Don't you think being good all day is, well, a little myrotonous?"

"Not monotonous, my darling, if you love God, and love to do his work. Be kind. If you have any flowers make a bouquet for some little girl who has none. A few pretty pansies, a bunch of sweet peas, a sprig of heliotrope, would make some little girl very happy all day, and the pleasure you afforded her would banish your discontent and the evil spirit as well.

"Long ago, when mamma was beginning to understand the lesson you are now learning, a little verse was handed her, read carelessly then, but daily recalled now:—

"'There are briers besetting every path
That call for constant care;
There is a cross in every lot,
And an earnest need for prayer;
But a steadfast heart that waits on God
Is happy anywhere.'

"Forget your own self. Try to do for others the many little things.

"If you see grandma trying to thread a needle, thread some needles without a word and place them on her needle book."

"I will try and remember," and Jessie kissed her mother as she left the room, softly repeating—

"A steadfast heart that waits on God
Is happy everywhere."

Selected.

"The Christian" Bible Searcher.

NEW QUARTER.—RULES.

Answers to the "Bible Searcher" are acknowledged in two lists:—

(1) Those received up to Monday morning, in the next Thursday's issue.
(2) Those received later, in the one following. Answers for the "second list" which reach the office after midday Wednesday are too late. Those from Scotland and Ireland only will be received till Thursday morning.

No Concordance may be used or help given with the answers, but the questions may be explained when necessary.

No papers can be re-examined.

It is necessary that letters should be properly stamped, and that names should be written very distinctly. A star (*) is given for neatness and extra care in answering the questions.

A Prize Competition is given the last week of March, June, September, and December. To be eligible, every child must have been correct nine times during the preceding twelve weeks.

Those whose 10th or 13th birthdays occur during the quarter may continue the weekly Searcher in the same division, but must enter for the Prize Competition for their actual age. There is no limit of age for weekly competitors; but no one above eighteen years of age can enter for the Quarterly Competition.

All communications must be addressed to "Uncle Tom," the Young People's Editor of "The Christian," 12, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C.

Personal.

Will you all try and be very careful how you stamp your Searchers? I had to pay 5d. on one from U.S.A. the other day, and the same on another from New Zealand. If you enclose a letter with your Searcher, you should stamp it accordingly.

Bertie Walls.—I am sorry that you are not eligible this quarter, but glad to hear you have been busy in other ways.

Phyllis Boyd, Margie Marston.—You were eligible for the Competition, but as you gave me no address, I could not send you a card.

Clara Brown.—Did you find your name in the eligible list?

Jamie de Hailes.—Thank you for your pretty text.

Graham Pearson.—You gave the wrong response for question (a) 244.

Christian Endeavour Topic.

SUNDAY, OCT. 7.

"Rich Toward God." (Luke xii. 13-21.)

OUR Lord spoke with such wisdom and authority as to suggest to this man the thought that He could best settle a dispute about an estate which divided him from his brother. His only thought of possible benefit that could accrue from his contact with Christ was that He might save him from a lawyer's bill. But our Lord refused to become an umpire in such a matter. That an acre or two more or less should belong to one man rather than another was not of prime importance with Him. He might have spent his life in adjusting the disputes of the world! No, He came to lay down great principles of human conduct, which would make injustice impossible. He came to deal with the root-sins out of which our disputes and litigations arise. He came to do away with covetousness, which was probably as strong in the heart of the brother, who seemed wronged, as of him who did the wrong. So He turned to the crowd and warned the people to beware of greed.

Let us never forget that wonderful assertion, that life consists not in what we possess, but in what we are; not in goods, but in goodness; not in things, but qualities. "How much was he worth?" we ask, when a rich man dies; and we expect an answer in the amount that stood to his credit, and on which he will have to pay death-duty. Yet surely a man is worth only the love, humility, and sweet reasonableness which characterize him. Take away a man's wealth, and, as in the case of this rich man of whom our Lord speaks, you have nothing left; but take away all things from a John, a Paul, an Augustine, a Leighton, and you have an abundance left which makes them the millionaires of all time. "Poor, yet making many rich; having nothing, and yet possessing all things."

This man made three foolish mistakes. 1st. He treated this money as though it were absolutely his own. There is no suggestion that he had got it wrongfully. He had not made it by gambling, by overreaching, or by speculating. His wealth had accrued as the gift of prolific harvests. It was certainly due to the goodness of the Creator, on whose co-operation the results of husbandry evidently depend. It would have been, at least, decent on his part to lift up grateful eyes in thankful acknowledgment to God. But such a thought seems never to have occurred to him. At the best he was but a steward of another's goods. But no, he persisted in looking on all as absolutely his own, and at his disposal. Notice how often the personal pronouns, I, me, and my, recur. Are we not all too prone to magnify our own shrewdness and business-aptitude, and to exclude God from the counting-house or shop, when we make up our gains for the year?

2nd. He thought that the best receptacle for his overplus was in barns. He forgot that there were multitudes of poor and needy souls all around him, whose bare tables, empty cupboards, and depleted barns, would have afforded ample receptacles for his abundance. When we begin to accumulate more than we need for our own use, or as a provision for our families, we should consider, not the investments which are offered in mines, and conscienceless trusts and rings, but in the pressing need of others. By investing in these, we should lay up treasure in heaven, and become rich toward God.

3rd. He thought that goods could stay the hunger of the soul. "Soul, eat, drink, and be merry." What! can the soul live on corn, can it drink of the fruit of the grape, can it be merry when the barns are full? How often the heart of man or woman has had all these; yet because the one they loved did not reciprocate their affection, or because their ambitions in music, art, or literature were ungratified, they would gladly have exchanged places with the poorest tenant on their estates, who was satisfied. And if this can be the case with human love, how much more when the soul is ill at ease from the memory of unforgiven sin, and looks out fearfully on an eternity for which it is not prepared! What is money which a man leaves behind after this little life, to his heirs, compared with the beatitudes of Matt. v.!

C.E. NOTES.

Eighteen new Societies were registered last week, bringing the total of Societies in the British Union to 6,923.

A society has recently been started in St. Silas' Episcopal Church Glasgow, of which Rev. Sholto D. C. Douglas, late rector of All Souls, Langham Place, is now Incumbent.

A special meeting will be held in London on November 1 to arrange for the further advance of Christian Endeavour in the Church of England. The meeting is convened by Rev. J. Horsefield, of Bristol.

A Society has recently been formed amongst the boys of a Blind School at Bristol, and it is interesting to hear they are as eager as other Endeavourers to find ways and means of service, for Christ and the Church.

The Irish Christian Endeavour Council has met in Portadown, and has accepted a cordial invitation for the next Irish National Convention of Christian Endeavour to meet in the same town. Hospitality will be provided for at least 120 delegates.

* * *

A Christian Endeavour pastor in the United States sends each week a letter to the young Endeavourer who is to lead the meeting, saying that he will remember them in prayer, and giving various helpful hints as to the best method of conducting the meeting.

International S.S. Lesson.

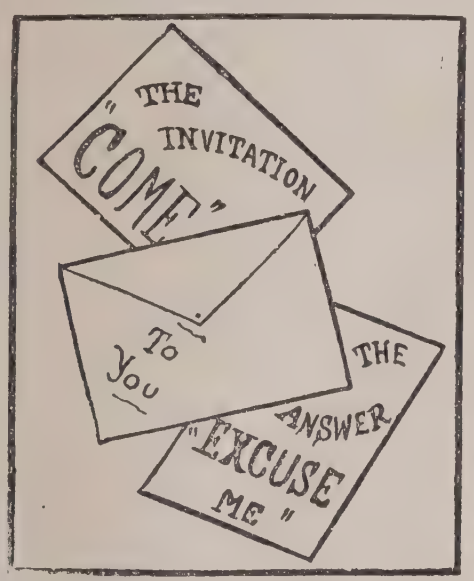
October 14, 1900.

Parable of the great supper.—Luke xiv. 15-24.

Golden Text.—"Come, for all things are now ready" (17).

Introduction.

A CERTAIN man—"God." A great supper—"The Gospel." A faithful servant—"Worker for God." The many invited—"You, and me, and everybody else." Get these four facts well into the mind, and the parable is full of interest.



Key to Blackboard Plan.—All know what a written invitation from a friend means; and all know that the friend will expect an answer. Here is an invitation from God. What is your answer? The answer from each one in this parable was "Excuse me." Oh, what a grand treat they lost!

1. The Supper.

(16) A great supper, plenty of provisions for plenty of people, and plenty of room to entertain them. (23) The man wanted to fill his house (22). (17) All is ready, but the great rooms remain empty; no guests arrive. (21) They have all had invitations, and yet they do not come. (21) After all, others have to be brought in to fill the vacant places. This time it is the sad, and the poor (21), the needy, and the outcast (23). "Quickly" (21), or the supper will spoil.

2. The Invitation.

One beautiful call, "Come" (17). This is one of the great Bible words. It begins in Gen. vii. 1, and ends on the last page of the Word of God, Rev. xxii. 17; and between these two points it is repeated again and again. Trace it out. (21) "Bring" them in; (23) "compel" them to come in. What a deep longing is beneath the surface. A longing to see souls come, and take, and enjoy all He, the King, has provided for them. Look, too, at the faithful worker. (17) Went, as he was told by his master; (21) came and told his master all he had done, and how he had done his work. (22) Always obedient, never questioning. (23) Again ordered out, he goes at once and does his Lord's bidding.

3. Answers.

(18) All began to make excuse, to beg off. They didn't want to come; they would rather stay away. Isa. xxviii. 12, would not. Matt. xxiii. 25, I would, ye would not. John v. 40, Ye will not. John i. 11, They received Him not. How sad are all these verses, and yet how true of many to-day! The excuses meant just all this; they were only put into different words.

First: I have bought land. I must see it. It is the first interest in my life" (18).

Second: I have bought oxen. I go to look at them. I don't want to come (19).

Third: I am married. I cannot come. I will not come (20).

None of our daily occupations should keep us from God; rather they should help us to live nearer to Him when done for his glory.

4. Result.

(24) They shall not. They have refused, rejected. It is their own fault. Now they cannot come if they would.

See how Christ was rejected: At Nazareth—Luke iv. 29. At Jerusalem—John viii. 59. At Samaria—Luke ix. 53. By the Gadarenes—Luke viii. 37. The Jews later on did the same—Acts xiii. 46; Matt. xxi. 43.

What are we doing, both with regard to Christ and the Gospel of our salvation? Heb. xii. 25; Matt. xxii. 8.

We need to be hungry and thirsty to enjoy food and to enjoy God's feast. We must "want" it. Blessed are they who hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled (Matt. v. 6). Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye (Isa. lv. 1).

The Y.M.C.A.

THE autumn conference of the North-West District Union has been held at Keswick. Upwards of fifty delegates attended. The reports of work presented were of an encouraging character.

On Tuesday, September 25, Councillor W. M. Roche, of Sunderland, gave a reception to the Y.M.C.A. students of that town. The Lecture Hall was crowded by the young manhood of the neighbourhood. Mr. R. D. Pringle, of Bombay, has conducted three meetings here in connection with missionary work among young men in India.

The Paris Anglo-American Association has lost the services of Mr. H. D. Barclay, its secretary, who has accepted a like office for the Govan Association, Glasgow. Pending a fresh appointment, communications for the Paris Association may be addressed to the president, Mr. H. H. Skipper, 160, Rue Montmartre, Paris.

The autumn Conference of the Western District Union was held at Weston-super-Mare on September 27. Mr. Henry Harrison presided over a business session in the morning, at which there was a large attendance of delegates, and reports of excellent work throughout the district were presented. At an afternoon session, under the presidency of Mr. J. Storrs Fry, Mr. R. D. Pringle gave an address upon the subject of "Y.M.C.A. Work in India," and Rev. J. Glyn Davies spoke upon "The Holy Spirit and Christian Service."

The President of the North-Eastern District, Mr. H. Crawford Smith, J.P., invited the members to High Cross House, Benwell, Newcastle, on the occasion of the annual general meeting and conference. Seventeen associations were represented. An address was delivered by Mr. W. M. Hudson, South Shields, on "Our Duty to Young Men in View of the Commencement of the Twentieth Century." Mr. Hudson emphasized the need of spiritual revival, and made practical suggestions for deepening and extending the work.

Sheffield.—The rescue and evangelization carried on at Sheffield by Mrs. E. Corbridge continues to make good progress. A large number of young women and children have been received into the Home, and the maternity branch has proved a haven to the distressed. Recent services at the mission hall, in which Revs. J. M. Ward and J. E. Taylor took part, attracted large congregations, and there were several inquirers. Fresh helpers are being drawn to the work. Mrs. Corbridge's address is 97, Gell Street, Sheffield.

Scottish Notes.

A GOOD good deal of feeling has been aroused throughout the country by a small party in the Free Church of Scotland who are antagonistic to the proposed union with the United Presbyterian Church. For some time it has been believed that in the end they would acquiesce in the decision of the overwhelming majority on the other side. Last week, however, in answer to a question put at a meeting, one of the leaders said it was their intention at the meeting of General Assembly in October, to sit still in the Hall when the other members left to join the United Presbyterian brethren in the Waverley Market, and thereafter to lay claim to all the funds and property of the Free Church, on the ground that the others having seceded, they will then be all that remain of the original Free Church of Scotland.

The Scottish Protestant Alliance is urging on all Protestant electors the desirability of supporting candidates who are opposed to the establishment of a Roman Catholic University in Ireland, as well as to the removal of existing disabilities affecting the Jesuit Order, who will give their support to the Clergy Discipline Bill for the discouragement of Ritualistic practices in the Church of England, and who are favourable to a well-considered scheme for securing liberty to all inmates of convents.

A somewhat notable paper appears in The Free Church of Scotland Monthly, from the pen of Rev. James M. Russell (Madras), bearing the title, "The Scarcity of Men for the Distinctively Religious and Educational Work of the Mission Field." Mr. Russell begins by relating his personal experience of the difficulty recently experienced in filling up a vacancy on the staff of the Madras Training College. In examining into the causes of this scarcity of men for the work, he found himself at once face to face with the diminution during recent years in the number of students entering our divinity colleges. Statistics were gathered of the students at the four Scottish Universities, and at the Free Church and United Presbyterian Colleges, during the past twenty years. The result showed that in the Free Church Colleges the numbers rose from 186 in 1880 to 285 in 1889, but fell away again to 171 in 1899. In the United Presbyterian College the number in 1880 was ninety-five, the maximum being 114 in 1882, which in 1899 had declined to fifty-eight. The Established Church had 171 students in 1880, and the maximum was reached in 1890 with 254, while in 1899 the number had fallen away to 136 in 1899.

Mr. Russell goes on to point out that the diminution has not yet taken effect on the number of probationers, the Free Church list having grown from eighty-nine ten years ago to over 120 at present; and the United Presbyterian being over sixty, a number he believes much in excess of the normal. He then passes on to a conclusion very natural in the circumstances. "That it should be difficult to supply the moderate requirements of our mission field from these large numbers is a fact that I must say staggers me." He adds that one of the strangest features of the state of affairs lies in the fact that "this decline in the missionary spirit in our theological students is coincident with the rise and progress of the Student Volunteer Movement. Presuming that that movement has been animated by the Spirit of God, and does not merely supply a platform for magniloquent protestation, it is surely a most lamentable thing that it should have influenced so little our schools of divinity.

After examining the figures, Mr. Russell finds that the foreign missionary staff of the Free Church is at present sixty-seven ordained men, of whom sixteen are medical. During the twenty years, sixty-five men have been sent out, of whom thirty-seven were required to fill up vacancies, leaving twenty-eight as the net augmentation. He calculates that to maintain this staff an average of two men per annum will be required, and he believes that the smallness and irregularity of the demand accounts, in large measure, for the difficulty experienced in supplying it. Further, he thinks that, as "tropical countries have to be governed by relays of white men relieving and succeeding one another," the introduction of some such system "would go a long way in overcoming men's reluctance to go to the foreign field. They would feel that in going abroad, they did not go necessarily for life, and that they would not be looked at askance or with suspicion if, after five or ten years abroad, they sought to enter the service of the Church at home; while at the same time the Church in the mission field and the Church at home would be drawn more closely together."

Mr. Protap Chunder Mozoombar—the head of the Brahmo Somaj movement, to whose visit to Scotland we have already referred—held his first meeting in Edinburgh, when a large proportion of the audience was composed of Indian students attending classes at the University. After paying a high tribute to British rule in India, the speaker proceeded to declare that the Hindus are a really religious people, to which he added that they live, eat, and suffer religiously. The meaning attached by him to the word religion became more plain as he declared that if the British do in India as they have done at home, in separating from social customs, if they alienated religious ideas from domestic ceremonies and observances, they will make the Indian like the Englishman, but neither natural nor wholesome. He thought that there had been a tendency in recent years to withdraw such measures of self-government as had been previously granted in India, and if he had a fault to find with the British administration it was that it is too machine-like, and that with all its perfection it lacks soul. Mr. Mozoombar in answer to a question by a lady, assured her that the position of woman in India had often been inaccurately described: "Woman is one of the greatest forces in India, but her influence is subterranean, not very apparent on the surface."

An interesting conference took place a few days ago in connection with the Markinch district of Y.M.C.A.'s and Fellowship Unions. Mr. John Thomson (Markinch) presided, and Mr. Robert Darling (Dysart) opened an interesting discussion on "Why are we not better Christians?" About 120 delegates were present.

The congregation of Free Anderston Church is preparing to celebrate on the 7th inst. the centenary of its formation in 1800. The first minister was Dr. Love (a name which is perpetuated in the Lovedale Missionary Institute, South Africa), whose successors have been Dr. Macfarlane, Dr. Brown, Dr. A. N. Somerville, Rev. J. M. Sloan (now of Edinburgh), and Dr. Adamson (the present pastor).

Among those who attended and took part in the half yearly meetings of Christians, held in Glasgow last week were Dr. Neatby (London), Dr. Case (China), Messrs. T. Baird (Africa), J. Campbell (U.S.A.), H. Cardwell Hill (India), Harry Price (China), H. Sparrow (Demerara), George Adam (Stranraer), William McLean (Australia), W. H. McLaughlin (Belfast), and Henry Payne (Barcelona).

Bible Study.—Encouraged by the fruitfulness of the courses of Bible Study held last winter at Exeter Hall, the committee of the Central Y.M.C.A. have arranged for a similar course of study during the ensuing winter months. The first series of lectures will be delivered by Rev. W. H. Griffith Thomas, M.A., incumbent of Portman Chapel, Baker Street, W. on Mondays at 5 and 8 o'clock respectively, commencing on October 15, the same lecture being delivered both afternoon and evening. It is hoped that many Christian workers will avail themselves of this opportunity of obtaining a deeper knowledge of the Word of God.

Salisbury Conference.

THE attendance was less than in recent years, but this is not strange, as there were seven similar gatherings in the same week.

Rev. Trevor Fielder, of St. Stephen's, Walthamstow, gave some suggestive thoughts on the healing of a blind man, describing various forms of defective sight. Short-sighted—the rich fool wrapt up in self. Long-sighted—like the Pharisee seeing into the thoughts of others. Dim-sighted—seeing men as trees walking. Double-sighted—seeing the world and Christ, living two lives. Colour-blindness—taking a dark view of things, &c.

Rev. E. L. Hamilton, of Bath, who was the most frequent speaker during the first two days, spoke from Acts xv. 8, 9, of "purifying their hearts by faith." There are four conditions of being filled with the Spirit:

(1) Confession that you believe it possible to be filled with the Spirit.
(2) Confession that you are not so filled.
(3) Confession that this is your own fault.
(4) Confession that you will never be right until you are filled.

In developing the subject this illustration was used. A man who regularly attended a weekly prayer meeting used every time to confess the same sin; got put right through confession; went away and sinned again. One day he had been confessing as usual—"Since we met last week cobwebs have come between my soul and Thee." Another interrupted with the petition, "O God, kill the spider." Remove the cause and the effect will cease.

Mr. Monro Collings, Rev. Walter Brown, St. Silas, Birmingham; Rev. Thomas Thwaites, and Rev. Dr. Spence, Belfast, added greatly to the instruction and interest of the meetings.

Rev. E. N. Thwaites, the convener, presided throughout, and his brief addresses at the early prayer meetings were among the most suggestive and helpful utterances.

On Wednesday afternoon Sir Matthew Dodsworth gave a pathetic account of the condition of the stable-boys at Chantilly, among whom Mr. Elliot Walton exercises a beneficial ministry. And Rev. F. L. Denman, of the London Society for the Promotion of Christianity among the Jews, gave an instructive explanation of the Zionist movement. On Thursday afternoon Miss Bartlett, of Amritsar, and Mr. Knowles, of Kashmir, gave missionary addresses of great interest. The usual praise meeting concluded the Conference.

Parkhall Convention.

THE Annual Convention at Parkhall, Polmont, N.B., for the deepening of spiritual life, has just been held. It lasted three days; and, as on former occasions, the Convention was held in the barn on the estate of Mr. Livingstone-Learmouth.

The place was seated to accommodate 1,100 people, was well lit and ventilated, and presented a very comfortable appearance.

This Convention is annually looked forward to by large numbers of people; and this year, as on former occasions, it attracted hundreds of visitors, large numbers of whom came long distances to be present.

Dr. Elder Cumming, of Glasgow, presided at all the meetings, and to his gracious, tactful guidance much was due. The meetings were deeply solemn and spiritual. Consecration, the fulness of the Spirit, the conditions of power, and holy living were all prayerfully discussed; and many lives, by their own testimony, have been very definitely blessed.

The speakers included—Revs. John Riddel (of Wynd Free Church, Glasgow), William Ross (Cowcaddens Free Church, Glasgow), James Lyall (London), and Stuart Holden (Bath), and Mr. A. Bell (Dunfermline).

As usual, the Convention is being followed by a special mission, the meetings being led by Mr. Lyall.

Dublin.—Gifts of left-off clothes—children's or adults'—for distribution among the poor, will be gladly received by George A. Couch, Irish Church Missions, Lower Gloucester Street, Dublin.

South London Methodism.

FEW districts of the Metropolis appear to be so spiritually needy as the vicinity of Southwark, the scene of that outbreak of lawlessness and personal violence which has become notorious under the name of Hooliganism, and to suppress which the local authorities have been compelled to invoke the aid of the Home Office.

The recent erection of St. George's Hall, in connection with the Primitive Methodist Mission, was a substantial contribution to the cause of religious progress, and now the South London Wesleyan Mission, an organization marked by has been enabled to open a splendid pile of buildings in the adjacent locality of Bermondsey. The site, which is an advantageous one, is at Star Corner, fronting an open space on the new main road to the Tower Bridge. Here, as Rev. H. T. Meakin observes, the Mission "clasps the poorest slum people with one arm, and stretches out the other to encircle a great artisan and wage-earning population." Not far away two public-houses, which were lately sold, realized the sum of £102,000.

The new building had become a necessity, in consequence of the development of the work. Southwark Chapel, capacious but old-fashioned, and of grimy and forbidding exterior, has a membership of 700. Locksfields Chapel, described as "once the despair of London Methodism," is also in a flourishing condition, and many spiritual and social activities have arisen at these centres. The new building, however (which is to be known as the Central Hall), is not to absorb the older places. Nothing will be abandoned, but a new church, it is prayerfully anticipated, will be the outcome of evangelistic efforts in the new hall.

The premises have an imposing exterior. The grand entrance is flanked by large shops, and there is also accommodation for a workmen's reading room, rooms for the visiting and nursing sisterhood, and a variety of useful undertakings of an institutional character. The effective design is carried out in red brick and terra cotta tile. The lofty castellated pile, crowned by a tower, is one of the most conspicuous buildings in South London.

The inaugural services, which were held on Wednesday, September 26, brought together a large number of Metropolitan friends and supporters of various denominations. Revs. J. H. Hopkins and H. T. Meakin had arranged an extensive programme, the first item of which was the official opening, by Miss Emily M. P. Wood, of Southport. On obtaining admission to the hall, it was at once evident that it was well adapted to its purpose. Capacious and airy, departing in many ways from conventional ideas, its graceful affords a model which might well be followed in the erection of mission halls. Since Bermondsey is the home of the tanning industry, there was appropriateness in providing seats which are chiefly composed of slabs of leather.

Following the opening came a luncheon, at which Mr. T. A. Denny presided, and a number of ministerial and other friends took part. Next came a devotional meeting, addressed by Revs. Dr. Jenkins and G. Campbell Morgan, and an evening gathering which proved to be an enthusiastic Methodist rally, full of life and vigour. The Central Hall opened, therefore, under auspicious circumstances, and is likely to realize the earnest hopes of its founders, who desire to see it a centre of spiritual power and blessing.

The total cost is given as £25,000, a figure which, considering the position and character of the premises is remarkably low. By the liberality of friends and the increasing toil of ministers and people, a large proportion has been raised. The POOR HAVE GIVEN NOBLY.

One old lady, for instance, has a sure income of only half-a-crown a week; sometimes she may get a little more, but often the half-crown is all she has. And there are others but little better-off. Yet, in addition to their penny-a-week class-money, and their twopence half-penny a week for the Twentieth Century Fund, they have each contributed a farthing a week for the pulpit chair; and a sum of £2 10s. is the result. A band of young work-girls have given in a similar way, and with the £3 or so that they have contributed the pulpit Bible has been purchased. Mr. Meakin, to whose faith and industry so much is owing in the matter, desires to raise the required balance of £7,000.

Sailors at Falmouth.

IN common with similar institutions, the Falmouth Branch of the British and Foreign Sailors' Society continues to be a boon to the thousands of seamen touching our shores. Last year some 30,000 entered the harbour at Falmouth, and of this number, it is gratifying to note, only six were convicted for drunkenness.

The success of the Bethel and Institute on shore, and the memorial mission boat, Clareens, afloat, has been uninterrupted, and the work is continued with undiminished activity both on sea and land.

Mr. J. C. Badger, the resident missionary, is heartily welcomed to the vessels in the harbour, and many interesting services are the outcome. One of these visits is described in the annual report: "The morning was wild, and the harbour full of vessels. We fixed on a central schooner, and hoisted the Bethel flag. There came together under the dear old flag one of the most cheering congregations ever gathered together in Falmouth Harbour. Parts of twenty ships' crews joined our service. All went away delighted, only to muster in larger numbers at the service on shore."

Another instance Mr. Badger relates:—"In the forecastle of a Russian ship I found a young English sailor. He held a mate's certificate, but through evil company and drink had lost his position, and been absent from home for years. He signed the pledge; made a fresh start in life. His aged mother wrote several letters, in one of which she said we had earned the everlasting blessings of a mother."

An idea of the amount of work undertaken by the Mission may be gathered from the fact that the visits to ships last year numbered 1,736; services on board the Clareens, 202; and the constant distribution of Scripture in ten languages. Over 1,200 seamen have joined the Temperance Union.

Welsh Notes.

THERE is a project on foot amongst Welsh Congregationalists in Liverpool to erect a chapel in memory of the late Dr. Gwilym Rees (Hiraethog). Dr. Rees was for years pastor of a Welsh Congregational Church in that city, and it is felt that his brilliant gifts and services entitle him to such commemoration. As preacher, poet, and hymn-writer, his fame was as wide as the Welsh-speaking world.

At the National Eisteddfod in Liverpool a forcible protest was made against the practice, so general in Wales, of singing hymns at such gatherings. The protest has been made none too soon, for in all kinds of gatherings the songs of Zion are to be heard under circumstances which cannot but detract from their sacredness. Between the character of the hymns and the occasions upon which they are sung, there is often an obvious incongruity, and the practice, unless stopped, cannot but lead to the profanation and degradation of that which is holy.

For some weeks an interesting discussion has been carried on in the columns of the Goleuad as to the desirability of a more stationary ministry amongst Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. Founded by itinerant evangelists, the denomination has perpetuated a system which was adapted to its early growth and development, but which now calls for modifications, and even abolition, in order to meet the changed conditions of the present time. Even now there is a large number of Welsh Calvinistic Methodist churches without a resident pastor, and even where this is not the case the minister in charge, in too many instances, fills his own pulpit only once a month.

The meetings of the Welsh Baptist Union took place last week at Bangor, North Wales. The president of this year's gatherings was Rev. W. Morris, F.R.G.S., Treorky. Ministers and deacons of prominence took part in the various services. The last day was devoted to preaching, and thousands flocked to hear the Gospel preached by some of the most eminent ministers of the denomination.

The Women's Temperance Association of North Wales recently held its annual gathering at Carnarvon. According to the report of the Association, there are now 113 societies affiliated to it. Anglesey, the mother of Wales, was specially commended for its temperance activity. A comprehensive programme of temperance reform was suggested during the meetings. Considerable enthusiasm seems to have been aroused by the suggestion of one lady speaker that the Association should secure 10,000 pledges by the end of the present year.

On Wednesday, September 26, the new buildings of the Young Men's Christian Association at Cardiff were opened by Lord Kinnaird. The new structure, both as regards its external appearance and its internal arrangements, is an exceptionally fine one. A special feature in connection with it is the extensive accommodation for boarders. Of the £16,000 which the new buildings are estimated to cost, £12,000 has been promised or has already come to hand.

Oxford Letter.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

REV. PROFESSOR MARGOLIOUTH'S name has been much before the public of late. Beside his articles in The Expositor, which have appeared during the year, he writes on the language of the Old Testament in the third volume of the New Bible Dictionary, edited by Dr. Hastings.

Oxford Sunday School Teachers' Institute held its Annual Conference on Thursday at Trinity College, and was attended by a large number of teachers from Sunday schools in the city and immediate neighbourhood. Rev. the Hon. W. Talbot Rice gave a hopeful address at a service held in the Chapel at 6 o'clock. The main point of his address was "Patience."

Rev. Canon Christopher presided at the Conference held after tea, and the subject for discussion was opened by Rev. W. H. Griffith Thomas, incumbent of Portman Chapel, London. The topic chosen was "Some Thoughts on Lesson Preparation." Mr. Thomas emphasized the spiritual aspect of Lesson Preparation, urging that Sunday school work was spiritual rather than educational. Spiritual result solved the problem of the leakage of older scholars He advised teachers to "think themselves empty, to read themselves full, and to write themselves clear, then they would be voices and not merely echoes of other men's voices." There was a short discussion afterwards.

The East Oxford P.S.A. Society held a Conference on the same evening in the British School, Cowley Road. Mr. A. Underhill presided. The proceedings showed that the Society was very much awake. One point recorded with thankfulness was the dissemination of wholesome literature. The facilities offered by the Society for the purchase of books had placed in the homes of its members good, solid volumes, the reading of which meant increased knowledge, expansion of ideas, and a higher moral tone. The weekly gatherings have brought the men face to face with the truths of Christianity, and while the subjects have been varied, they had constantly been reminded that man had a soul, that he was related to God and to eternity, that he was on probation, and that his mission was to glorify God.

Rev. C. Foster Carter has been curate of St. Clement's for a few months only, and already he is in the thick of new work. A meeting for men only was commenced on Sunday, and a special feature of his work are the gatherings in the open air in the poorest parts of the parish. He has succeeded in getting an orchestra to support him, and the large attendance shows the interest roused. We are thankful for the enthusiasm roused, and pray that Mr. Carter's great gifts may be used for the salvation of many.

Rev. F. J. Hazeldine, formerly curate of St. Clement's, is making an appeal for funds for the purpose of founding exhibitions at Wycliffe Hall, Oxford, and Ridley, Cambridge, to be known as "Christopher Exhibitions," in commemoration of Canon Christopher's eightieth birthday. The Bishop of Liverpool (Dr. Chavasse), Dr. Handley Moule, and Sir John Kennaway have each written warmly supporting the scheme. Such a foundation would express the loving thankfulness of many for the noble life and work of Canon Christopher.

Bible Flower Mission.—Mrs. W. W. Turton, superintendent of this Mission, writes:—"As flowers are becoming scarce, we trust they will be supplemented by such things as autumn leaves, clematis seed, berries, pods, &c., not forgetting all kinds of text cards, which, together with lavender bags and pincushions, are in constant demand." Mrs. Turton may be addressed, 110, Cannon Street, E.C.

Obituary.

REV. R. S. WILLIAMS.

THE death of Rev. R. S. Williams, of Dowlais, which occurred on September 21, removes one of the stalwarts of Welsh Congregationalism. A man of sincerity, earnestness, and eloquence, his loss is a serious one. As a young man he had worked in the slate quarries of Carnarvonshire. After studying at Bala and Brecon, and a pastorate of some years at Brecon, he received a call to Bethesda, Bangor, one of the most important churches in the Welsh Congregational body. Some fifteen years ago he returned to South Wales, undertaking the pastorate of Bethania Church, Dowlais. In 1897 he was elected president of the Welsh Congregational Union.

PREBENDARY HARRY JONES.

One of the most familiar figures of metropolitan Church life is removed by the decease of Rev. Harry Jones, Prebendary of St. Paul's, who for many years did such good work, first at the West, and later at the East end of London. As vicar of St. Luke's, Berwick Street, he laboured in a squalid district near the notorious Seven Dials, and came prominently before the public in connection with his devoted labours during a cholera epidemic. On becoming vicar of St. George's-in-the-East, he continued to evince deep interest in the condition of the poor. He was one of the founders of the East London Church Fund, and took a leading part in the creation of many useful undertakings of a social and philanthropic character. After ten years at St. George's he accepted the living of Barton, Suffolk, but subsequently returned to London as vicar of St. Peter's, Great Windmill Street, a church built by the Earl of Derby for the poor of St. James', Piccadilly. He combined with this the ministry of St. Philip, Regent Street. In 1897 he became rector of St. Vedast's, Foster Lane, where he set to work with a good deal of his old energy. Mr. Jones was a man with a large heart and of untiring energy.

Continental Notes.

IN a recent note, Miss Louise Shepard, of New York, writes: "We left London on August 15, and passed eight days in as many cities in the western part of Belgium—including Liège, Namur, and Charleroi. We returned for three days to Market Harboro' for union meetings of all the churches in connection with the tent work by Mr. Hardcastle. Then we left for Switzerland, where we held first some impromptu meetings at Interlaken, Schynige Platte, and in other places, and went to Geneva. We held meetings in Victoria Hall and the Salle de la Reformation, and thence to Chaux de Fonds, Ste. Croix (where there was a gathering of students), Neuchatel, and Bienne. In every place hundreds were turned away from the doors, half-an-hour before the hour to begin.

"Now we are in the Borinage (the eastern part of Belgium) for three days, and hope to hold seven meetings. We cannot speak of the blessing of God on all these meetings, and of his mighty working; but it will suffice to say that we have been obliged to refuse six invitations in Switzerland, and as many more in this country and France, for we expect to sail for America on October 13 by the Umbria, Cunard line. The prayers of all Christian friends in England are earnestly desired."

Priests as Reporters.—According to the Rome correspondent of The Times, an international telegraphic news agency is to be started, controlled by the Vatican, and worked, free of charge, by Romanist priests throughout the world. The general idea of the scheme is that, as the news would be furnished without remuneration by priests, the agency would be able to undersell all competitors. The promoter of the plan is Cardinal Rampolla, supported, it is said, by "a group of financiers and French political men."

Korea.—Writing with respect to the appeal for the travelling and outfit expenses of the lady who has undertaken the post of matron of Seoul Orphanage, Korea, Mr. W. Roger Jones, of the Missionary Pence Association, says:—"The amount required is £45." Mr. Jones' address is Exeter Hall, Strand, W.C.

The Council of the Evangelical Alliance ask for financial help, and for sympathetic prayer in aid of their work. The pecuniary need is urgent. Moneys have been advanced for aggressive Gospel work on the Continent, but the financial help which was expected towards this and other expenses, has not been received. And in various ways the Council has been passing through a trial of faith, and now, after prayer, makes its need known to all Christians. Subscriptions of smaller amounts will be gratefully acknowledged, but donors of £20 and upwards will be entitled to all the privileges of Life Membership of the Alliance.

CONCISE—DEFINITE—EDUCATIONAL.

The catechetical form has been adopted because it is a method largely employed at the present time by those who are endeavouring to undo the work of the Reformation. These seek to propagate their insidious teaching far and wide by the use of Catechisms, which have once more acquired considerable popularity. The advantages of such a method are considerable. By no other means can those who seek definite and accurate information upon any given subject so readily and pleasantly obtain that knowledge.

DWIGHT L. MOODY

BY HIS SON,

W. R. MOODY.

A first-hand Memoir of Mr. MOODY, embracing much information which is exclusively in the possession of the family.

Cloth Boards, 10s. 6d.,

Or, Cloth, Bev. Boards, Gilt Edges, 12s. 6d.

592 pages, Super Royal 8vo, with over ONE HUNDRED ILLUSTRATIONS, including Portraits and Views specially reserved for this Volume.

Mr. W. R. MOODY, in the Preface, says:—

"The preparation of my father's biography has been undertaken as a sacred trust. Early in the spring of 1894 he was asked by an old friend for permission to issue a biography with his approval. This my father declined to do, and on that occasion expressed the wish that I should assume the task when his life work was ended." "What I want,"

MR. D. L. MOODY SAID TO HIS SON,

"is that you should correct inaccuracies and mis-statements that it would be difficult to straighten out during my life. You are the one to do this. All my friends will unite with you and give you their assistance."

Referring to the short time in which the "Life" has been written,

Mr. W. R. MOODY says:—

"It would have been my choice to have had more leisure for accomplishing the work; but the announcement of unauthorised biographies has necessitated the immediate publication of the present volume, otherwise the desire of my father would have been thwarted."

MR. SANKEY'S TESTIMONY:—

Can Churches Avoid Debt?

A TESTIMONY BY PASTOR T. HANCOCKS, CAVENDISH BAPTIST CHURCH, RAMSGATE.

CAN they? As a rule they do not. Churches which avoid debt on their current accounts, as a rule, contract them whenever building operations are undertaken.

Is this right? Is debt ever right? Is "Owe no man anything" as binding on Christians as "Be not drunk with wine"? Are not all these New Testament commands equally binding upon all under grace?

Our Sunday school premises were a disgrace, and children could not be gathered or taught in numbers adequate for the congregation. The children of our own members had to go elsewhere. It became clear it was not God's will for this to continue, but that we should "arise and build." We pledged our word to open free of debt, believing that to be also his bidding.

The schools were expected to cost £2,000. The lowest tender opened on September 21, 1899, showed that they would cost, in all, £4,200. A knockdown blow to us, and all but one agreed with him who declared, "It cannot be done free of debt." Had we revoked our pledge, it would have meant, in the last analysis, "God can be trusted for £2,000, but He is not reliable for £4,200." This would have insulted the Most High; and, God be thanked, the better course was taken.

We were pledged to open free of debt. It was impossible! We confessed our belief that God would do the impossible, and He has done it! He has given marked guidance, perfect unity in the church membership, and such generous supplies that we have "owed no man anything" for a single moment. In all, much more than £4,400 has been received. In the last ten months, £2,400; in the last twenty-six days, £970. A reception realized £659. There was such a stream of cheerful givers that a surplus of over £190 has been given, and when all promises are fulfilled it will reach £200.

Outside the schools and inside the church are two marble tablets, saying,

These schools are a witness to the LIVING GOD, who gave over £4,410 for their erection in answer to PRAYER. Thus enabling his people to do the impossible, and to open them free of debt on September 13, 1900. The last £2,400 was given in ten months. "Ask, and it shall be given you."

To crown the whole, the following minute was passed by the entire congregation, upstanding—

FOR CHRIST AND THE CHILDREN!

That this Church and Congregation desire to place on permanent record their ineffable gratitude to the

to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit—in the Trinity of his sacred persons, for the gift of the new schools.

We ascribe all praise to God alone for Faith to trust Him in the dark, and to confess it with the mouth; for unity that has known no friction; for all the wisdom needed day by day; for strength to do all the work; for no accident to the men employed; for such a constant supply of money that we have "owed no man anything," for a single moment; for such a spirit of cheerful giving that over £4,400 was subscribed a fortnight before the opening day, September 13, 1900, so that we opened with No debt and No collection. All this despite bad times, caused by three wars, many war funds, a late and wet season, and a serious rise in the price of everthing; and so generous was our God that we hold a surplus of nearly £200.

And that this be recorded in our Church minutes, and signed by the pastor and all the deacons.

And, finally, that we hereby dedicate to Christ not only the new schools but ourselves also, to be more Believing, Holy, and Zealous in his Spiritual Service than ever before. To this end we pray our Risen Lord to fill us all with the Holy Ghost!

"Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us" (Psa. cxv. 1).

"This is the Lord's doing; it is marvellous in our eyes" (Psa. cxviii. 23).

"O magnify the Lord with me, and let us exalt his Name together" (Psa. xxxiv. 3).

T. HANCOCKS, Pastor.

We pray that this witness may help the faith of many, and already we know its influence is being widely felt.

Church of England.

Rev. H. T. E. Barlow, Dean of St. John's College, Cambridge, has accepted the college living of Macwood, an important country parish between Barnstaple and Ilfracombe. The new rector is the youngest son of the Vicar of Islington. A few years since he declined a bishopric in Japan.

The Bishop of Rochester has conferred an Hon. Canonry on Rev. J. W. Marshall, vicar of St. John's, Blackheath. Canon Marshall has for a quarter of a century been beneficed in the diocese, and had always held the distinctive principles of Evangelical Churchmanship with unswerving fidelity.

There has been a prosperous summer term at Wycliffe Hall, Oxford, where the new Principal, Rev. H. Grey, has had fourteen students in residence. There are twenty-five entries for the new term, and these completely fill Wycliffe. If further entries are made, accommodation will have to be found outside the Hall.

At a conference of rural deans and parochial clergy held at Liverpool, Bishop Chavasse announced some of his arrangements respecting the work of the diocese in the immediate future. He stated that he had secured the house adjoining his own for a hostel, and he hoped next year to have six University graduates studying there for the ministry under a vice-principal. He also hoped before long to begin building a chapel and sixteen dormitories specially intended for the reception of candidates for ordination.

Congregational.

Sherwell Church, Plymouth, adopted the Century Fund after Dr. Guinness Rogers had preached two sermons on its behalf and addressed a public meeting, at which Dr. Chapman presided. Over £500 was promised at the meeting.

The proceeds of the Harvest Thanksgiving services at Latimer Road Chapel, E., are to be devoted to the Indian Famine Fund. Sermons were preached by the pastor, Rev. W. J. Atkinson; and in the afternoon, Rev. F. J. Chaplin gave an address.

Calls (accepted).—Rev. G. T. Allpress, South Ockenden, to St. John's Church, Jersey; Rev. J. L. Gower, of Edinburgh, to Dalbeattie; Rev. Rhys Jones, of Llandebie, to the Welsh Congregational Church at Brisbane, Queensland.

Baptist.

The work for soldiers conducted by Rev. W. E. Wells is among the Guards at Westminster, and not, as recently stated, in connection with Woolwich Garrison.

Pastor T. Spurgeon has expressed to Mr. F. H. Ford, chairman of the Tabernacle re-building committee, the congratulations of the worshippers at the happy issue of the devotion and toil of the committee.

Rev. J. G. Greenhough, of Leicester, has accepted an invitation to visit New Zealand next year to take part in a series of special services which are being arranged at Nelson, in commemoration of the jubilee of the introduction of the Baptist denomination into the colony.

On Wednesday, September 26, at John Street Chapel, Marylebone, W., a meeting was held in connection with the re-opening of the Chapel after its renovation. Mr. Joseph Peters presided, and gave a grand testimony to the power of Divine grace in his own heart, and commended the Gospel to all present. Stirring addresses were also delivered by Revs. J. Ossian Davies and W. J. Mills. The presence of the Master was felt, and much encouragement given to press on in the work of the Lord.

Rev. Carey Bonner, Secretary of the Sunday School Union, does not accept the statistics, recently published, showing a large falling off in the number attending the Sunday schools of the Free Churches. Speaking for his own denomination (the Baptist), he affirms that if some forty-six "defaulting churches" had sent in, and if in statistical returns these had been included in the same proportion as in the previous year, there would have been 845 teachers and 8,520 scholars more than the totals actually returned.

Resignations.—Rev. D. P. McPherson, B.D., South Street, Exeter; Rev. G. Hay Morgan, Woodberry Down Church, London, N., retiring in December.

Methodist.

At a series of Wesleyan Century Fund meetings in Sheffield Revs. Thos. Allen (President of the Conference) and Hugh Price Hughes gave addresses, and 2,947 guineas were promised towards the Fund.

The Methodist Free Churches only need another 14,000 guineas to complete their Century Fund of 100,000 guineas. The record speaks well not only for the promptitude of the members, but for the organizing ability of those who have taken the fund in hand. The Free Methodist body is developing a more aggressive spirit.

During the building of the new Wesleyan Church at Weston-super-Mare, the worshippers met in the Town Hall, which was the gift of Ven. Archdeacon Law, once vicar of Weston, who stipulated in the deed that the hall should always be available for Nonconformists during such time as their own places were under repair or their new ones were being built.

In order to reach young people, Rev. T. Ferrier Hulme has made a new departure at Wesley's Chapel, City Road, N. He intends holding, on the third Sunday evening in each month, a young people's special service, with a short prayer meeting and a "social hour" afterwards. At the first gathering a good number stayed to the prayer meeting. The members of the Wesley Guild and the Mission Band were on the alert for newcomers. After refreshments, some conversation and a hearty invitation to come again, Mr. Hulme announced "family prayer."

Dr. Talmage preached at Wesley Chapel, City Road, on Sunday afternoon to an overflowing congregation. The discourse, based on the words—"The people that do know their God shall be strong and do exploits" (Dan. xi. 32), embodied vital and significant truths, which were forced home in the doctor's unconventional and striking utterances. The three greatest "exploits" possible are the saving of a man, a woman, and a child. This "saving," he declared, would be "famous in heaven quadrillions of years after the earth has become scattered ashes in the whirlwind." As for him who refuses to lend a helping hand to a fellow-creature in distress, "the fiends fill their chalices with fire and drink to his health."

Presbyterian.

The iron hall in East Avenue, East Ham, erected in the centre of a large and thickly-populated working-class district, has been opened. Rev. J. Munro Gibson, D.D., conducted the dedicatory service. The attendances both at the opening and since, has greatly encouraged the local friends, who look forward to the formation of a vigorous church.

Society of Friends.

The Friends' Home Mission Committee kindly lent their tent to the Friends of Kingston-on-Thames for a series of meetings. William Baker, of Folkestone, had very acceptable service in these meetings, and there is a deep feeling of thankfulness for the blessings vouchsafed during the mission.

Before entering into the business of Kent Quarterly Meeting some time was given to F. Dymond to bring forward the subject of temperance, and the assembly listened with much attention to his earnest words, which were not unmingled with regret that Friends, in a Church capacity, are not doing more to arrest the terrible tide of intemperance.

William Robinson and George H. Farrington have recently spent some weeks in a visit to all the meetings in the three Monthly Meetings of Gainsborough, Richmond, and Sedbergh. Some of the meetings are very small, but all gave a warm welcome to their visitors. The companies of people, larger and smaller, who attended on every occasion, listened with close and quiet attention to addresses setting forth the inconsistency of war with the precepts of Christianity.

For some time past several of the Friends engaged at the central offices at Devonshire House, E.C., have felt the need of some short united time for prayer on behalf of the work, and arrangements have been made for a half-hour's meeting to be held at noon every Wednesday (except in Meeting for Sufferings week) for this purpose. At the first meeting Watson Grace presided. This opportunity for fellowship among the Friends employed in the work of eight organizations connected with the premises will be much appreciated.

Fallen Asleep.

Aged ninety-one, Mrs. KELLY, of Sale, Cheshire, mother of Rev. Charles Kelly.—Rev. DAVID R. MORGAN, of Chalford, Gloucestershire. He entered the Baptist ministry in 1865, and after six years' work at Usk, Monmouthshire, became minister of Chalford Tabernacle in 1871, and held the pastorate for twenty-nine years.—The Baptist Church at Hendon, N.W., has sustained a deep loss by the death of Miss CAROLINE BANKART, aged sixty-eight. For more than twenty years she had been a diligent and devoted worker among the Midland Railway men, in the mothers' meeting, and among the sick poor.

Personalia.

Mr. JAMES WHARTON is shortly sailing for America to resume evangelistic work among the freed slaves.

Dr. GEORGE C. LORIMER, of the Tremont Temple, Boston, U.S.A., has declined to entertain the proposition of his church to add 1,000dols. a year to his salary.

Rev. Dr. ROUSE, well known as the translator of the Bengali Bible, has arrived in Melbourne, en route for India. He is now in Victoria, having paid a short visit to Tasmania.

The health of Rev. CHARLES GARRETT causes some anxiety to his family. He is ordered to take a complete rest for some months, and all his engagements for the present year are cancelled.

Mr. JOHN KENSIT, who has been chosen as a Parliamentary candidate for Brighton, is prosecuting his campaign with much vigour. He is, of course, making the Protestant question a prominent feature of his addresses.

Mrs. GERALD COULTAS, wife of the superintendent of Barry Dock Mission, Cardiff, is in a critical condition of health. Two years since she underwent an operation for the removal of a malignant tumour, and now another growth is giving serious trouble.

Rev. C. M. SHELDON has not yet resumed his pastorate at Topeka. His church having granted him eight months' absence, he has established himself for the winter at the Tremont Temple, Boston, with a view to undertake special service in connection with the Christian Endeavour movement, which has its headquarters in that building.

Rev. F. B. MEYER is proceeding to Stockholm and Berlin, to hold two conferences on the Christian Life. Mr. Meyer writes: "I shall be thankful for the prayers of God's children, that by Divine blessing the conferences may have far extended and important results. I hope to be back at Christ Church by October 16, so as to be able to resume my Thursday noon service, which Dr. Pierson takes in the meanwhile."

London Tent Campaign.

IN an account of the work Mr. CHARLES COOK writes: "On Thursday the closing evening of the Notting Hill Tent took place, and a remarkable gathering of the converts was witnessed. Over 400 names had been taken, and the men, women, and children were all called up and presented with a suitable book by Mr. and Mrs. Cohen, who have rendered invaluable help during the six weeks of the Mission. One missionary is praising God for two sons and one daughter converted, another for one son and one daughter, another worker tells of his own son converted, and one whole family known to him, who were also blessed. Several married couples were present who were rejoicing that they had found Christ together. From no other place have I received so many letters thanking God for the tent work as from Notting Hill, and the large attendances at the week-night meeting have been most encouraging. My week's work there was time of joy to my own soul. Mr. WEEDEN'S Gospel solos reached many hearts."

The campaign has gained much from the co-operation of ministers and Christian workers of all denominations. Mr. J. T. BRUNNING lately spoke of some notable instances in which such co-operation had conduced to spiritual results. From the late Rev. E. Bacheler Russell, of Leyton, he had received much encouragement. Mr. Russell had welcomed him heartily, expressing his satisfaction that a tent was to be erected at Leyton, and saying, with deep feeling, "I was fearful lest the tent would not come, and we should miss the blessing."—The secretary of the Baptist Church at Dawes Road, Fulham, wrote: "The work of the great tent at Fulham was the means of greatly blessing the young people in connection with our church. We have had grand times ever since. Last Sunday week fifteen were baptized by our pastor, and now we have another fifteen as candidates."

A thanksgiving meeting, for blessing given during the campaign, has been arranged for Tuesday, October 9 at 7 p.m., at Exeter Hall. Mr. T. A. DENNY is to preside, and the occasion is to be a rally of evangelists, local workers, and friends and converts. A chorus of 300 voices, selected from the tent choirs, will lead the singing. In order to close the season free of debt the central committee needs £1,000. The hon. treasurer is: Mr. A. Garstin, Queen Square, Aldersgate Street, E.C.

In Herefordshire Hop Yards.

Describing the work in the Herefordshire yards, Mr. W. LUFF, who is labouring there in company with Mr. JONES, says: "In the week, we go from yard to yard and preach to the people at their picking; on Sunday, we visit them at their farms. Here is a sketch of last Sunday's work. At the first place we found the buildings occupied by men and women of the lodging-house type, who gladly received a little Gospel reading. The next farm looked like a military encampment; but among the tents we preached the Word, and the dwellers under canvas listened attentively.

"Passing on, we found the pickers at the next farm had not yet come; but the good woman at the house took charge of their supply of literature, willingly promising to hand it round on their arrival.

"Sunday afternoon found us in an orchard, where the pickers arranged the seats for an hour's service. It was a solemn time, for two who last year worshipped with them were in eternity.

"In the evening we were out again, to find another group of pickers sitting waiting for someone to preach to them. Our last service was near the church with a crowd of poor folk and their babies, who attended no place of worship, and with other pickers who had just left the service inside. Friends had sent numbers of Sankey hymn books (halfpenny edition), which greatly helped in these services."

The Evangelization Society.

A number of correspondents forward particulars of recent missions conducted in connection with the Evangelization Society.

Mr. T. GOUDIE has just closed a tent mission at East Ham. Many have been drawn to hear the Gospel, and not a few have professed faith in the Lord Jesus.

A tent mission has been held at Walgrave, the preacher being Mr. CHARLES NOAKES. The meetings grew in numbers, interest, and power, and towards the close of the mission a considerable number were brought to decision. The local friends entered into the work in a prayerful and earnest spirit.

Mr. J. Naughten writes:—"At Cox Green Mills, Bolton (Messrs. J. and F. Garnett), Mr. HENRY

Notes & Comments

MESSRS. MORGAN AND SCOTT announce for immediate publication a cheap 5s. edition of the authorized "Life of D. L. Moody," by his son, W. R. Moody; a fresh addition to the Series of Scripture Biography, by Rev. F. B. Meyer, B.A., entitled "John the Baptist;" and an interesting volume, "Pundita Ramabai," profusely illustrated, descriptive of the unique and important work for the child-widows of India carried on by the heroic lady whose name it bears. It is written by Mrs. H. S. Dyer, for many years resident in Bombay.

It has been impossible to read the election addresses and speeches without a feeling of keen disappointment from the point of view of Christian citizenship. There has been great party heat, much mutual recrimination, and plenty of hard hitting on both sides, but no one has touched the finer chords of patriotism, and to the highest sentiments no one has appealed. The great reforms for which the country is waiting have been left for the most part unmentioned. The demoralizing effect of a year's warfare on the public mind is evident in all this. The outlook is not bright for the future government of the country. We seems to be drifting no one knows whither, and a sense of profound uneasiness is felt by those who have the highest national interests at heart. The times call for watchfulness and earnest prayer that the country may, which ever party is in power, be governed and guided by Him who is "the only Ruler of princes."

When the Right Hon. W. H. Smith was Leader of the House of Commons, he wrote to a relation upon the Continent:—

> There are great anxieties in Government—great responsibilities—and who is able for these things? Help us, my dear friend, by prayer. I should be dismayed and faint if it were not that I believe my God is very near to guide and strengthen me, and to give me the wisdom I need, and to comfort and sustain those who are in sorrow and sickness and need. The work is heavy and the burden great, and you and others who are far off can ask and believe that you have the petitions which you make. I am amazed when I look round me and see the causes for thankfulness which exist, and I trouble for myself and for my wife and children lest any of us should fail to live up to our duty and to the right use of the talents entrusted to us. All I can say is, God help me to do my work.

What noble results would follow the deliberations of our Parliament if each member and every elector approached his duties in this spirit of trust in, and dependence upon, God.

One of the most trenchant and useful papers read at the recent Church Congress was that of Archdeacon Diggle on the special dangers and temptations of the theologian's calling, by which is meant one who devotes himself to the scientific study of theology. The chief of these, of course, is the development of the intellect at the cost of the spiritual life. The peril of continually and scholastically arguing about religion, of analyzing and classifying the attributes of God, and of analytically discussing the heart mysteries of the faith, is a very real one. A man may argue about the Cross of Christ till he forgets his need of a Saviour, and till the "things that angels desire to look into" become a deadly commonplace. There are, indeed, few Christians who need to watch over their own hearts and to cultivate a practical piety more than professional theologians. When faith ceases to be an enthusiasm, and sinks to the level of a syllogism, the end is not far off. It is only by prayer, and by allying the "abstracts" of theology with the concrete duties of personal service, that the flame of true piety can be kept alive.

What is true of the theologian in his study is equally applicable to the preacher in his pulpit and the missionary on his rounds. We know of ministers who have bewailed the loss of power over their people, wondering what the reason could be. They worked harder than ever at their sermons, and preached them with all the resources of their mind and body, and yet their words fell dead on the congregation. The reason, hidden from them, would be patent enough to others. The trouble lay in the loss of enthusiasm, in the lowered note of personal conviction and realization which was the result of too great an outward familiarity with the great facts and truths of the Gospel, unvitalized by ever fresh contact with the perennial springs of faith and love. Those who handle the things of the altar have need of an altar in the heart on which the sacred fire never dies down.

The real mission of the pulpit has recently been very clearly defined by Rev. Oswald Dykes, D.D., Principal of Westminster College, Cambridge, as that of creating in the minds of the hearers "a sense of their religious needs, and a desire for their salvation, and to satisfy that need and desire by awakening in their souls faith in Christ;" in other words, the proclamation of the Gospel. Nothing here of pseudo-science, or Higher Criticism, but, instead, a simple statement of the conditions of death and life, of sin and salvation. It is such preaching that weary men and women want to-day to lift them out of darkness into light.

The meetings of the Baptist Missionary Society at Leicester last week were pervaded by a fine healthy optimism. The recent losses in China have struck the Society very heavily, several most valuable missionaries having been amongst the murdered. On this account there was naturally a deep feeling of sorrow in the hearts of all present. But from the opening prayer to the last speech of the whole series of meetings, one note was dominant throughout, viz., that so far from there being any retrenchment, the work of evangelization must be prosecuted with increased vigour. Each death, as Dr. Henderson said, is simply a call for more labourers. This is the true spirit in which the question must be faced, and once more it will happen, as it has happened many times before, that apparent defeat will only urge the servants of God to more heroic effort.

Amid the din of party warfare, the daily newspapers, some of which during the past few weeks have permitted their columns to be deluged with virulent and undiscriminating attacks upon Christian missions, passed the great missionary meeting of last Monday week (1st) at the City Temple with scarcely a mention. In spite of this unsympathetic attitude, it is already clear that all Protestant missionaries in China will come out of the fire of criticism unscathed, or rather with unfading laurels. For it is proved that they have been entirely guiltless of the charge of having forsaken their purely spiritual function, and of interference in political affairs. Another glorious fact is the splendid heroism and tenacity of the native Christians, who have in thousands preferred the cruellest of deaths to recanting from their faith. The age of martyrs is not dead, and out of this sea of blood will rise in time a new era of Christian privilege and progress in that troubled land.

Many strange reasons have been offered from time to time against Christian missions to the heathen, but one of the most curious is given by a correspondent of The Spectator in last week's issue. A leading article on the Chinese situation has evoked a correspondence upon the whole question of Missions. The Agnostics who contribute their opinions are, as usual, wide of the mark, but it is surprising to find a man who calls himself a Christian objecting to missionaries remaining in a foreign country for the purpose of evangelizing its people, on the ground that our Lord said: "Give not that which is holy unto dogs, nor cast ye your pearls before swine!" The Christian cause would be better served if persons so poorly instructed would cease to air their opinions in public. The world is only too ready to accept any reason, however ridiculous, against the prosecution of the work of God.

Even the Peace Congress in session in Paris last week passed a resolution condemning the missionaries as responsible for the present troubles in China, and denouncing their enterprise as "intolerant, aggressive, and awkward," and as being "a source of perpetual conflicts and creative of hatreds." We confess that we expected something more sane and honest from the Peace Congress than this petty and entirely unwarrantable resolution. From various sources—many of them by no means Christian—abundant testimony has come that the Protestant missionaries, at any rate, are in nowise responsible for the spirit of hatred which has prevailed in China.

Dr. Douglas Gray, an official of Her Majesty's Administration in British Central Africa, writes pessimistically, and almost hopelessly, in a contemporary in regard to the women of Central Africa, and, like many others, expresses dissatisfaction with the smallness of the mission work accomplished so far, "in proportion to the black population," of which, he says, only the very fringe of the teeming thousands has been touched. If, however, such writers would only study the history of Christianity we should have fewer of these fretful complaints. There was a whole world in darkness around the few men whom Jesus bade to go forth and preach the Gospel to every creature, and to-day, as the Bishop of Ripon recently stated, the nominal adherents of Christianity number close on 500,000,000.

The testimony given a few days ago by Mrs. Bishop, the Eastern traveller, in regard to what Christianity has done for woman, is of striking value coming from so authoritative a source, and might with advantage be borne in mind by those who are disposed to cavil at mission work. Nothing but the Gospel of Christ could have worked such social changes, and civilization without it would have been but a baseless fabric, failing and falling as did those of Greece and Rome. For it is through the individual that Christianity affects the national life. Even the working-man's wife may thus help to elevate the tone of the State, for, as Mrs. Bishop has said, that life with all its difficulties is the very one in which God expected character to be formed and perfected. Help undoubtedly for this task is found in the privilege of approaching God at any moment in a new and living way. Christ Himself was brought up in a working man's house.

Lord Wolseley will have the heartfelt thanks of every true patriot for his splendid letter sent to the daily papers last week, in which he entreats the British public to refrain from offering intoxicating liquor to the soldiers who will shortly be arriving from South Africa. His lordship says:

Many of them must soon resume the occupations and positions their employers have patriotically kept open for them; others will have to seek for new situations, and will require a helping hand in doing so. It is therefore most important that all should endeavour to preserve a good name for steadiness and sobriety before entering upon their civil work.

I trust that our greeting to the brave soldiers returning from this war may be something better than simply an incitement to excessive drinking, and that all will remember that whoever encourages them in this, far from being their friend, is really their worst enemy.

If other public and responsible men would use their great influence as Lord Wolseley has so happily and nobly used his in this important matter, we might soon see a check placed upon the vicious habits of which he complains, and which prevails in many other quarters besides the Army.

Sir Edward Fry, speaking as President of the Libraries Association, took occasion to refer to the great mass of publications of the present day as "idle literature," below which, however, there was a "horrible depth" of vile and corrupt productions "with a tendency to inflame the evil passions of men." Harmful as is the increase of desultory reading, with silly novels and sensational daily newspapers, it is as nothing compared with the effects of the other productions, and it is to be regretted that drastic measures cannot be taken to put a stop to their issue and circulation. Meanwhile, however, are not many of our public municipal libraries greatly to blame in the prominence they give to fiction, and that, in too many cases, of a low type? Why should the ratepayer be taxed to provide such unhealthy literature for the thoughtless and the idle?

It would appear that the sacrifices made by America in freeing Cuba from the depressing tyranny of Spain are not likely, for the present, to bear their legitimate fruit in the better government of that island. Since the termination of the war, the American Government has been trying to lay a broad foundation for a pure and honest administration of the country in the future. Recently they have been furnishing the filthy towns with a sanitary system, and cleansing the Civil Service of peculators and speculators. This has made them, unfortunately, very unpopular with the Cubans themselves; and at the recent elections the American party has been soundly defeated at the polls. The United States, having done its best, is practically pledged now to leave the island to its internal resources. It is a great pity that, having been freed from an age-long oppression, the Cubans should treat their friends with such ingratitude. It is but an added testimony to the shameful misgovernment of centuries.

Naples had its annual "miracle" a few days ago, the so-called "liquefaction" of the blood of St. Januarius having taken place in the presence of a great crowd. The process, it appears, was a little slower than usual, but the delay in the juggling of the priests apparently was not sufficiently long to alarm the credulous Neapolitans, who are, says a Romanist contemporary, rejoiced over the "happy event," as "a failure of the miracle would indicate the approach of dire calamities." It is almost sufficient to make one doubt whether we really have emerged from the dark ages when we find such trickery being seriously believed in.

A "Marial Congress" has just been held on a large scale at Lyons. By this is meant a vast gathering in honour of the Virgin Mary, who has been practically deified by French Catholics. The following is part of the manifesto by Canon Chatelus in opening the congress:—

There is a Marial Congress at the end of the nineteenth century because it has been the century of the manifestations and of the influence of Mary. God has spoken to us in this century by Mary. The Congress is in France, because France is the kingdom of Mary. As the Saviour chose Judæa for the scene of his teachings, so Mary has chosen France as her land of predilection. And, finally, Lyons has been chosen because it has a truly Marial soul.

At a later gathering, a speaker spoke of the Virgin as Christ's co-redemptrice, and as everywhere being Queen where Christ was King. These extravagances and others of like kind are symptomatic of the drift of Roman Catholicism. The Son of God, the only and sufficient Intercessor of mankind according to the New Testament, is now hidden behind his earthly mother, who in turn is approached on behalf of the suppliant by a local saint. This hierarchical perversion of the simple Gospel of Christ is a process which, once begun, may end anywhere. The Bible and not the "Church" is the guardian and conservator of the true faith.

Side by side with this lengthening series of intermediaries between the soul and God is to be noted a growing tendency to exalt the Pope's position and spiritual authority. In an Italian paper notice is called to a leaflet published by a branch of the "Catholic Youth" Society, which contains the following sentences:—

What pleases the Pope pleases God, and the Pope can will nothing which is not in harmony with the will of God.

The Pope really constitutes one moral person with Jesus the Incarnate Word.

Both possess the same identical authority; absolute in Christ, relative in the Pope.

The Pope is the tree of life which, like that wonderful plant of Eden, never loses its vitality.

The Pope is the living fountain from which flow the perennial streams that maintain the smile of perpetual spring in the garden of the Church.

At the see of Peter there ever watches an invisible power which cries to the great ones of the world, "I am the strength of God, let no one touch me."

The ancient Romans used to deify their emperors, a childish relic of prehistoric paganism that is now smiled at. Here, at the end of the nineteenth century, the so-called Vicar of Christ is made to assume similar divine honours. Is it any wonder that in Catholic countries we find a puerile credulity counterbalanced by a mocking agnosticism?

Which Gospel

"Thou shalt not let thy cattle gender with a diverse kind: thou shalt not sow thy field with two kinds of seed, lest the fruit of thy seed which thou hast sown and the fruit of thy vineyard be defiled. Thou shalt not plough with an ox and an ass together. Neither shall there come upon thee a garment of two kinds of stuff mingled together" (Lev. xix. 19; Deut. xxii. 9-11).

ONE of the marked features of the professing Church of the present day is the mixture forbidden by this fourfold prohibition in the law of Moses, and in varied forms by the Lord Jesus and his apostles. This remark is suggested by the fact that the Special Committee for the Simultaneous Mission organised by the National Council of the Evangelical Free Churches, to be held in February, contains not only men of various shades of Evangelical opinion, but at least one decidedly opposed to what are generally understood to be Evangelical views. Mr. Aked, of Liverpool—who calls himself a broad churchman—issued in 1892 a book of sermons and essays, a second edition of which appeared in 1894, and is still on sale. In one of these essays—"The Gospel for the Day"—he draws a contrast between "the old Evangelicalism" and "the New Evangel." "The New Evangel," he says:—

"Will present a tenderer and more lucid statement of Christian doctrine. It will find in the Atonement, not the effort of a half-despairing Christ to restrain the anger of an enraged Deity, but an outpouring of the life of God in the immortal utterance of Divine self-sacrifice, which never saw a woe that it did not seek to share. 'Justification by faith' will never be degraded into 'salvation by belief;' faith will be recognised as the answer of the loyal soul to God, the response of the kindly human heart to the pleadings of the Divine, the capacity of the mind, born again by the operations of the Divine Spirit, to hold on to the invisible and eternal. And salvation will be found to be, not an instantaneous act whereby the sinner is assured of deliverance from an impossible hell and enjoyment of a fantastic heaven, but a lifelong process, the continued elimination of ancestral vices, the suppression of brutal instincts, the development of the son of Adam into a full-grown man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ."

Is this "a more lucid statement of Christian doctrine" than was given by Peter or Paul, by Augustine or Calvin, by Wesley or Whitefield, by John Williams of Erromanga or Bishop Hannington of Uganda, by Spurgeon or Moody, or than is given to-day by thousands of preachers and teachers of "the old Evangelicalism"?

Mr. Aked is severe upon hymns of a type which certainly be used in the coming simultaneous mission. He says:

"This conception of substitution of a blood offering by which the fierce wrath of God may be appeased, has survived in dogmatic theology in the modified savagery of

Not all the blood of beasts,
On Jewish altars slain,
Could give the guilty conscience peace,
Or wash away the stain.

But Christ, the heavenly Lamb,
Takes all our sins away,
A sacrifice of nobler name,
And richer blood than they.*

"God does not forgive us our sins for Christ's sake. There is no intelligible sense whatever in which God's willingness or ability to forgive sin is procured by the death of Christ. There is no intelligible sense whatever in which God's 'wrath' is turned away, or Himself reconciled to us. He never was reconciled to man. He never needed reconciling to man. And any representation of the Atonement as a "sacrifice,' by means of which God is 'propitiated' or 'appeased,' comes to us solely as the persistent survival in dogmatic theology of the root idea of heathenism that the anger of the gods can be turned away by bribes and blood."

When a long way off, he saw the returning prodigal who had left the Father's home and wronged the Father's heart; but He could wait no long-drawn cry of penitence from his child, nor abide the coming of a daysman who should step between the two." —

* The italics in this line are Mr. Aked's; all the other italics in these extracts are ours.

We make no comment now upon these extracts, except that their purpose is to draw a lurid contrast between "the old Evangelicalism," as set forth by Luther and Spurgeon and the like, and "the New Evangel," as represented by Mr. Aked. These are in his view, and in ours, utterly and absolutely incompatible. The "old Evangelicalism," which he satirizes and denounces, is the Gospel of Peter and Paul, of Augustine and Calvin, of Luther and the Reformation, of Murray McCheyne and W. C. Burns, of Horatius and Andrew Bonar, of C. H. Spurgeon and D. L. Moody, of F. B. Meyer and W. Y. Fullerton, of Mildmay and Keswick. It is the Gospel preached by the foremost ministers and evangelists who have been appointed by the Mission Committee of the Free Church Council as their representative preachers in the coming Simultaneous Mission, of which committee Mr. Aked is a member. It is a question of foremost and vital importance whether the Gospel to be preached is according to "the old Evangelicalism" or "the New Evangel" of Mr. Aked; or whether they are both to be preached, simultaneously or alternately.

Mr. Archibald Brown had been appointed to the important town of Leicester; he had cordially accepted the appointment, and had been as cordially invited to it by the people there. But when he found that Mr. Aked was one of the Executive, he declined to serve under it. Other men, as deeply pledged and as closely wedded to "the old Evangelicalism" as Mr. Brown, look at the matter from another point of view, and hail the opportunity of preaching their Gospel, in the hope of saving some who have been deluded by "the New Evangel."

Either of these positions is intelligible and defensible; neither implies that its advocate is ashamed of the Gospel of Christ, which is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth. And the marching orders of all Christ's disciples are to preach it to every creature. But there are crises when the question must be asked, and answered, "What is the Gospel?" and when, at any cost, the Gospel of God must be maintained. And if some men are commissioned of God to preach "the old Evangelicalism" in the coming Mission, notwithstanding the constitution of its executive, others may be equally commanded of God to stand aloof, as a protest against the flat contradiction given to the old Gospel in the so-called "New Evangel."

Mr. Aked is an able and an eloquent man, who has the courage of his opinions, so far as their expression is concerned. On temperance and other subjects, from the human side, he bears sound and valuable testimony. Our remarks have only to do with his attitude toward the Gospel and its preachers. There is far more than enough to be set right in regard to the way in which the old Evangelicalism is held and taught, but the way to set this right is not by digging it up by the roots and substituting another gospel which is not another.

Since the above was written we are told that Mr. Aked has changed his views. None will be more thankful than we to learn that this is true. If so, one of its first evidences will be the withdrawal of a book whose teachings must have become hateful to him, overwhelming him with sorrow for the mischief it has done.

Whoso hath felt the Spirit of the Highest Cannot confound nor doubt Him, nor deny;
Yea, with one voice, O world, though thou deniest,
Stand thou on that side, for on this am I.

Mr. Sankey's Movements.

CONTINUING his meetings at York, Mr. Ira D. Sankey conducted a service in the Baptist Chapel, which will be remembered by many as the scene of the great "Moody and Sankey" meetings in 1873, during the pastorate of Rev. F. B. Meyer. Much interest was aroused, and the building proved far too small to accommodate the people desiring to hear. In the course of his address, Mr. Sankey made many references to the services of twenty-seven years since.

The next meeting was at Leeds, whence Rev. S. Chadwick telegraphed: "Crowded meeting at Oxford Place Chapel.

THOUSANDS, UNABLE TO GET IN,

sang hymns in the square. Magnificent service, Sankey in capital voice."

Later intelligence informs us that the building was filled an hour-and-a-half before the meeting was expected to commence. Meanwhile, Rev. John Jameson, the Congregational County Evangelist, addressed the assembly. At seven o'clock there were in Victoria Square, two thousand disappointed people, who found some consolation in vigorously singing selections from "Sacred Songs and Solos." It was then thought advisable that the meeting should commence. Rev. H. Bone having offered prayer, Mr. Sankey gave his "Service of Sacred Song and Story." Taking three or four hymns with which his name is associated, he forcibly sketched, with mingled pathos and humour, the circumstances under which the hymn or its tune originated, or was first used by himself, and then instructed the meeting as how to sing it, being produced. His racy description of the prayer meeting at which he first met Mr. Moody evoked keen interest. "In nine months," said Mr. Sankey, "Mr. Moody prayed me out of my business; that was why I joined him."

SOME IMPRESSIVE EFFECTS

On Thursday last, Mr. Sankey visited Middlesbrough. The large Temperance Hall was densely crowded, many scores of people having to stand. All were refreshed and touched by the veteran evangelist's simple and impressive language, and his earnest rendering of solos that are beloved in so many homes. Mr. Edward Dawson, J.P., presided, and the large choir was led by Mr. Sydney Smith.

In some prefatory words, Mr. J. H. Taylor said that it was an inspiration to find in that gathering more than 2,000 Middlesbrough people to whom the songs of Zion are a charm and an attraction.

Mr. Sankey, who was very cordially received, expressed, in the course of a speech that contained many touches both of humour and pathos, the delight he felt at having been able to come to Middlesbrough again after a period of twenty-seven years. He was glad to be spared through all these long years to labour and to come again to visit his friends in England. He realized that the spirit that pervaded the old country twenty years ago and more has not died out, and that the "Songs and Solos" so many of them had used have been a means of keeping alive the old

SPIRIT OF EVANGELIZATION.

He (Mr. Sankey) was glad to have had any hand in producing so useful a collection of hymns, not only for the Christian people of this land but for his own as well. He was glad that God has preserved him through storm and sunshine to sing to more people, he supposed, than any other man in the world. Proceeding, Mr. Sankey gave his "Service of Sacred Song and Story," which was very heartily received.

At Sunderland, on Sunday last, Mr. Sankey spoke and sang in the Victoria Hall, afternoon and evening. On both occasions the building was densely crowded. In the afternoon, Archdeacon Long presided, supported by many prominent local friends. In the course of an address, which was received with many tokens of sympathy, Mr. Sankey referred to the happy hours he had spent in Sunderland, and especially in that hall. Proceeding, Mr. Sankey sang "Saved by Grace," and delivered an address having special reference to his travels in Palestine. At night it is estimated that some thousands of people were unable to obtain admission. Mr. Sankey's racy style and vivid descriptive powers, made the service one of great interest, and long to be remembered for its inspiring character.

Mr. Sankey's engagements include the following: Thurs., Oct. 11, South Shields; Tues., Oct. 16, Edinburgh; Thurs., Oct. 18, Dundee; Sun., Oct. 21, Greenock (Town Hall, at 9.30 a.m. and 7 p.m.).

From Rev. F. B. Meyer

TO THE READERS OF "THE CHRISTIAN."

I WANT to pass on to many lonely and timid souls the lessons burnt in on my heart by the experiences of the last two or three days. Do not be afraid to go forth alone with God wherever He may lead you, even among strange people and to unknown lands, because there is no travelling-companion half so real and true as He is to those who are willing to commit to Him their entire guidance and keeping. Every stage of my journey to the little town from which I write—about an hour's journey south of Stockholm—has been so evidently under the Divine superintendence that one realizes how much one misses in always clinging to one's own habits and methods, or in living in too great a rush to be able to detect the whispers, touches, or arrangements of the Love of God.

Crossing from Queenborough to Flushing, I was booked to share the cabin with another gentleman. In the morning, as we were dressing, I was prompted to speak, and after a little discovered with whom I had much in common, and that he was travelling as far as Hamburg. So we had the pleasure and profit of a good deal of pleasant intercourse. As we drew near Hamburg, I was a little anxious to know how to reach Altona, but the gentleman who had come to meet my new-found friend, could speak English as well as his native German, and kindly gave me all the information I needed. Then, happily, in my address-book I had the name of Pastor Frank, to whose house I drove, taking him by surprise as he was just sitting down with his family to their evening meal. Thereupon, by telephone and messenger, a meeting was gathered, in which he interpreted for me. It was a comfort to have his help in again starting on my journeys, but again it seemed as though through that night God's angels were arranging my seat in the railway carriage, my berth for the six-hours' sea passage, and my company in the subsequent railway journey to Copenhagen, who were Swedish people just returning from London, and able to speak English, giving me very valuable help in crossing the city, and finding my steamer. Finally, when, after a most delicious voyage, in glorious weather, I landed in Sweden, through the kind forethought of Prince Bernadotte, I was greeted by a missionary returned from Mongolia, and the daughter of a well-known Christian gentleman, with whom I spent the remainder of the day, holding a meeting for at the Y.M.C.A. in the evening. But perhaps the most striking thing was that, after a night journey, when the train stopped at a way-side station for breakfast, as I alighted I met a Swedish lady whom I knew, and who was specially wanting to see me for advice and help, which, owing to a long train of circumstances connected with her family history, with which I was familiar, I was peculiarly able to give. She had no idea that I was travelling by that train, or that she would meet me this time.

HE WAS A TRUE CHRISTIAN,

These incidents may seem trivial enough, and perhaps hardly worth recording, but they are full of interest to me, as showing how minute and absolute God's care is—so tender, so thoughtful, so particular. The steps are ordered by Him. "Whoso is wise shall give heed to these things, and they shall consider the mercies of the Lord." Company is sweet, and yet I sometimes think that our constant habit in seeking for the presence of others blinds us to the near and real presence of our Lord.

Pastor Frank's work at Altona, Hamburg, is full of interest. He has a church in which he preaches regularly, but his principal interest is among the 40,000 Jews of these two great centres of population, as the representative of the Irish Presbyterian Missionary Board, of which Dr. Buick is the convener, and Rev. Henry Montgomery a leading and energetic member. This mission is a very important one. Its premises are among the most commanding in the city, and besides providing spacious rooms for meetings, accommodates some twenty-two Jewish young men, who are employed in manual labour, whilst being instructed in the principles of Christianity. In fifteen years, ninety have been baptized, but of course this only tabulates from the earnest, untiring labours of Pastor Frank and his devoted wife, formerly a member of Mr. Montgomery's church, together with their little band of fellow-helpers. I was specially interested in Sister Elizabeth, a nurse, to whom a wide door is opened amid many in the middle-classes, and who is being supported by the good pastor and his wife, in simple faith that God will supply all their needs. I could wish that sympathisers with this most interesting and successful work among the Lord's own kinsfolk would communicate with Dr. Buick, 12, May Street, Belfast, or Pastor Frank, 36, Heinrichs Strasse, Altona, Hamburg.

The Conference, which I have come to attend, is being held at Södertalje, a watering-place, about an hour's journey south of Stockholm. It is filled with fashionable people in the season, but at this time of the year almost deserted. Thus its hotels and lodging-houses, as at Keswick, furnish ample accommodation for the Christian people who come from all parts of Sweden, Norway, and Denmark. This is but the third Conference, yet already there are signs of the vast influence which it is destined to exert on the religious life of these countries. Many more people have applied for tickets than the spacious chapel could contain, but among those present are representatives of the most eager and devoted agencies of Christian thought and activity. The number of Lutheran ministers is comparatively small, but there are many ministers connected with movement, which originated in 1870, and already numbers about 100,000 adherents.

The popularity of the Conference might be traced in part to the deep interest taken in it by the Prince and Princess Bernadotte, who are held in the highest and warmest esteem throughout Sweden. The Prince is the President of the meetings, and, together with the Princess, mingles freely among the guests. But there is a deeper reason than this; for throughout the land there is a yearning desire for those deeper truths, which have been so great a blessing to tens of thousands of God's children during these last years.

There are two diets of meetings, the one from eleven till one, and the other from five till seven. The people are very still as they listen, and are susceptible of deep emotion. Many of them are evidently familiar with English, and catch the speaker's point before his accomplished translator, Dr. Fries, has rendered the sentence into Swedish. Many also speak to me with perfect mastery of our language. Here, also, as at Blankenburg, there are many of the high-born and titled, who are simple-hearted, humble believers in the Lord Jesus. It is very pleasant to meet with them. All around us are the glorious forests, that seem on fire with the glories of decay. Here gold, amber, crimson hues blend on the trees, and strew the ground with the most marvellous prodigality of glorious colour.

The Conversion of Children.

THE subject of child conversion was introduced recently at the Noon Prayer Meeting at Aldersgate Street by Mr. R. C. Morgan, who dwelt briefly on the lack of recognition and encouragement accorded to young seekers after Christ. In the course of his address, Mr. Morgan told of a little fellow who, in endeavouring to repeat the familiar words from Matt. xix. 14, said: "Suffer little children to come unto Me,—and—don't you old people keep them back."

The topic was further dealt with by Mr. Gipsy Smith, who pointed out that many Christian workers testify to having found salvation

IN THE DAYS OF YOUTH.

The speaker illustrated the earnestness of children by a story of a little girl who, during a mission conducted by Mr. Smith in Lancashire, evinced anxiety to find the Saviour. She desired to go to one of the meetings, with a view to entering the inquiry room. Her mother did not encourage her to attend, but gave her spiritual instruction at home. Her subsequent comment was, "I didn't go to the meeting, but I'm saved; God says so, and I believe it. She added, however, "But I'm sorry I didn't go into the inquiry room, mother, because Mr. Smith says people should confess Christ openly." Some months later, Mr. Smith held another mission in the same place, and the first to enter the inquiry room was the little girl in question, anxious to "confess Christ openly."

Mr. Smith went on to say that we need a deeper realization of the importance of evangelistic work among the young. We can scarcely begin too early, but we can easily postpone dealing with the question until it is too late, and the child has become a worldling. The late Mrs. Booth once said, "I believe it is possible to be ten minutes

AHEAD OF THE DEVIL."

Save an adult and you save a unit; save a child and you save a multiplication table. A large percentage of the great mass of non-church-goers, it should be remembered, have been at the most impressionable time of their lives under the influence of our Sunday-schools, but they have gone astray for want of being tethered to the church.

The speaker next dwelt on two things which militate against child conversion. The first was,—a godless home. A child returns from Sunday-school impressed by the teacher's words. His parents think more, perhaps, about their comfort than of their child's soul, and they bid him "fetch their dinner beer." A second hindrance is the Sunday-school teacher who is either unconverted, or so cold that he studies to be silent in the matter of decision for Christ.

A fruitful source of discouragement to young people is the comment,

"OH, IT'S ONLY A CHILD!"

In this connection Mr. Smith told of an evangelistic mission in the North of England, at the conclusion of which a critical member grumbled about the only visible fruit being "only a boy." Yet that lad-convert is known to-day as Rev. Thomas Cook, the esteemed Wesleyan evangelist. At another mission a similar incident occurred, and the people said, "It's only a gipsy boy." That "gipsy boy" is now known as Gipsy Smith.

Mr. Smith added a story—told with a human interest and pathetic touch that moved many to tears—of his own little son. The lad was convicted of his need of Christ under his father's preaching in a meeting at the Free Trade Hall, Manchester. Many pressed forward to seek the Saviour. The boy stood for a time anxious and weeping, but timid, "the tears running down his face like bubbles in a mountain spring;" but ultimately he ventured to walk down the aisle, and enter the inquiry room.

Nothing was said until the next morning, when, before daylight had broken, the little fellow crept into his father's room, taking with him a Bible which was a parental birthday gift. He had written, on the title-page, below the name: "Converted July 17, and the Lord added to the Church."

Concluding his appeal, Mr. Smith said that "Christ put heaven's richest diadem on the cradle of every homestead in the land when he said of the little ones, 'of such is the Kingdom of Heaven.'"

"Men Wondered At."

(Zech. iii. 8.)

Zion is Jehovah's dwelling;
Let her sons his praise be swelling;
Favoured race!
Every heart should beat with gladness;
Why should gloomy fear and sadness
Find a place?

Precious in God's sight—redeemèd,
Honourable, loved, esteemèd,
Fully blest;
Brightest raiment is their clothing,
God their glory, sin their loathing,
Christ their rest!

Peace enjoying, "such a blessing!"
Christ Himself their souls caressing,
On they go!
See! 'tis on his word they're resting,
For its value, after testing,
Well they know.

In the Master's love abiding,
Why should they fear Satan's chiding,
Rage or strength?
Bending, struggling, weeping, bleeding,
Crushed—the Saviour feels their pleading;
Saves at length!

Happy people! lasting pleasure
Is their portion and their treasure,
Hid from sight;
Yet to sons of faith revealèd,
Known to all whom God hath sealèd
By his might.

God's own dew of gracious unction,
Has displacèd sin's compunction—
Glad release!
In the grace of Jesus growing,
How delightful to be showing
His increase!

Solely on the Christ relying,
They, the kingdom—hell defying—
Bravely take!
God, their strength and full salvation,
Brings about this consummation,
For Christ's sake.

Then, upon his breast reclining,
They give thanks for long refining
Of the past;
Sweet their food—the Lamb is feeding,
And, since God Himself is leading,
All will last!

Yea, 'tis true: for whatsoever
God hath said shall "stand for ever!"
Nought more sure;
Father! by thy power all-glorious,
May we ever be victorious,
And endure.

Protestant Reformation Society.

CONTINUING the special efforts of the Society in Brighton, Rev. Dr. Wright has preached for Rev. G. Hewitt, at St. Luke's, Prestonville. In the afternoon there was a gathering of the young people's Bible classes, and the subject taken was "The Crisis in the Church of England." At the evening service, Dr. Wright preached on "The Confession and Forgiveness of Sins." Mr. Limbrick, the secretary, also lectured in connection with St. Luke's. The capacious schoolroom was filled with an enthusiastic audience. The subject dealt with was "St. Alban the Martyr, and the Church of His Time." The meeting was presided over by the vicar.

Rev. George Cullwick, district secretary for Manchester and the North of England, has carried on an important correspondence with Rev. G. A. Pugh, rector of Ashton-under-Lyne, in the Ashton Reporter. The matter under discussion was the distribution, by the rector, of a book entitled, "An Aid to Repentance," to females attending the Church, propounding questions of a very undesirable nature. The correspondence covered a number of letters, and ended by the rector retiring from the contest.

East London Wesleyans.

WESLEYAN Methodist Missions have done much for the religious life of the poorer districts of the metropolis, and their multiplication and progress are cheering signs. It is satisfactory to find that the pioneer mission, that in East London, continues to prosper in its many activities.

The anniversary services were held last week at Stepney, and included a large number of meetings. The army of workers, both men and women, which has gathered around Rev. Peter Thompson, manifested characteristic enthusiasm while the record of the year's work was unfolded.

At the noon gathering on Wednesday, Rev. Dr. Jenkins preached an inspiring sermon on Prov. x. 30, "He that winneth souls is wise." A luncheon followed at which Mr. Thompson sketched the financial position and spoke of the enormous difficulties which mission workers have to face in such a district.

The afternoon meeting was devoted to reports of the work. Dr. Richardson, who is in charge of the medical branch of the organization, gave a deeply interesting address, describing the methods adopted to alleviate the physical sufferings of the poor. In no work is the need of the better housing of the masses of the people more clearly seen. The infants are puny, weak, and whining; the children ill-developed, and the old men and women broken down with sticking to their work when they were over seventy, because there is no refuge open to them but the workhouse.

The evening was devoted to a public meeting, at which representatives of the various London Wesleyan missions spoke in support of the work. The year has been one of exceptional strain in the matter of expenditure for the renovation of the various buildings used by the Mission. Mr. Thompson's long devotion to the interests of the East End poor, and the glorious spiritual results of his labours, entitle him to hearty support.

Christian Evidence Work.

IT is to be regretted that much misunderstanding exists respecting the aims and purpose of the United Christian Evidence Brigade, for the advantages of the society to Bible students are beyond dispute. Its avowed object is to declare and defend Christianity as a divine revelation; and the third annual report bears ample testimony to successful efforts which have been put forth in this direction. Through the Press, by public petition and private endeavour, the constructive work has been sustained over an ever-widening sphere. The tactics of Secularists and other opposition forces have necessitated the continuation of the

and the outcome has far exceeded the most hopeful anticipations. A substantial increase of the work done in the evangelistic branch has been realized, and no fewer than 108 meetings have been held in mission halls alone. The speakers are all working men, freely giving their services for the extension of the kingdom of Christ.

Special facilities are provided for members, by which means they become possessors of a useful library, at a small cost; and the book agency also continues to prove an important feature of the educational work. The Brigade library comprises 800 well-selected volumes, the whole having been provided by private effort for the use of the members.

While there are crusades against sacred institutions and Christian belief, the work of the Society cannot be allowed to fail, for the young and uneducated need protection from the travesty of thoughts and morals of popular infidel expositions. The hon. secretary of the Brigade is Mr. W. R. Truscott, 25, Robeson Street, St. Paul's Road, Bow, E.

All Souls, Langham Place, W.—Rev. F. S. Webster, M.A., is to give a course of addresses on Friday mornings at 11.30 a.m., subject "Elisha, the Prophet of Vision." The fixtures are: October 12, "Called;" October 19, "Tested;" October 26, "Equipped."

The late Preb. Harry Jones.

THE late Prebendary Harry Jones, to whose decease we referred in our last issue, was the centre and the source of a good deal of valuable religious and social life, both in West and East London, during the past forty years. He was eminently a man of action, and he brought all his religion and theology to bear on the practical problems which confronted him in his various spheres of duty.

After filling several curacies, Mr. Jones was appointed to the incumbency of St. Luke's, Berwick Street, a very poor parish containing a population of 10,000 in a space only 300 yards square. Here and personal character drew around him a circle of steadfast and devoted workers. It was at St. Luke's that he first came prominently before the public by his noble conduct during an outbreak of cholera. Hurrying back from a Continental holiday, he soon traced the source of the mischief to a well-known pump. He worked indefatigably; insisted, amidst much abuse, in having poisoned clothes burnt, and formed a large committee, who poked into every drain, ashpit, and water-tank in the place. Mr.

HIS EARNEST MINISTRY

From Photograph by Messrs. Elliott & Fry, 55, Baker St., London, W.

Jones also insisted on the premises being cleaned, taps mended, tanks emptied, and a proper supply of water provided. Many religious and social institutions were inaugurated throughout the district from time to time during the incumbency.

Mr. Jones next became rector of St. George's-in-the-East, where his strong and needy were again evidenced, and where his preaching was attended by much blessing. Among other undertakings in the interest of the vast population of the East End of London, Mr. Jones was a prime mover in the establishment of Shadwell Fish Market, and in inducing the Great Eastern Railway to confer the boon, valuable alike to growers and the East End poor, of vegetables and fruit being brought direct from the country to London, without the interposition of the middleman. Mr. Jones was one of the founders of the East London Church Fund; he bought a disused place of worship, in order to prevent it from being converted into a music hall; he also established a crèche, and began a system of nursing, which has developed into the "East London Society."

After ten years' work at St. George's, he accepted the living of Barton, in Suffolk, but came back as vicar of St. Peter's, Great Windmill Street, a church built by the Earl of Derby for the poor of St. James's, Piccadilly, and for a time he combined with it the ministry of the proprietary chapel of St. Philip, Regent Street. He soon, however, relinquished the first, and having had malarial fever, caught in some of his Eastern journeys, he was on several occasions seriously ill. In 1897, the Bishop of London gave him the rectory of St. Vedast, Foster Lane, where he set to work with something of his old vigour. A man of great common sense, unceasing energy, and a powerful will, Prebendary Jones has left a deep upon his day and generation. The spirit of his work made itself felt in his straightforward and unconventional preaching. His hearers felt that here was a leader full of manly energy and sympathy, who, without attempting to deal with the more perplexing problems of theology, was lifting all the life around him by the force of Christian faith and moral energy. Mr. Jones was born in 1823, and passed away on Sunday, October 1, at his residence in Suffolk.

North London Convention.

THE Convention meetings were continued on Tuesday of last week, Mr. Stanley P. Smith being the speaker in the afternoon. The purpose of his address was to show that the reasons of the death of Christ were two-fold. As the hymn says:

> He died that we might be forgiven,
> He died to make us good.

And this two-fold design and end is shown in the Scripture whenever the word "that"—"in order that"—occurs in connection with the death of Christ.

On Wednesday, Rev. S. A. Selwyn spoke at the first session on Hosea vi. 1-4: "Spiritual Inconstancy." He said that this is a common disease among Christians. Alas! how many have zeal only as the "morning cloud" and "early dew!" How many are miserable with this sickness, and yet unwilling to own it, tired of asking to be healed? Is there a remedy? Yes, and it is certain, speedy, and complete. But we must note chap. v. 15: "Till they acknowledge their offence and seek my face." Perhaps is that there is unacknowledged guilt. There is nothing to be afraid of in a consecrated life. In v. 3 we have a picture of refreshing. What joyfulness and fruitfulness may be ours!

At the evening session, Mr. Selwyn was again the speaker. His subject was "A cake not turned" (Hosea vii. 8). Israel had been a failure. "The Lord hath a controversy with the inhabitants of the land, because there is no truth, nor mercy, nor knowledge of God;" and again, "Because thou hast rejected knowledge, I will also reject thee." Israel is a type of the Christian Church to-day (see 1 Cor. x.), "A cake not turned." We cannot, thank God, apply it to the whole Church, but too often there is not much truth, not much knowledge, because it is rejected. The unturned cake is a picture of want of thoroughness in Christian life and service.

"My people doth not consider." There is want of thought, other things filling the mind. We know that ordinary faculties are liable to and spiritual gifts, unused, gradually disappear. Another cause is being (v. 8) "mixed . . . among the people." The Church in the world is right; the world in the Church is wrong. It should be God's people for God's work; no going down into Egypt to help God's work forward. Is there a remedy? Yes (ch. iii. 5), "Return and seek the Lord." Then (ch. xiv. 4, 5) "I will heal . . . I will love them freely . . . I will be as the dew." How shall we be healed? (Isa. xxxii. 3, 4) "Dim eyes shall see, deaf ears shall hear, hasty—'rash'—hearts shall be given wisdom, and tied tongues shall be loosed,"

Other Lands.

Chinese Horrors.

By Dr. A. G. PARROTT, Shanghai.

WHAT a sudden change has come over the whole situation here! Every missionary in the interior has been driven away or compelled to go; many of them have been massacred, decapitated as criminals, burnt alive, and beaten to death by furious mobs, let loose upon them by official permission. Lao-ho-Kou remained most friendly to us, and the merchants, gentry, and officials urged us not to go. They said that whatever might happen, the people would never hurt us. They too highly valued our medical work. The Romanists were much hated, and five of their places, not far from us, had been rioted before we left.

The British Government sent a most urgent telegram, and we felt bound to go immediately. We were told not even to stay to pack up, but leave everything just as it stood in charge of the officials.

WHAT WILL HAPPEN

to the little church, we do not know. The friendly mandarin, at my suggestion, has employed some of them as soldiers and put them in charge of our premises. They will look after the place better than anybody else, he said. We came down the Han under escort, and had no serious trouble on the way, I am happy to say. How different has been the experience of all coming from Ho-nan! We were only ten miles from the border, and it is from that quarter that Lao-ho-Kou has its greatest fears.

At Hankow the C.I.M. kindly took us in; but ladies had been ordered from all the river ports, and we came on to Shanghai, found an empty house, and here we are sleeping on the floor—till something better can be obtained. Lodgings are far beyond us. This is a cheap house at £12 a month. The Lord is equal to this sudden change which has come upon us.

THE DISTRESS OF THE POOR CHRISTIANS

all over the land is extreme. Hundreds have been murdered, and thousands of homes plundered. Money is what these wretched Boxers want. How things are going to turn out, no one can tell.

We found Mr. Alex. Grant here. He is in great distress of mind about his daughter, Mrs. Lovett. We fear she has perished with all the Tai-yüan-fu missionaries in North Shansi. Poor Pigott and all his party are also among the missing. The Kiang-si friends (Blandford and party) are all in Shanghai. Some are returning home. Mr. and Mrs. Pownall left by German mail a few days ago; the Kinghams leave to-night. Many others cannot go home if they wish to. We are not likely to be allowed to go back to our stations this year.

I find there are 40,000 Cantonese in Shanghai, but no missionary work is done among them. Here seems to be an open door, and I am thinking of taking up the study of Cantonese with a view of trying to do something for them. It is very difficult to bring one's mind to writing. The terrible stories we are hearing every day of the sufferings of poor fleeing to the coast, tend to unnerve one completely. Yesterday a brother-doctor came round to see me, with news of the fearful sufferings of Mr. and Mrs. Sanders and their party, and the scanty tidings they brought from Tai-yüan (Shansi), but he completely broke down and sobbed like a child in telling me.

Poor things; they were stripped of every garment except a pair of cotton pants each. Men, women, and children alike—hats and shoes, everything, taken; no money, no food; and thus they were driven by mobs of demons from village to village. For four days they had no food but what they could find lying in the road. Two children died of starvation (the Sanders'); two sisters, Rice and Huston, sank down from exhaustion, and said, "We can die, but to walk another step we cannot." The mob drove on the others, and then went back and beat these two poor women to death. That is, one was killed; Alice Huston was severely wounded, and died before they could reach Hankow.

The next to fall was Mrs. E. J. Cooper. She had suffered so badly from wounds and want of food that DEATH CAME TO HER HAPPY RELIEF.

Savages could not have treated them half so badly. In Honan the Governor, by special request from our friendly Viceroy of Hupeh, had given orders that they should be safely conducted through his province. They were thus handed as criminals from prison to prison, and given bad bread and water only!

We fear that fifty have been massacred in the north of Shansi. It is known that all in Paoting-fu, in Chih-li, have perished. We have it from eye-witnesses (native). Shanghai is full of refugee missionaries. More than 1,000 have gone to Japan, but I am told living is just as costly there. The C.I.M. alone has 300 or more in Shanghai. It is very difficult to find houses for all. Four thousand Indian troops are landing in Shanghai. Their dark skins and splendid build strike terror into some of the miserable little opium-smoking Celestials.

Rev. J. SADLER, L.M.S., Amoy, a missionary of more than thirty years' standing, says, in an appeal recently issued:—"The Chinese, when understood, are loved by every missionary, and it is more and more seen that they present excellent material to work upon. Through the good feeling existing between missionaries and these able native friends, the missionary has multiplied himself a hundredfold, and so churches have sprung up in many directions, these being self-supporting, self-governing, and self-propagating.

What now is the appeal of the China missionary to friends of missions at home? His grievance is this, that feelings of hatred and enmity towards him, which are really only felt by a limited class of Chinese, who do not represent the best men of China, are encouraged by many of our own countrymen; and this is a matter which calls for the most serious consideration. Who are those who against missionaries in China? I have understood that the spirit often shown, at least in the past, in the Saturday Review, of bitter sneering criticism, has threatened the peace even between the United States and England. But between England and America there are many bonds which it would be difficult to break. It is a much more mischievous thing when some of the highest of our public men use this same sneering language with regard to missions in China.

"When they tell the world that missionaries are not popular at the Foreign Office the news is at once telegraphed to China; the Chinese have bureaux of information for diffusing such intelligence as the authorities choose to spread, and the careless sneers of Lord Salisbury become an encouragement for the massacre of missionaries and converts. Our officials at home are appointed and maintained by the country to secure the interests of their countrymen without distinction. Do they do it? Is it not often the case that fair play is secured for and, whether intending it or not, the interests of missionaries are set aside? We simply want our natural rights to live and let live; and that our work and influence may not be undermined by those whose fellow-subjects we are. Otherwise, it comes to pass that the officials who should be our guardians, become our worst foes by letting the Chinese suppose that we have no standing ground, and may be massacred at will.

"The maintenance of the missionary's status, as of other Westerners in China, is secured by treaty, without which we could not breathe there. Even in spite of the treaty, see how the slaughter of Christian workers has been effected. How much worse would it be if there were no law to appeal to? This question is the more important because the whole Chinese system moves on considerations of status and prestige."

THE CHINA INLAND MISSION.

Mr. Walter B. Sloan, secretary of the China Inland Mission, writes to us:—"In view of the large number of our missionaries who are now at Shanghai, and all that they have recently passed through, it has been decided that I should visit China this winter. I hope to join the North German Lloyd steamer, Prinz Heinrich, at Genoa, on the 30th inst.

"May I ask the sympathy and prayers of your readers that in going forth at this time, I may be guided and helped of God, and that my visit to China may be used of the Lord to bring some refreshment and blessing to his dear servants in that great land, who are in the midst of so much trial, suffering, and sorrow."

Unrest in the States.

By Rev. GEO. C. NEEDHAM.

OUR continued and intense summer heat has ended. There was great suffering, with the thermometer ranging about 100deg. Fahr., and many deaths. Not a few committed suicide. Electrical storms have been unusually frequent, entailing great loss of life and property. Cyclones swept over vast areas with devastating results.

The greatest catastrophe occurred recently, when Southern Texas was visited by a furious tornado. Galveston city bore its brunt. The maddened waters of the gulf leaped over streets and houses, meeting the upheaved waters of the bay, and between them submerging the flat, sand island on which the city was built. Out of a population of 50,000, more than 10,000 perished. Other thousands are homeless and helpless, while some are crazed through this sudden and deadly visitation. For twenty-four hours the city was plunged in darkness. Electric plants and gas houses were demolished. The water reservoir was destroyed. The railway bridge connecting the city with the mainland was torn from its place, while an express passenger train, coming towards the smitten city, was dashed from its iron bed, leaving eighty of its passengers mutilated corpses. The wreckage of wharves, ships, and warehouses is indescribable. The smaller towns along the coast suffered proportionately, some of them with their wooden houses were broken and scattered many miles over the prairie.

As soon as possible relief trains were hastened from several cities, five from Philadelphia, laden with food, clothing, medicine, and an army of volunteer doctors, nurses, and willing helpers.

MANY HEARTBREAKING SCENES

came to view. Survivors were found many miles away, bleeding and naked. The most difficult task was the disposal of the dead, which, on account of the great heat, had to receive immediate attention. Also, care for the living needed prompt action. Improvised hospitals were soon giving shelter to hundreds. The Red Cross Society was at work as speedily as possible, and in a few days food had arrived in abundance.

Immediately after the storm, hundreds of corpses were taken to sea for burial, but the waters brought them again to shore. Cremation had to be resorted to, in order to save the living from threatened plague. At the present writing, organized help is doing all that can be accomplished, but business is prostrated, banks are in ruins, while churches shared in the dread catastrophe. One congregation is minus forty members, whose unidentified bodies have been consumed to ashes.

God's voice has been uttering solemn warnings in our ears; his providence is stirring the nation. Oh, that the fatal sleep of indifference to eternal realities may be broken!

Now, in the North, a strike of gigantic proportions threatens a famine of coal. One hundred and thirty thousand miners have left work. The military are called out, and a crisis is at hand. We fear bloodshed, while there is a faint hope that arbitration will succeed.

Political campaigners are stirring up party strife in connection with the presidential election. The most important issues since the days of Lincoln are to the front. Partisanship is intense. A band of temperance women have formed "an endless prayer chain" for the defeat of McKinley on account of his non-interference with the army "canteen." A change of party would be of no advantage in this particular. Meantime, preachers rave against the women, and openly accuse them of "blasphemy," and mock at their "intemperate temperance." But, saddest of all, general revivals are unknown; spirituality is at low ebb, and materialistic infidelity increases. The predicted revival of last year has not come, and the hearts of the godly faint.

THE CHURCH SLUMBERS;

However, God is working out his own purposes. He has witnesses and confessors. The faithful few are at work. There are hidden ones in prayer, who look beyond political strife and commercial agitation, and their faith will win.

The tent work in Philadelphia has closed. Different parts of the city heard the Word. The Presbyterian Evangelistic Committee gave themselves earnestly to the work. For fourteen weeks, through the scorching heat, the Needham Union Tent gathered under its folds large congregations. Rev. Thomas Needham was our faithful and efficient co-worker. We begin a special afternoon Business Men's Meeting to-day, hoping to reach many at the close of office hours who will carry the fire of zeal into their suburban towns.

The great International Railroad Y.M.C.A. Convention will meet in a few weeks. We expect a thousand delegates, including representatives from many lands. Of this more later on.

Narberth, Pa., U.S.A.

The Indian Famine.

A SUGGESTION.

AN esteemed correspondent writes:—"Might not each church throughout the country adopt one or two children, and have them educated in one of the orphanages in India? It costs little to educate a child there—only about £4 per annum. The money might be collected quarterly. Perhaps the children of the congregation might do the collecting, and thus take a special interest in the famine children. If a photo of the adopted little ones were sent home the interest would be kept alive. I proposed this plan, through the minister, at a children's service, and it was heartily taken up."

NOTES FROM WORKERS.

In a brief note, Pundita Ramabai writes from Mukti, Kedgaon:—"Just a few lines to thank your readers for their generous gifts towards the Lord's work here. I am glad to tell you that the Lord has given me 1,700 girls by this time. Please pray for me and the work."

Mrs. E. H. Lawson, of Aligarh, writes:—"Thanks very much for the help of your readers. We have 358 widows, 45 babies, 450 boys, and nearly 300 girls. Cholera is bad in Aligarh. Famine widows and children continue to come, but not in such numbers as before. The rains have been peculiar, and there may be famine in some parts again."

In a letter from Mussoorie, N.W.P., Rev. Thomas Evans writes:—"The great drawback now is the want of cattle to plough the land. Want of fodder has swept away the oxen in thousands. The Viceroy has been very considerate, and I have taken the liberty to call his attention to this sad lack. The self-denial of many of the Lord's servants during the famine is beyond all praise, and our Government has learned to appreciate the value of missionary devotion in the time of great need."

Mr. Watson Grace, of the Society of Friends, quotes from letters received from workers. At Sihore, in the Native State of Bhopal, where the State relief measures were entirely inadequate, the relief works, under the care of Mr. Alfred Taylor, were employing at one time over 11,000 persons. Mr. Taylor, in referring to the class who are incapable of doing work, says: "It is an awful sight to see them, and one that makes the strongest man feel a 'lump in his throat.' Imagine a drunken man being supported on both sides, and brought in in a perfectly helpless state. But the famine man will be a 'living skeleton,' probably unable to utter more than a few words. If very far gone, he will be beyond hunger—he may beckon for water, but he generally wants to LIE DOWN AND DIE.

Every morning and through the day there are some of these. Then the famine-stricken are continually coming in; for these there is some food of a light nature waiting ready cooked. They are nearly desperate with hunger; were they Europeans they would hardly wait patiently for the food promised, but would probably fight for it. As it is, they will crouch on the ground and implore you to give them the needful food. It has to be given out sparingly, and they have to be watched, or they will devour it too quickly, and as too often happens, death quickly results."

Rev. A. Outram (C.M.S.) describes the work in the Kherwara district:—"The people seem more grateful for the seed grain than for anything else, and the crops are splendid so far. With each lot of seed grain we give a little eating grain to keep the men from eating the precious seed grain, and this had the desired effect. In three weeks my wife and I made 20,000 separate distributions (10,000 of seed and 10,000 of eating grain), each farmer getting three distributions of both seed and eating grain, i.e., one each once a week. Had we given all at once, half would have been eaten, so we gave according as the fields were prepared. Clothes and blankets were also distributed." Both Mr. and Mrs. Outram have suffered severely from illness, and the strain of the work. They held the fort at Kherwara amid many difficulties.

Rev. DENNIS OSBORNE'S MOVEMENTS.

Rev. Dennis Osborne is continuing his campaign in the interest of the famine stricken of India. On Sunday next he is to speak at Woolwich in the morning at the Presbyterian Church (Rev. J. More), in the afternoon at the Polytechnic, and in the evening at (Dr. McKilliam's) Alexandra Hall, Blackheath. Mr. Osborne's recent addresses at Hare Court Chapel, Canonbury, and at the Mildmay Conference Hall, awakened deep interest in his mission of mercy.

French Dockers' Strike.

WRITING from the Sailors' Rest, Dunkerque, Mrs. Stewart Mackenzie says: "During the recent strike of dock labourers in Dunkerque, it was sad to see the men by hundreds marching through the streets day after day, calm and quiet, but with a look of iron determination on their faces to win their cause. The friends of temperance will be glad to know that three great reforms have been effected, viz., the workmen are no longer to be paid in a public-house; also, selling drink from hand-carts to the crews of vessels discharging in the docks, has been abolished; and last, but not least, the men have refused Sunday labour. As these were the demands of the men themselves, we thank God for this step forward on the part of the French workman.

"The last ten days of the strike, a detachment of cavalry was sent from Lille to patrol the streets day and night; also the bridges leading to the docks were guarded, and no one was allowed to pass without a permit by the Officer of the Port. The opportunity was too good to be lost; so, filling our bags with copies of the Gospels and other booklets in French, we started off to distribute them among the French soldiers.

"Arriving at the bridge, we had no permit to show the sentries, who, with fixed bayonets, barred our further way; but on presenting them with copies of our booklets, they kindly let us pass. Thus the Gospel opens the way! We had hardly reached the other side when we were completely surrounded by French soldiers. Their keen sunburnt faces were lit up with a smile, while eager hands were stretched out on all sides to receive the contents of our bags, which were quickly emptied. Officers and men alike accepted the books and papers with eagerness and thanks.

"We went again the following day and met just such another eager crowd, the guard having been changed. Thus the seed of the Word, has been sown broad-cast, to be carried far and wide by these French soldiers. Although our first care is for the British sailor in this port, we dare not refuse the Word of life to the perishing multitudes at our doors. Our French bookshelf is now practically empty. If friends in England will kindly help to replenish, we shall be glad to receive, in prepaid parcels, Gospel portions, illustrated tracts, &c., in French only. We would also remind our friends that this mission is supported entirely by voluntary contributions."

New Recruits.

AT Mr. Moody's funeral, I said to John Wanamaker: "You and I must live for God, for we do not know how short the time is." Within nine years, since Charles H. Spurgeon died, twenty of my most intimate friends have been called up higher. There wasn't a man of them that was older than I, and this makes me feel very solemn, not knowing but that each address may be my last, but I feel deeply that it is perfectly safe to trust one's self to God.

God has a plan for your life. Find out what that plan is; fall into your own place in that plan; don't cross it in the slightest particular, and let it be the one great ambition of your life to work out in your daily conduct whatever God has planned for you. When the great span across the East River was finished, Roebling, the builder, was brought down, on his sick-bed, from Trenton, to see the bridge—brought in a canal-boat and anchored in front of the great span. There, lying on his pillows, with the drafts of the bridge on each side of him, he looked down at them, and then up at the span, and said, "It is like the plan!" May you and I come to our dying hour and look up to God, and say, "My life is like the plan; I have finished the work which Thou gavest me to do; I have kept the faith; I have finished my course; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day."

I was riding in the train, thinking about my dear old friend Moody, that I had known for thirty years, and, thinking about his dying utterances, they took this shape in my mind:—

I have been within the gates,
Seen the glory that awaits.
Pilgrims on the shining way,
Ask me not on earth to stay.
Earth's receding, Heaven's opening,
God is calling, let me go.

I have seen the forms we love,
In the Father's house above,
And they beckon me to come;
There, not here, is my true home.
Earth's receding, Heaven's opening,
God is calling, let me go.

I have sought no wealth to hoard,
But to serve my loving Lord,
All my legacy to you,
All I leave you—work to do.
Earth's receding, Heaven's opening,
God is calling, let me go.

There's no valley, what is this?
Is this dying? No, 'tis bliss.
All is glory, there's no gloom,
Life eternal, not the tomb.
Earth's receding, Heaven's opening,
God is calling, let me go.

Miss Mason's House of Rest.—The autumn bi-monthly meetings were inaugurated at Miss Mason's House of Rest on Friday last. The Pillar Room has undergone renovation, and the installation of the electric light adds greatly to the comfort and attraction of the surroundings. The expenses have been met by part of the birthday gift presented to Miss Mason on the initiative of Miss Agnes Weston. The conditions of the meetings are the same. Praise and prayer were harmonious notes; and those present were stimulated by characteristic addresses from Rev. John Wilkinson, of Mildmay, and Colonel Oldham. Miss Mason is in excellent health.

A Missionary Farewell.

EXETER HALL was crowded on Tuesday evening of last week at the dismissal meeting of the Church Missionary Society.

Prominent on the platform were the outgoing missionaries, who are about to proceed to their spheres of labour in Africa, Palestine, Persia, India, Ceylon, and Japan. Election excitement caused no diminution in the attendance of prominent friends and supporters, who rallied in large numbers.

Sir JOHN KENNAWAY, who presided, said, in addressing the missionaries, that the eyes of the world are upon missions and missionaries at the present time. Without discussing any of the questions which had been raised, he reminded his hearers of the Master's command, "Giving no offence," casting no needless aspersions on the religions of others while doing their utmost to make known their own. Alluding to the chairman went on to say that, as regards the C.M.S., they have suffered no loss in connection with the recent outbreak; but others have fallen victims, and the Society, deeply sympathizing with those who have sustained losses, thanks God for the steadfastness of the native converts under persecution, under torture, and under death. They had faith to believe that out of all that trouble God would bring fruit to his glory, and that the blood of the martyrs would be the seed of the Church. The Bible is penetrating into all parts of China. The seed has fallen in many cases on fruitful soil, and a real and substantial harvest is being reaped.

Glancing briefly next at the position in India, prayer was asked for those who are bearing the burden of famine. As to Africa, hearts have been fired by the accounts received of the operations of Bishop Tugwell, and the visit of the Bishop and his party to the King of Kano. The prospects there are of a cheering character.

Finally, Sir John asked his hearers to remember the heavy burden of anxiety upon them in regard to the finances of the Society. He asked the audience to view the solemn position in which they stood in these last months of the closing century. It has been a and we rejoice to think of all the blessings that have been showered upon England—of the advances that have been made, the doors that have been opened, and the barriers broken down. It is a most solemn time, calling us to consider our ways, and to work with the new opportunities and possibilities opening before us as we have never worked, or prayed, or striven before.

Rev. H. E. Fox, hon. secretary, said that the number of missionaries going out was 139. Of these, eighty-seven are returning, and fifty-two are new to the field. As compared with last year, there is a considerable reduction in the figures, and this is to some extent accounted for by the fact that the Society has retained at home a considerable number of missionaries who would in the ordinary course have gone to China. Mr. Fox went on to read the general instructions. The audience listened with deep interest to the exhortations from the committee to the workers; and the remarks regarding the close adherence of the Society to the Protestant and Evangelical principles of the Church of England received special recognition.

The missionary speakers followed. Rev. C. T. WILSON, who is returning to Palestine, voiced the need for work among Mohammedans, who, the audience was reminded, represent one-tenth of all the non-Christian people of the world. Rev. J. M. CHALLIS, returning to the North-West Provinces of India, said that the help given for the Indian famine had been a tremendous factor in bringing the people nearer to Christ. Dr. DUNCAN MAIN, returning to China, said, in impressive terms, that they must be ready to lay down their lives for the Master's sake, and they must love as He loved.

Of the new missionaries, Rev. HECTOR MCNEILE, who has resigned the living of Bredbury, near Stockport, for work in Western India, was the first to speak. He uttered a wholesome word of caution to the missionary brethren against thinking too much of the sacrifices they are making. They must never forget the apostolic view:

"WE ARE DEBTORS."

Rev. G. T. MANLEY spoke of the movement amongst undergraduates at Cambridge. A little band had resolved to study missions systematically, with the result that six from his own College had definitely offered for missionary work. Rev. S. HEASLETT and Mr. G. C. VYSE also gave telling addresses.

The final word was given by Rev. H. WOFFINDIN, vicar of Holy Trinity, Tulse Hill, who spoke of the motive—"the love of Christ;" and the power, "sent forth by the Holy Ghost"—of true missionary work. He called for prayer that the Spirit of God might be poured out upon them, and then they would hear the Divine voice, "Speak unto the C.M.S., that it go forward."

CHURCH OF ENGLAND ZENANA MISSION.

A farewell meeting of a number of lady missionaries who are proceeding to the East, in connection with the Church of England Zenana Missionary Society, was held on Thursday last at Queen's Hall.

Of those who formed the outgoing party, nine are to work in North India, eleven in the Punjab and Sindh Mission, four in South India, one in Ceylon, and five in China. Owing to the unsettled state of the country, however, the sailing of the Chinese party has been indefinitely postponed.

Chancellor P. V. SMITH, speaking from the chair, said that the events of the past few months have emphasized very strongly the absolute necessity for missionary work. He expressed the hope that with God's help the work would be taken up with renewed enthusiasm and greater energy.

Rev. G. TONGE, Clerical Secretary, read in detail the instructions to the ladies, and as the missionary's name was called, each lady stood up in order that the audience might recognise those to whom they were saying good-bye. The valedictory address was given by the BISHOP OF LUCKNOW, who said he spoke as an old missionary, and as one who took the deepest interest in the work of the Society.

Rome and American Politics.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THE Roman Catholic dignitaries in the United States are evidently of opinion that the time has come to take a forward step towards the conquest of the United States for the Pope; and as a preliminary to this the delegates of the Catholic Young Men's National Union, in a great meeting in Brooklyn on Wednesday afternoon, September 26, decided to form a "federation" of all the great Church societies in the country, for the purpose of combined political action. The unrebuked definition of the Democratic party as that of Rum, Rome, and Rebellion, once cost Mr. Blaine the nomination for the Presidency, but the proceedings of Wednesday indicate that the Church proposes to make war on the Republican party in the approaching election.

An idea of some of the ostensible grievances of these subjects of a foreign prince may be gathered from this resolution, which was to be sent to the President:—

Whereas at least 50 per cent. of the soldiers and sailors who took part in the Spanish-American War were members of the Roman Catholic Church, and the same percentage of men now in the military and naval service of the United States are members of this Church; and,

Whereas it is evident that in order that their spiritual needs may be properly ministrated, there should be chaplains proportionate to the number of men serving in the army and navy; and,

Whereas the rosters of the army and navy show that an inadequate number of Roman Catholic chaplains are appointed;

Therefore, be it resolved, That the Catholic Young Men's Union, in convention assembled, strongly urges upon the present administration the advisability of further appointments of Roman Catholic priests as chaplains.

A resolution referring to the Philippines ran:

Whereas the offices of trust, which vitally affect Catholic interests in the Philippines, have been filled by a discriminating policy, be it resolved that we deprecate this injustice.

Nor is this confederacy, organized against the Republic, to be despised by thoughtful persons, although there is abundant reason to doubt whether the "people," as a whole, will realize anything of the menace that it really constitutes. Among the largest Catholic organizations to be embraced in the proposed federation are: The Knights of Columbus, The Knights of St. John, The Catholic Benevolent Legion, The Ancient Order of Hibernians, The Irish Catholic Benevolent Union, The Irish and German Societies of America, The Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America, and The Catholic Knights of America. And besides these there are scores of less prominent organizations, the members of all presumably being voters.

In a further effort to place the Pope above the President, the members of the Union decided to accept the call of the Bishop of Trenton (New Jersey) to attend a mass meeting in the Fifth Avenue Hotel in this city on Thanksgiving Day (the last Thursday in November). This is undoubtedly the most important step ever taken by the Roman Catholics as a body, and as all the members of these societies, and others like them, are either voters already or soon will be, it constitutes a real menace to the nation.

Nor is the scheme a new one by any means. In November, 1889, on the occasion of the hundredth anniversary of the establishment of the Roman Catholic hierarchy in this country, Archbishop Ireland, amid the tumultuous applause of about 5,000 laymen and 1,000 priests, bishops, and other ecclesiastics, boldly sounded the trumpet call for a crusade, having for its object the placing of this Republic under the heel of the Pope. He used these words:—

We must make America Catholic! As we love our church it suffices to mention the work, and our cry shall be "God wills it!" and our hearts shall leap towards it with Crusader enthusiasm. Why should we fear or hesitate? We number ten millions—a powerful army if the forces be well marshalled, and their latent strength be brought into action. Catholics in America are loyal to their Church and devoted to her leaders. Their labours and their victories in the first century of their history show what they are capable of in the coming century, when they are conscious of their power and are under complete hierarchical organization.

So far as New York is concerned, they may be said to be in possession, and there are probably very few of the large cities over which they do not exercise control, so that the proposed federation has a very solid foundation of power and influence, from which to seize advantages in both State and National legislation. Rome can safely count everywhere upon the support of all the evil elements associated with the word "rum" in this country; and when "Rome" and "rum" combine—quite logically—to carry on "rebellion," in the interests of the Vatican, against the forces of Protestant light, liberty, and law, the best interests of the nation are in serious jeopardy.

ROGER MARTIN.

Rev. W. H. Griffith Thomas, M.A.,

INCUMBENT OF PORTMAN CHAPEL, W.

GRACE, Grit, and Gumption! These are said to be the indispensable characteristics of a man who becomes a leader of his fellows. Even the world looks for some tokens of a divine mission in those who come forward as its spiritual leaders, and it is not too much to say that perseverance and sanctified common sense were never more in demand than they are to-day. It is to these that we are to trace the success, in many ways remarkable success, of the life of the subject of this sketch.

Mr. Thomas, born in 1861, was truly converted to God at the age of seventeen, and has thus known his grace for more than twenty years. His father dying a short time before Mr. Thomas's birth, and his maternal grandfather (who had intended that he should be prepared for Oxford University, and then enter the legal profession) when he was quite young, he was called upon very early in life to think and act for himself. It was at this period that he showed that courage and determination which are so marked a feature in his character. He engaged himself to an uncle in a London business house, and at once set himself to improve, by every means within his power, the education he had obtained, at the same time devoting himself zealously to Christian work.

It is sometimes suggested that men "with a history," converted suddenly in middle life, make the best evangelists. Surely this is saying too much. Thank God, the monuments of his grace, snatched as brands from the burning, do magnify his grace and are often used to lead multitudes into the valley of decision; but it surely accords more with reason, and with Scripture, that the life early consecrated to God, with no scars, no sudden cleavages, but which has been rooted and grounded in Christ for years, and deeply taught in divine things, should prove to be a vessel meet for the Master's use. This, too, is another secret of Mr. Thomas's influence. He has been a Bible student for many years; a total abstainer and a Sunday-school teacher—the school where so many veteran workers have learnt their first lessons in Christian service, and were first taught to wield the Sword of the Spirit—from the time of his conversion. So zealous and successful was he as a voluntary lay-worker in London, that his vicar, Rev. B. O. Sharp, of St. Peter's, Clerkenwell, engaged him as his lay-assistant, intending to nominate him when ready as his curate. Becoming a student at King's College, Mr. Thomas attended the theological lectures during his mornings, and spent his late evening hours in preparing for ordination, and so zealously did he apply himself that he not only became an Associate at King's, but came out first in the Bishop of London's Examination, and was ordained on Trinity Sunday, 1885. He afterwards laboured at St. Peter's for nearly four years.

It has been said that the difference between two men is not that the one has greater opportunities than the other, but that the one sees them and uses them, while the other does not. In February, 1889, Mr. Thomas was offered the senior curacy with Canon Christopher, rector of St. Aldate's, Oxford, so well known in Evangelical circles; and a new page in his life opened. Here the opportunity was presented of reading for an Oxford degree, and believing that the open door was from God, Mr. Thomas again applied himself to study, becoming attached to Christ Church as an undergraduate.

Again his abilities and earnest application were rewarded; for in 1895, he obtained a First Class in the Honour School of Theology, besides obtaining the University Junior Septuagint Prize in 1894. During this time he had succeeded in gathering round him a band of earnest workers at St. Aldate's, his work in the Sunday-schools being specially blessed, and his power as a preacher recognised by the large congregations which assembled whenever it was known that he would occupy the pulpit.

It was not then to be wondered at, that, when he was chosen to read a paper at the Islington Clerical Conference in 1896, the sterling merit of the man was recognised, and Prebendary Webb Peploe at once recommended him to the Trustees of Portman Chapel, the incumbency of which was then vacant. He was appointed, and for four years his influence has been steadily growing in the metropolis.

From Photograph by Mr. Sumner, 110, St. Aldates, Oxford.

His services as a speaker are in increasing demand. He again read a paper at the Islington Conference in 1898. He was, with Prebendary Webb-Peploe, one of the chief speakers at the National Protestant Church Union's annual meeting this year, and it is worthy of notice that his speech has since been warmly attacked by Lord Halifax. He is now president of the C.M.S. Younger Clergy Union. He is also a member of the Keswick platform, and frequently speaks at other conventions. Above all, his congregations at Portman Chapel are growing, and a special feature is the number of men among them. This is the mark of a robust ministry, and a proof of the grace and grit which have been so prominent throughout the incumbent's career.

It will be gathered from the above that Mr. Thomas is a pronounced Evangelical. He is announced to give a series of expository lectures on "Church of England Doctrine," during the October term, in St. Peter-le-Bailey Church, Oxford, of which Rev. the Hon. Talbot Rice is rector. The subjects of the lectures are as follows:—"Scripture Supreme and Sufficient." "The Doctrine of Justification," "The One Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church," "The Christian Ministry," "Confession and Absolution," "The Meaning and Place of Sacraments," and "Prayers for the Dead." It is not too much to say that in Evangelical circles Mr. Thomas is making his way to the front rank. As a preacher, he is clear and Scriptural. Christ is pre-eminent in all his sermons. A teacher perhaps rather than an evangelist, Mr. Thomas is eminently fitted for the position he now occupies, and as he is only entering his fortieth year, we may anticipate for him in God's providence a life of great usefulness.

Points and Outlines.

Words or Works?

A Christian man's business is not to talk grandly about dogmas, but to be always doing difficult and great things in fellowship with God. Zwingle.

"Never!"

Among the resolutions of Jonathan Edwards, adopted as a young man, and observed throughout his life, were these:—

Never to lose one moment of time, but to improve it in the most profitable way I possibly can.

Never to do anything which I should be afraid to do if it were the last hour of my life.

Never to do anything out of revenge.

The Gospel in Threes.

"Except."

1. Except as to birth (John iii. 3).
2. ,, ,, character (Matt. v. 20).
3. ,, ,, reward (2 Tim. ii. 5).

"Unspeakable."

1. The unspeakable gift (2 Cor. ix. 15).
2. ,, ,, joy (1 Peter i. 8).
3. ,, ,, experience (2 Cor. xii. 4).

Ministerial Parts and Duties.

(2 Tim. iv. 5, 7.)

I. Vigilance: "Watch thou in all things." This is a general quality that is to run through all our work.

II. Patience: "Endure afflictions." If you cannot bear these, you had better let the ministry alone.

III. Activity in the great work of evangelizing men: "Do the work of an evangelist." Wherever Providence may station you, be concerned to evangelize your neighbourhood.

IV. Fidelity in discharging your trust: "Make full proof of thy ministry." The word means thoroughly to accomplish that which you have undertaken. Would you see an example, look at that of the great Apostle in the context: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith." Andrew Fuller.

Go Forward.

(Ex. xiv. 15.)

The Christian should not be satisfied with present attainments. More than we possess may be had (2 Chron. xxv. 9):—

(1) Follow on to know the Lord (Hos. vi. 3).

(2) Grow in grace, &c. (2 Peter iii. 18).

(3) Press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus (Phil. iii. 14).

J. P. Coster.

Glorying in God.

How pleasant a thing it is to be able to say, "God, even my God, shall bless me! I need no other." How high matter of triumph was this to the psalmist! "Let it be told to the generations following—this God is our God for ever and ever; He will be our guide even unto death" (Psa. xlviii. 13, 14). As if he had said, We are willing that this should be known in the present and succeeding ages. Let it be transmitted to posterity. Let there be a perpetual, everlasting monument of this, that we have had the Lord for our God. Thus a certain noble person would have an inscription put upon his tomb, without any further enlargement, to this effect—that he had been a servant to Queen Elizabeth, counsellor to King James, and friend to Sir Philip Sidney. By this it appears that he would have all ages know whose servant, counsellor, and friend he had been. In like manner should every good and pious soul declare to the present and all future ages that the Lord is his God.

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, October 14. Isaiah xlii.

THE direct quotation of these words in Matt. xii. 18-21 places beyond controversy their application to our Lord, the Servant, the Chosen, and the Soul's Delight of the Father. Note the unobtrusiveness and gentleness, the patience and perseverance, of our Lord's work. And are they not characteristic of all those on whom God puts his Spirit? There is no need for these to advertise themselves with strong cries. They have a special delicacy in dealing with the bruised seed and smoking flax—the one recalling the heavy boot of unkindness, and the other the slowly-dying embers of the religious life. They do not forsake a holy purpose when once they have taken it to heart.

The Hebrew brings out a beautiful meaning in v. 4, which might be rendered: "He shall not burn dimly, nor be bruised," as though to indicate that our Lord had sources of supply which secured Him against the failure that overtakes all others. He is gentle, but not feeble; tender, but neither vacillating nor capable of failure.

For such a Saviour let the world sing new songs! From wilderness to ocean, from isle to mountain, let them give glory to God. But what He has done is to be succeeded by marvels more astounding. He shall yet go forth as a mighty man. The time of long waiting is nearly over, and He will burst from all restraints, conducting the blind out of darkness into light.

MONDAY, October 15. Isaiah xliii.

The Prophet foretells the return of the people from Babylon. What though the rivers Euphrates and Tigris lay between them and their home! What though the fire of the desert might burn as an oven! Through all such difficulties they would come unscathed, because God, their Saviour, was with them. Often in our journey to heaven we have to traverse fire and flood, but God never forgets to reassure us that He goes at our side. Babylon herself must fall rather than that one of his own should be left behind.

There is special tenderness in the words of v. 7. Have you assumed the name of Christ, and are you bearing it? Remember that you have been created and formed for God's glory. He had a distinct purpose in making you what you are. Let Him work it out, that He may give the world the benefit which He intended when He made you.

It would seem as though a great convocation were called to listen to the pleading of Jehovah for faith and love. He asserts that He only is God, that there never was nor can be another, and that He alone can save. Then He calls into the witness-box the Jewish people, and demands that they should attest his claim, "Ye are my witnesses." It is so with all of us. Every counting-house, every family in which a young Christian serves as a governess or domestic, every dining-room where we sit at meals, every drawing-room where we receive our guests, is a witness-box where we have to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth of God. Oh, that we may do it as those whom God has formed for Himself, with the express purpose of our setting forth his praise!

TUESDAY, October 16. Isaiah xliv.

Consider the names which God gives to his Beloved: "My Servant," 1, 2, 21; "My Chosen," 1, 2; "My Redeemed," 6, 23, 24. Consider also the names He gives Himself: "The King of Israel," 6; "The Incomparable Rock," 8; "Jehovah of Hosts," 6. The whole chapter is conceived in the tenderest love, and is intended to reassure his people, amidst all the difficulties of their position, that their confidence would not be misplaced. Were they thirsty? Water should be poured on them. Were they as dry ground? There should be streams Did the fathers pass away? Children should rise up as willows by the water courses. Were they dreading to be forgotten? They were comforted by the words, "Thou shalt not be forgotten by Me." Did their sins rise up in judgment? They were blotted out as a cloud. Was Jerusalem waste, and were the cities of Judah in ruins? Heathen monarchs should give orders for their reconstruction. Did rivers forbid their passage, or the deep roar against their return? One word from Him should dry up both. Was it problematical that the temple should ever stand in its glory? There was no doubt, since God said it, that its foundations should be laid. Christ's redemption carries with it the promise of all future deliverance and help, and if thou art his redeemed, thou canst not be forgotten. Thy darkest transgression shall be blotted out, thy waste places shall sing.

What a marvellous piece of inspired satire is the paragraph 9-20, which describes an idol factory, in which the artizans who make the image of God need food and sleep, using the chips for the fire that bakes their bread! But remember that others than idol-makers feed on ashes, and are turned aside by a deceived heart. See to it then, little children, that ye keep yourselves from idols.

WEDNESDAY, October 17. Isaiah xlv.

Cyrus is described by his contemporaries as a man of great natural quality, blended with a highly religious nature. Though he may never have known God, as the Jews did, yet he was raised up by Jehovah to shatter the power of Babylon, and let the oppressed Israelites go free. If God did so much for a heathen prince, what will He not do for thee, O child of his love? Will he not go before thee, making rugged places plain, and at one blow opening closed doors? Believe me, there are treasures in these dark tracts of experience which shall enrich thee for evermore. Under the awful pressure to which thou art being subjected, veins of gold are being laid down, and jewels are being formed which will glisten brightly in the land which is "fairer than day."

The thought that they were to be delivered by a heathen prince seems to have excited some complaint among the exiles, which Isaiah rebukes in v. 9. We are all tempted to strive with our Maker, and to resist his plans. Yet let us take care how we act thus, lest we be cast away as potsherds to the earth. It is only the yielded soul, fashioned as clay by the potter's hand, which can ask of things to come, and command the mighty power of the Creator.

As Isaiah contemplated these marvels, he cried with the saints of all ages, Thou art a God that hidest Thyself. Whether we consider the nature of God, or his work in creation, redemption and providence, there are always mysteries in which He evades our comprehension. Remember this, however, that He is always the Saviour (15, 17, 21, 22, 24, 25). One look to Him brings salvation to the soul, though it has drifted in prodigal wantonness to the ends of the earth.

THURSDAY, October 18. Isaiah xlvi.

Again a marvellous satire on the helplessness of idols. Bel and Nebo are lifted by the Babylonians from their niches, and hurried away before Cyrus and his Persians, who were strict worshippers of the unseen. They are borne and carried by wearied beasts. So far from carrying their votaries, they are themselves carried. How different to Jehovah, who bore and carried the whole house of Israel from birth to hoar hairs!

What exceeding comfort there is in the words, "I have made, and I will bear." If a father brings into existence a child deprived of one of its senses, or in some other way unfitted for the battle of life, how tenderly he deals with him, going out of his way to make life as easy as possible. Thus it is with our heavenly Father. He pities us. Plead your weakness as a reason why He should bear and carry you.

Is there any fear that God will fail? Ransack the history of the past. Remember the story of fulfilled prophecy. See how every word of his has been literally fulfilled. Is God other than He was? Has He done so much for those who trusted Him in days gone by, and will He fail us? It is impossible. He brings near his righteousness; it shall not be far off, neither shall his salvation tarry. Only dare to wait for it.

Always remember the words with which the chapter closes, that Israel is God's glory. Scattered, persecuted, depressed, they and their history are the special joy of God's heart. To love and help them is to be in the line of God's purpose, and to constitute a claim to the recognition of the King, which He will not be slow to give when He sits on the throne of his glory. "Inasmuch . . . . ."

FRIDAY, October 19. Isaiah xlvii.

A sublime ode is here! Speaking sternly as the mouthpiece of God, the prophet bids the daughter of Babylon, called virgin because she had never been subdued, to descend from her throne, and sit on the ground, or wade through the waters, like any girl of the lowest class. He is willing to admit that she had fulfilled the Divine purpose in avenging the sins of Israel; but she had used her advantage with wanton cruelty, showing no mercy, but laying her yoke very heavily upon the aged. "Our Redeemer," cries the prophet, "will not allow thee to go unpunished, and thy desolation shall come upon thee suddenly."

How apt a description is given of certain great cities with the which we are acquainted, that dwell carelessly, and assure themselves that they shall never be widowed; that practise enchantments and sorceries; that trust in wickedness, and in the multitude of astrologers, star-gazers, and monthly prognosticators (v. 13). Certain streets of London, for instance, where the children of Vanity Fair roll to and fro in their splendid equipages, are beset with the advertisements of palmists and others, who profess to read the future. Blot out the word Babylon, and how much of these terrible words may be applied to London, Paris, New York! Amid the vanities and superstitions of our day, we are charged to be God's witnesses, not scrupling on the one hand to denounce the sins which are corrupting the present generation, nor hesitating on the other to declare the hopeless doom which must come to this age as to every previous one, when civilization has been divorced from religion, and luxury of life has been cultivated apart from the culture of the soul.

SATURDAY, October 20. Isaiah xlviii.

This is the last chapter of the first book of the second part of Isaiah. It is especially addressed to the people of God. They are reminded that though they still wore the honoured name, their vows and protestations were devoid of righteousness and truth. Of what use is it to call yourself the holy city when you are obstinate, your sinews as iron, and your brows as brass? But our sins cannot frustrate or turn aside the eternal purpose. Even though Israel's behaviour to God might have seemed to forfeit all claim on his redeeming help, yet He would defer his anger, "for his own sake." Notice that three times in two verses God asseverates his determination to act for his own glory's sake. Yes, friend, this is at the ultimate ground of all God's dealings with us. We have no claim on Him. We have forfeited his favour. We have deserved rejection. But God cannot afford (if we may dare to put it so) to give us up, else cause might be given to his enemies to blaspheme. I hear Him saying, "For my own sake, for my own sake will I do it." And those words remind us of the prevailing plea for prayer, as when we say, "For the sake of Jesus Christ."

The Lord loved Cyrus, as Jesus did the young man who came running to Him. Precious words were addressed to him, which were probably brought to his notice by Daniel. What a thrill must have gone through the young monarch when he read that God loved him (14). What wouldst thou think if such a thing were written in the Bible of thee? Wouldst thou not be glad? But it has been written. Thou art beloved in Him in whom thou art accepted.

AUTUMNAL MEETINGS AT LEICESTER.

NOT only the delegates who attended the gatherings at Leicester last week, but members of Baptist churches throughout the country, have realized that the last autumnal sessions of the waning century were fraught with signal tokens of God's presence and power. In tone and substance the addresses were alike inspiring and forcible, and worthy of the themes of which they treated, touching life on every side. The proceedings throughout were marked by a spirit of expectancy, and as the meetings proceeded many hearts must have swelled with a foretaste of renewed and deepened life and energy.

The civic reception to the delegates on Monday evening was followed by the first in the Temperance Hall, presided over by the Mayor (Alderman T. Windley), who remarked that in Leicester had lived and laboured the high-souled, eloquent Baptist preacher, Robert Hall; there also toiled William Carey and James Phillippo Mursell.

The President of the Union (Rev. W. Cuff), in replying to the address of welcome, referred to many "brave and true" who had been called to rest since the assembly met at Leicester some seventeen years ago. Through Rev. F. W. Lansdowne, the Leicester Free Church Council presented an address recognizing the work of Baptists at home and abroad, which was supported by Rev. J. Posnett and Mr. H. T. Chambers.

Dr. Maclaren received the heartiest of receptions, and his address was one to be remembered. The day for forming new denominations, he declared, is over. The centrifugal movement has worked itself out, and the reverse movement has set in. We are all drawing nearer to each other. I do not want to break down denominational walls. We are not ready for it. But why must there be glass bottles broken on the tops of the walls, and why must they be so high as nobody whose neck is shorter than a camelopard's can look over them?" In suggesting a keynote for the meetings, the speaker, with vigour and passion, declared: "We are something more than citizens, more than politicians—our politics are applied to national life. Let us not forget the Christian in the politician—conferences and gatherings such as these have their own especial danger, and it is quite possible to lose and not to gain in spiritual power at them. No man will ever give forth of the Spirit of Christ who does not abide in the secret place of the Most High."

The temperance societies of Leicester afterwards presented an address recognizing the service rendered by Baptists in supporting legislative measures for curtailing and suppressing the drink traffic and Sunday closing. The meeting of the Baptist Total Abstinence Association was afterwards held in Belvoir Street Chapel.

A MISSIONARY DAY.

Tuesday was devoted to the consideration of missionary questions. In turn the religious interests of India and China, Africa and the Continent of Europe, were brought forward, and appeals made for more generous support and wider and more intelligent interest in the endeavours of churches abroad. At Victoria Road Chapel, the scene of the labours of Rev. J. G. Greenhough, the preacher was Rev. F. G. Benskin (Hammersmith); while at Friar Lane Chapel, a sermon was delivered by Rev. James Mursell (Clapton). The Temperance Hall was full for the valedictory service, when leave was taken of a number of missionaries. It was to be expected that China would occupy a prominent place in the thoughts of all, for the Baptist Missionary Society mourns the loss of brave and true agents, and the news yet to come concerning those whose fate is still shrouded in mystery threw a gloom over the proceedings. But in neither speeches nor sermons was despondency visible, and no word uttered indicated retreat. One of the loudest outbursts of applause heard during the day followed the address made by a young recruit fresh from college, who declared that in all the colleges men were prepared to left by the murders in China. Mr. G. D. McAlpine (Accrington) presided, in the absence of Mr. W. R. Rickett, and he referred to the progress made in the Chinese missions until the recent disturbances arose. The membership of Christian Churches had increased sevenfold in recent years.

The first of the missionaries to bid adieu to the homeland was Rev. B. Evans (India), who said: "By your mission you have cut the moorings of the people from the faith of their fathers; will you now let them drift?" He was followed by Rev. P. E. Hebberlet (of Orissa), Rev. Herbert J. Thomas, who is returning to India, and others. Rev. W. H. Stapleton, of the Congo Mission, was not sure if our need was not greater than theirs on the Congo. He had looked upon naked savagery, he had worked amongst a tribe who ate their own dead, but there he had never been so filled with despair as in looking upon the drink-sodden faces of so many at home.

Principal Henderson, of Bristol College, delivered the valedictory address, full of impressive thought and spiritual power and inspiration.

Dr. Clifford's sermon in the afternoon was a powerful utterance. The theme was of Missions," and the text, Eph. iii. 8-11. The doctor showed how Paul's experience of Christ—the new creation which took place in him—which changed him in all his thoughts of God—made him a flaming evangel of the Gospel which had saved him. "You must reproduce Paul's experience of Christ in your soul. Missions owe their energy to personal experience of the grace of God in Christ Jesus. Every converted man is an addition to the missionary forces of the Church. Seek more conversions, for in the conversion of men is the springhead of missions."

When Dr. Maclaren took the chair at night the hall was crowded, and an overflow meeting had to be arranged. Speaking of the attack on Chinese missionaries, he said that was not the time to repel the calumnies as to the conduct of missionaries as a factor in that tragedy. If by the conduct of missionaries is meant the preaching of Christ's Gospel, we have to remember that be the consequences what they may. But if by the conduct of missionaries is meant precipitate, unwise attempts to drag in the civil power, the Baptist Missionary Society, as a whole, and in the person of its missionaries, say that their hands were clean. The brethren in China do not fall back on Consuls, and want no expiatory cathedral built for them.

Rev. J. S. Whitewright declared that the Powers of Europe were responsible for the outbreak, which was anti-foreign and not anti-Christian. The call was not to retreat, but to advance. They must go back to rewrite those precious manuscripts which had cost them so much time, to gather their scattered flocks, to stand beside the graves of those who had died for their faith.

At the first session on Wednesday morning, there was a large company to hear the President's address, which was delivered with much vigour, and showed but little trace of the recent indisposition which compelled Mr. Cuff to rest awhile from his labours. The subject of his discourse was, "Three Great Movements in the Free Churches of our Time"—the disruption in the Church of Scotland, the federation of the Free Churches, and the Twentieth Century Fund.

The assembly next discussed certain public questions. It rejoiced at the proposal that the ministers and missionaries of all evangelical churches should join in a concert of prayer for the new century. Attention was directed by Rev. J. Bradford to the evils of cigarette smoking. The president announced that he had received a letter from a clergyman expressing his pleasure that the Baptist Union were taking up the matter. Rev. D. M. Davies (of Shrewsbury) deplored the growth of the habit among girls.

It was not surprising to find that much interest centred round Dr. Clifford and the resolution on the General Election. It urged the fullest consideration of the and the discharge of all duties of Christian citizenship in the fear of God and for the best interests of the nation. It welcomed the definite constitution of the Tribunal at The Hague as a step toward the substitution of international law for international strife. In the course of an impassioned speech, Dr. Clifford declared the resolution to be in perfect accord with the highest Baptist traditions and present convictions. Baptists were not only members of homes and churches, but also of towns, cities, and States, and they were bound to discharge the duties pertaining to all of them. The religion of Christ was as much for the market and polling booth, as for the sanctuary and prayer-meeting.

In the afternoon, Rev. W. L. Watkinson, ex-president of the Wesleyan Conference, preached to a crowded assembly; and meetings for men and young people occupied the evening.

Thursday's proceedings commenced at an early hour. In the interests of the a breakfast, arranged in the Melbourne Hall, was presided over by Dr. Maclaren, who appealed to the more wealthy members of the denomination to give their assistance to the movement, and read a touching message from the treasurer, Mr. Henry Wood, written in a tremulous hand, from a sick bed. Rev. S. Vincent, of Plymouth, addressed the meeting, and, in response to these appeals, some £4,000 were promised. Rev. J. H. Shakespeare made a statement at the morning session with reference to the Fund, which he announced had reached nearly £154,000. It would depend upon the next few months and upon the response from the Principality, whether the fund was to be realized.

A warm welcome was accorded Rev. C. Williams, who spoke on "Some Lessons to be Learned from American Baptists." In view of the simultaneous mission next year, peculiar interest attached to Dr. Glover's paper on "The Elements of the Revival we Require." He urged that there is a need of REVISING OLD IDEAS.

A revival of faith is needed in the being of God—his existence, his goodness, and his sovereignty; a greater hallowing and using of the intellect in religion, and consecration to the Church.

In the afternoon members of the Union attended the ceremony of the laying of the foundation stones of the "Robert Hall" memorial chapel, which is being erected in Narborough Road, Leicester, at a cost of £12,000.

The Zenana meeting in connection with the Baptist Missionary Society was also held in the afternoon, when the valedictory address was given by Rev. J. B. Morgan (Chester). Farewell was said to lady workers returning to their various spheres of service.

The evening meeting in the Temperance Hall, for the exposition and enforcement of Free Church principles, was well attended. Rev. C. Silvester Horne (Congregationalist) spoke on "Things New and Old." Addresses were also given by Dr. Henson (Chicago) and Rev. T. Phillips (Norwich). The Assembly sent a warm invitation to the Baptist churches of the United States and colonies to send representatives to the autumn sessions at Edinburgh in 1901.

Friday witnessed the close of the meetings, and the topics discussed were connected with foreign missions. Rev. H. Oakley (Upper Tooting) and Rev. D. H. Moore (King's Cross) recounted several methods of raising funds for missions. At the final meeting in the evening, the outlook for missions in Africa was spoken of with much hopefulness by Rev. Ross Phillips, of the Congo. He declared his belief that one of the features of the coming century would be the evangelization of Africa by Africans themselves, Europeans acting as leaders.

Children's Special Services.

WHEN next your summer holidays come round, see that you make it a point to spend them at one of our popular coasting-places. Such, in effect, was the advice tendered by the different speakers who took part in the anniversary gatherings of the C.S.S. Mission, held on Thursday last at St. Martin's Town Hall. Why that request? Because by selecting some of those health resorts to stay at, Christian friends are afforded an opportunity of rendering help in the multiform services conducted by the Children's Special Service Mission, whose great aim it is to reach with the story of redeeming love the hearts of the thousands of young people that are to be found at the different centres during the summer months—Llandudno, Eastbourne, Scarborough, St. Leonards, Ilfracombe, Bridlington, and other places.

The services are made as bright as possible, and, in fact, are just such as to win the sympathies of young people, and, let it be said, as results have amply shown, of adults also. Each day's proceedings is usually and appropriately commenced with a prayer meeting in the forenoon, and, weather permitting, an open-air meeting is held shortly afterwards, either on the sands or in close proximity to the seashore, where, of course, large numbers of boys and girls are certain to be found.

The audience gathers round some sand-built pulpit, which willing and industrious workers have already completed, and from that raised spot a few brief suitable addresses are given by different speakers, the services being interspersed with hymn-singing of such a hearty character as only children's voices can produce. Then, again, there are indoor meetings held specially for boys and girls respectively, where, as opportunity offers, they are more individually dealt with in reference to their spiritual condition. Gatherings for young gentlemen, more particularly those connected with our large public schools, and others for young ladies, help to make up an interesting and profitable day's programme; and the speakers at this year's anniversary were able to tell of real good accomplished amongst this section of visitors to the seaside.

Lantern services are also held, and these generally attract large numbers of both old and young. Like every other really successful religious effort, the Children's Special Service Mission takes a deep interest in foreign missionary work. When the youthful congregation gathers at what is known as the missionary meeting, one may see a huge map, with its pebble-built mountains and seaweed rivers, &c., the whole representing some far-off heathen land, such as Africa, or India, or China, the special needs of which are dwelt upon and emphasized by each speaker. That the missionary spirit characterizes the Children's Mission is evidenced by the fact that several of those who attended the services whilst mere youths have in after years given their lives to work in the foreign field.

Thursday's gatherings were largely attended. At that held in the afternoon Rev. T. W. Drury, M.A., B.D. (Cambridge), presided, and spoke of the great opportunity presented by such work as the Mission is carrying on; and also of the responsibility which that work entails. Rev. E. A. Stuart, M.A. (president), gave an address of encouragement to those who take part in the work. A similar meeting was held in the evening, at which Mr. W. F. A. Archibald presided. It may be added that the Mission is a department of work, affiliated with that of the Children's Scripture Union.

Christ's Wonderful Ointment.

"When He had thus spoken, He spat on the ground, and made clay of the spittle, and He anointed the eyes of the blind man with the clay" (John ix. 6).

THIS was a very great cure.

Here was a full-grown man who had been blind since he was born, and Jesus gave him his sight.

Doctors know far more now than they did in the days of Jesus. They can cure nearly any disease of the eye, or of any part of the body, if it is taken to them in time. They are always performing successful operations; and, if it were not for their skill, thousands of persons would be blind who are enjoying excellent sight.

But no earthly doctor ever yet gave sight to a person who was born blind. That is a wonder which only the power of God can accomplish. This was the great cure which Jesus worked.

Now, how did Jesus cure this blind man?

He could have done it with a word, or with a touch, as He had often done before. Or He could have done it without either a word or a touch, by just wishing it and ordering it in his heart. But He did not choose to do so. In this case He followed the example of ordinary doctors, and used an ointment.

How did He use the ointment? He first made it Himself, and spread it with his hands over the blind man's eyes. Then He told him to go away to a certain pool (the pool of Siloam), and wash the ointment off. The blind man did as Jesus told him, and when he had washed off the ointment he could see perfectly.

What was the ointment which Jesus used? Was there ever ointment prepared like it? Jesus did not keep the man waiting while He went, or sent his disciples, to a chemist's shop to buy costly drugs. Nor did He keep him waiting while He went, or sent the disciples, to gather poppies in the fields, and other healing herbs, in order that He might mix their juices for a remedy, as the Eastern ancients did. Nor did Jesus made his ointment out of some mysterious substance, of which He only possessed the secret. Jesus' ointment was just a little common earth, taken from the ground, and moistened with his spittle. Was there ever so simple, so cheap, and yet so powerful an ointment?

Now suppose that you made ointment like this, and put it on a blind man's eyes, could you give him sight? You could not; and neither could anybody else living. How then was it that the ointment succeeded with Jesus? It was because Jesus' divine power worked through the ointment. Jesus could, indeed, have done quite as well without any ointment; but He had important reasons for using the ointment. What were some of these? Jesus wanted to teach us three great lessons:

I. God's cures are very SIMPLE.
II. God's cures are very CHEAP.
III. God's cures are for EVERYBODY.

What could be simpler, and what could be cheaper, than earth and spittle? They can be had everywhere by everybody; and they cost nothing.

So it is with SALVATION. It is God's grand cure for our sin. It is very simple. Everybody can have it everywhere, without money and without price, who seeks for it. You are a sinner. Will it not be a shameful thing if you are not cured of your sin when God has made his salvation so easy?

Limerick. R. H. SEMPLE.

They Shall See Him.

PASSING through the narrow alley of a city, the other day, we heard a woman's voice in cheering song. The words of the refrain, upon which she lingered, seemed strangely out of place in that environment. She sang:

And I shall see Him face to face,
And tell the story: "Saved by grace!"

Looking up toward the place from whence the song came, we saw a poor old servant woman, down on her hands and kneess, scrubbing the second-storey floor of a dwelling. In a moment that sweet song took a depth and beauty of meaning and a charm unimagined before. That poor scrubwoman, in her weary toil, was a "daughter of the King," an heir of eternal glory, for a short time away from home, a pilgrim and a stranger in the earth. What she sang, as she looked up into the face of the Unseen, was sober truth:

I shall see Him face to face!

The drudgery shall cease. The rags shall drop off from the old body. The prisoned spirit shall be set free. The dust and smoke, and din of this weary world shall vanish out of sight. New scenes shall open to the unveiled eyes, even a world which needs no light of moon or star or sun, for "the Lamb is the light thereof!"

It is worth while to tarry and toil and suffer here for a little while, to live for Jesus in a world that "lieth in the wicked one," with the faith and hope of that better time in the heart, when we shall assuredly see Him face to face,

And tell the story, "Saved by grace!"

Christian Endeavour Topic.

SUNDAY, OCT. 14.

Paul the Missionary (2 Tim. iv. 1-8).

THE missionary's life is the greatest that any man can live. It is the most Christ-like, the most absolutely unselfish, the most beneficent. Think of the lives of Brainerd, Moffat, Judson, Carey. They have opened the kingdom of heaven to myriads by their translations of the Scriptures, their words, their books; and when such return to their own country, and stand on the missionary platform, their appeals are enforced by the heroism of their devotion to the cause of Christ. I have seen a photograph of the two veterans, Chamberlain and Paton, sitting side by side, and it seemed apostolic in its beauty.

In this paragraph, a veteran missionary, at the close of his career, which has landed him in a dark and stifling prison, with the near prospect of a violent death, is appealing to a younger missionary to be true to the high trust reposed in him, and to fulfil his ministry, i.e., to fill up to the brim the opportunities furnished him by the course of Divine Providence.

Several encouragements and incentives are mentioned. First: The Vision of God and of Christ Jesus (v. 1). Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton, as a youth, had in him the materials of a fine manhood; but no fire of purpose burned in him to give them shape, or stir the unselfish heroism which he afterwards expended for the slaves. But he visited the grand old hall of the Gurneys at Earlham, found a family alive and earnest, caught the fire of their enthusiasm, and wrote long afterwards: "The distinctions I gained at College were exclusively the result of the animating passion to carry back to them the prizes which they prompted and enabled me to win." How much more will this result accrue from the soul's vision of a contact with Jesus Christ. As you lay yourself open to his Spirit, and throw wide the avenues of your being to the passion for men, which filled and fills his heart, as you allow yourself to be seized with "the thrall of his enchantments," you long to live for the same aims and ends which are dear to Him.

Second: There was the thought that new men were constantly needed, if the work of God was to go forward. Fulfil thy ministry, said the lion-hearted man, for I am already being poured out as a libation over the altar of sacrifice, and the time of my departure is at hand (v. 5). There is great beauty in the last conception, which is precisely that of Tennyson's exquisite ode:

"And let there be no moaning of the bar
When I put out to sea."

As one great missionary after another passes away, who will step out to take up the fiery torch and pass it on! Who will be baptized for the dead!

Third: The thought of the reward. Paul describes his life under the three comparisons. It had been a fight against many antagonists, of which, perhaps, his own nature had been the worst and most inveterate. It had been a race, the course of which had been full of difficulty, and in the running he had been again and again tempted to give up in despair. It had been garrison duty, in which he had had to defend and protect the integrity of the Gospel when assailed by Judaizing ceremonialists and lax-living professors. His face was scarred and seamed with the marks of the severity of his endeavours. But through all there had gleamed on high, in the hand of Christ, the Crown of righteousness, which He was waiting to place on the brow of his faithful servant, and which that servant longed to have the chance of casting at the Master's feet.

What should we be without visions like that? For Livingstone, the crown was an Africa in which the slave-trader should have no place; for Mazzini, the vision of a united and regenerated Italy; for Dante, a Florence delivered from the men that wasted its life in strife and corruption; for Dr. Paton, a new Hebrides freed from cannibalism. What is the crown of your life? Let it be a tribe, an island, a kingdom, won to the sceptre of Jesus Christ; and let this be the motive and incentive of your career. F. B. M.

C.E. NOTES.

There are 1,000 Endeavourers in the Samoan Islands.

It is interesting to hear that the great feature of societies in the Dundee district is the large proportion of young men in the membership. No fewer than eight societies have been added during the past year.

* * *

A Pennsylvania Endeavourer found a town without a Sunday school. She walked to it, secured a barn, personally visited every family, and invited the children. A successful school is now carried on with the help of several Endeavourers.

* * *

A society in Derby has recently celebrated its anniversary by holding an evangelistic meeting, the members being urged to bring, if possible, one other person to the meeting, who would not have been present without invitation. Earnest addresses were delivered by three members and the president of the Union.

International S.S. Lesson.

The Lost Sheep and Lost Coin (Luke xv. 1-10).

Golden Text.—"There is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth" (Luke xv. 10).

Introduction.

IN this fifteenth chapter of Luke we read three parables; in all three something was lost, the lost was found, and there was joy. They were all lost in different ways. The sheep strayed thoughtlessly away from the fold. The coin fell and was hidden from sight. The son went wilfully away from home of his own free will, and of his own free will returned home again.

The first, the bewildered sinner.
The second, the unconscious sinner.
The third, the voluntary sinner.

Key to Blackboard Plan.—Notice the numbers and the way each one was lost. Are you lost in any of these ways?

The Sheep.

Matt. xviii. 11-13 is the same parable, but not quite so full of detail. (4) A flock was generally made up of 100 sheep.

A lost sheep is the picture of a lost soul; far away from God and the heavenly fold, it has gone astray and wandered on and on till lost, and does not know its way back. The Shepherd is the Lord Jesus; nothing seems too hard or dangerous for Him to do to find the lost sheep (4). Weary and footsore, scratched with thorns and tired, on He goes "until He find it"—what love!

(5) The sheep is exhausted, it has to be carried—more love!

(6) Joy! Full forgiveness for all wanderings—much more love! Joy in heaven, joy among the angels, joy all round in all hearts of friends. (Isa. liii. 6) All we like sheep have gone astray. (Psa. cxix. 176) I have gone astray like a lost sheep. (1 Pet. ii. 25) For ye were as sheep going astray. (Ez. xxxiv. 11, 12) I will search my sheep and seek them out. (John x. 16) Other sheep I have not of this fold. These are only a few verses bearing out the parable and the lessons it teaches; many more may be found.

Remember, there is no noise made in going astray, neither is there noise in secret sin. Let us examine our own hearts.

"I was a wandering sheep,
I did not love the fold,
I did not love my Shepherd's voice,
I would not be controlled.
I was a wayward child,
I did not love my home,
I did not love my Father's voice,
I loved afar to roam."

The Coin.

(8) Women often wore a string of little coins on the forehead, generally ten in number, and they set a great value on them.

The coin must have fallen to the ground before it could be lost. Thus we learn that the sinner falls in sin and is lost.

What trouble the woman takes to find it.

(8) Candle, and broom, and hard work, "till she find it," like the Shepherd, who seeks "until He finds it." Then again there is joy, joy in heaven and joy on earth. A fallen coin would get its image defaced; it would get dirty; it would be hidden from sight. All these three points can be used to test our own souls, and see if we are still fallen and away from God.

Notice, too, that both parables may be applied to the Christian. How often does he wander away, going his own way and leaving the fold for a time, and how often does the Christian stumble and fall! We need to pray against both ways of grieving our Good Shepherd (Jude 24; 2 Tim. iv. 18).

Reaching the Masses.

THE importance of efforts which aim at bringing the masses under the sound of the Gospel is a subject which does not receive the attention it demands.

We are apt to forget too readily that the vast majority of our fellow-countrymen never attend a place of worship, and, indeed, that they entertain feelings of unconcern, if not of aversion, towards a church or chapel, or even to an undenominational hall.

That these outsiders can be reached by means of services of an unconventional character, held in popular buildings, has been repeatedly proved. Among other organizations, the committee, which provides "special religious services in theatres, halls, and mission rooms," has done good work for forty-one years. Its speakers have rightly attained a reputation for soundness of doctrine and wisdom of method.

It would be difficult to overestimate, for instance, the effect of the services at the Pavilion Theatre, conducted by Mr. George Nokes, which commenced on Sept. 30. People flock from all parts of East London to attend, and the large congregations in this capacious building include hundreds who never visit any orthodox place of worship.

The winter's campaign is just beginning. The Committee have arranged a judicious programme of halls and speakers, and those who are interested in the great problem of reaching the lapsed masses will pray that a great spiritual harvest may result from their labours during the ensuing winter. Funds are urgently needed to meet the cost of the rent of the various buildings, &c. The Financial Secretary is —Rev. T. C. Udall, 3, Bridewell Place, E.C.

Irish Notes.

By the will of the late Mr. Thomas Hamilton, of Craig, Co. Derry, the sum of £4,900 has been bequeathed to various objects in connection with the Irish Presbyterian Church.

Much regret is felt at the death of Miss Margaret Stokes, who was the greatest authority of her time upon early Irish Christian art, and was a voluminous writer on the subject as well as a member of various antiquarian societies.

At a meeting of the Church of Ireland School Managers' Association, just held in Dublin, the revised programme of the national Board was condemned especially for its inadequate remuneration of the highest grade of teachers.

Rev. J. W. Atkin, M.A., of Cork, has been delivering a series of sermons in Carrick-on-Suir and the neighbourhood, in connection with the "Daily Prayer Union," and it is hoped as a result that a large number of persons will take an interest in united prayer.

At the recent annual Licensing Sessions, the temperance cause in Belfast has gained several victories. For the first time the magistrates had ample discretionary power in dealing with spirit grocers' licenses, and the public also had power to object. Formerly the police alone had the right to object, and if they did not do so the magistrates were obliged to grant the application. Now all this is changed, and not only can any one object, but the magistrates have absolute discretionary power in dealing with the matter. As the result, sixty-five applications for beer-dealers' licenses, and fourteen applications for spirit grocers' licenses in Belfast have been refused, while several others were either withdrawn or struck out. The change in the law in reference to the granting of these licenses promises to be a great boon to the community, and is one on which the friends of temperance may well congratulate themselves.

Personalia.

Rev. John Mitchell, having left Bristol, wishes us to state that his permanent address is Sherwood, Sutton, Surrey.

Our readers will regret to hear of the illness of Surgeon-General Partridge, who has recently had to undergo a severe operation for a painful malady. Prayer is desired for the recovery of this esteemed worker in the cause of evangelical truth.

Many will be interested to hear of the marriage of Miss Annie Fothergill, an earnest worker in connection with the Christian Band, Darlington, to Mr. A. E. Eccles, who is concerned in many religious and philanthropic activities. The event took place at the Friends' Meeting House, Darlington, on September 20.

The Weaver Brothers (Mr. Bewley and Mr. Frank) are sons of the late Mr. Richard Weaver, the well-known evangelist. Mr. Leonard Weaver is the manager of the London Tent Campaign, and is not related to the Weaver Brothers. As confusion has arisen between the names, correspondents are requested to address their communications in either case with the Christian name in full—"The Weaver Brothers" is, of course, sufficiently plain.

Rev. Norman Bennet, who has been distributing the "Soldier's New Testaments" at the front, and also working among the troops by giving help in church parades and other ways, is arranging, before his return, to visit the South African schools, with the object of doing work among them similar to that which he has been carrying on in the public schools at home. He has obtained the co-operation of Rev. Andrew Murray in regard to the Dutch schools, and desires the prayers of all Christians at home that these visits may be a means in God's hands of promoting a better understanding between Dutch and English. It is only the Gospel of Christ that can bind races together, and heal the present unhappy divisions. Mr. Bennet hopes to return to England by Christmas to continue his work at home.

The Christian Union Buildings, Dublin.—Mr. H. B. Dawson writes:—"In the excellent report of the Dublin Christian Convention, in your last issue, there is an error in the opening paragraph which requires correction. These buildings are not, as stated, the property of the Evangelical Alliance. They were erected after Mr. Moody's first visit to Dublin, and are an outcome of his work there. By his visit he brought together Christians of all denominations to join in united work, and these buildings give facilities and scope for such. They are vested in trustees representing all the Evangelical Churches, and held by them for the good of all. The Irish and Dublin branches of the Evangelical Alliance have their offices and reading-rooms there, and carry on in the halls the various branches of their work."

The Churches.

Church of England.

The Bishop of London's "Round Table Conference" on the ritual question is to be held in Fulham Palace to-day (Thursday) and to-morrow (Friday), notwithstanding that the Bishop is unwell.

It is officially announced that Bishop Barry has resigned the living of St. James's, Piccadilly, which he has held for the last five years, in order to have full time for the duties in which he succeeds the Bishop of Marlborough, having charge, as Assistant Bishop, in West London. His London address is now at Queen Anne's Mansions, St. James's Park, S.W.

An Open-air Mission was held for three days during the recent fair at Barnet by Rev. P. W. Francis, curate of Christ Church, North Finchley. Meetings were held on each evening at five, seven, and eight o'clock. The later meetings took the form of limelight views, with short messages on each slide. Over 1,000 people were present every night. Mr. Francis was assisted by the Rector of Christ Church, Barnet (Canon Trotter), and other friends.

Dr. Bickersteth's intimation that he intends to resign the See of Exeter before the close of the year will not come as a surprise. He is seventy-five years of age. It is hardly necessary to say that the bishop is an Evangelical. He is the son of Rev. Edward Bickersteth, one of the pillars of the C.M.S. in its early days. He was for thirty years vicar of Christ Church, Hampstead, and in 1885, after a brief space in the deanery of Gloucester, was nominated by Mr. Gladstone to succeed Dr. Temple at Exeter.

On Saturday last, at 7 a.m., the Bishop of Liverpool paid a visit to the Mission-room of the Prison Gate Mission of the Liverpool Diocesan C.E.T.S., near Walton gaol. Dr. Chavasse was accompanied by his chaplain, Rev. H. E. H. Probyn. A number of discharged female prisoners were invited into the room, and they were provided with hot coffee and bread and butter. The Bishop spoke to them kindly and earnestly. After the women had left the room the men entered, and they also were spoken to by the Bishop. Several men accepted tickets for work at the Society's firewood and mat factory at Bootle, and other men and women signed the pledge.

Congregational.

Dr. Forsyth, of Emmanuel Church, Cambridge, would be very glad if parents and friends would advise him of any Nonconformist students—men or women, who are studying at Cambridge. There is a thriving Nonconformist Union in Cambridge.

The Church Endeavour Society and Sunday school at Southernhay, Exeter, have resolved to raise 200 guineas towards the Century Fund. At an inaugural effort three short papers were read by ladies on "What is the Twentieth Century Fund?" each taking one of the words—"Thanksgiving," "Commemoration," and "Consecration." Three other papers by gentlemen were read on "Why should we support it?" their topics respectively being—"Because we are Endeavourers, Congregationalists, and Christians."

The church erected at Buxton Road, Stockport, was opened last week by Mr. Alderman William Lees, of Stockport. It is a neat stone building. Rev. S. Hinds is the pastor. Mr. A. A. Haworth, of Bowden, delivered an address, in which he described the attitude of Free Churchmen on important questions. Rev. S. Weaver (Wesleyan) said he believed there never was a time when there was more real unity—not uniformity, which he did not want—among the churches, the result either of the Free Church movement or the growth of a truer Christian spirit. In the evening a sermon was preached by Rev. Dr. Mackennal, of Bowden.

Calls (accepted).—Rev. J. W. M'Ewan, formerly of Berkeley Street Church, Liverpool, to King Street Church, Dudley.

Resignations.—Rev. L. Porter, Cliff Vale Church, Hastings. Rev. G. H. Brown, Christ Church, Sneyd Park, Bristol. Rev. E. Ault, of Clavering (chairman of the Essex Congregational Union) closing the forty years of his ministry at Clavering.

Baptist.

At the harvest thanksgiving services at Shefford (Rev. F. E. Hall), large congregations came together, and the power of the Spirit was manifested in blessing.

The work among soldiers conducted by Rev. E. Wells is on behalf of the Guards at Westminster, and not at Woolwich Garrison as recently stated.

The 159th anniversary of the church at Broseley was recently celebrated. The pastor (Rev. R. Wilson) was the preacher; under his ministry the old cause is reviving.

In connection with the settlement of Pastor Joseph Beaupré, of the Pastors' College, recognition services were recently held at Wrexham. The charge was given by Dr. McCaig, and words of cordial welcome were spoken by Alderman Jones, Revs. O. Tidman, E. K. Jones, Williams, and other ministers and friends.

For over twelve months services have been conducted in the iron chapel known as Finchley Tabernacle, Church End, N., by students of the Pastors' College, and a congregation gathered. Rev. J. J. Bristow (East Finchley) preached on a recent Sunday evening, and afterwards formed the church and conducted the Communion Service.

The enlarged and renovated Church at Major Road, Stratford New Town, of which Rev. W. Knight Chaplin is pastor, was opened on Thursday last. Rev. John Robertson, D.D., preached the opening sermon in the afternoon, and in the evening Mr. Knight Chaplin presided over a numerously attended public meeting, addressed by Dr. H. Grattan Guinness, Rev. John Bradford, and Rev. H. T. Spencer, M.A. New Sunday schools and lecture hall were opened last May.

The venerable Rev. J. Aldis, of Beckington, who passed his ninetieth birthday some time ago, has written the following letter, which was recently read at a meeting at Bristol:—"It is now seventy years since I began my work as a Baptist pastor, and from my inmost heart I say I feel that work as great a work and as pure a joy as this life can know, as it employs our faculties; it cultivates, strengthens, and sanctifies them; it rules the will by righteousness; it calms the passions to the peace of God that passeth all understanding. It leaves no remorse, but deep humility and perennial gratitude, and in the future points to perfect holiness and endless bliss."

Calls (accepted).—Rev. C. J. Rendell to Hillsboro' Church, Sheffield.

Methodist.

Rev. Hugh Price Hughes has visited a number of important provincial centres on behalf of the Wesleyan Twentieth Century Fund. The result has been a large increase of promises to contribute.

The general committee of the Wesleyan Missionary Society has decided to send its newly-appointed general secretary, Rev. William H. Findlay, on an official visit to the West African mission churches. He is to leave in about a week's time.

Rev. Henry T. Meakin desires it to be known that if any friends in town or country wish to look over the new Great Central Hall, Bermondsey New Road, he is to be found on the premises, at his office, any day from 2 to 10 p.m., and will be glad personally to conduct them over the building.

Rev. James W. Lord, the new Chairman of the Wesleyan Honduras District, has sailed with his family for that important sphere of service. The Wesleyan body have at the present time six circuits in the district, four of which are in British Honduras. Wesley Chapel, in Belize, the capital of the Colony, is the finest public building in the town. An advance among the Spanish-speaking peoples, numbering some hundreds of thousands, is urgently needed.

Presbyterian.

The seventh annual rally of Christian Endeavour Societies and Mission Bands will be held at Regent Square Church, on Saturday afternoon, October 13.

A movement has been started to establish a Presbyterian church in Bath, and Rev. Dr. Watson has promised to preach in that city on October 24 in connection with the scheme.

Rev. S. D. Scammell, of Chatham, having broken down in health, and requiring a year's partial rest, the Presbytery has heartily agreed to the appointment of an assistant for at least twelve months, Mr. Scammell to confine himself in the meantime mainly to the naval chaplaincy. Testimony is borne to the excellent work carried on for some years by Mr. Scammell at Chatham.

Rev. J. B. Meharry will not be back in time to occupy his pulpit at Crouch Hill and to preside at the communion service on October 14, as had been arranged. Mr. and Mrs. Meharry are now travelling in America, and it is expected that they will return at the end of this month in time for the services on November 4. Mrs. Meharry has thoroughly recovered from the attack of scarlet fever which prostrated her in Australia.

Society of Friends.

Warwick, Leicester, and Stafford quarterly meeting has been held at Leicester. The meeting on ministry and oversight was well attended. The meeting for worship on the 26th ult. was a time of searching of heart, as the message was given and repeated to Friends to let their influence be felt in their own neighbourhoods.

Howard and Louisa Nicholson have conducted a mission at Close House. The two friends did a large amount of visiting, which undoubtedly helped to swell the large numbers who attended night after night. On one occasion about eighty members and friends attended an open-air meeting. A number professed conversion.

There was a good attendance at Western Quarterly Meeting, held at Leominster on the 27th ult., the meeting on ministry and oversight the previous evening being better attended than usual. The meeting for worship next day was impressively reminded of the pre-eminent importance of soul-winning from the text, "He that is wise winneth souls."

Fallen Asleep.

The Congregational Church at Wanstead has sustained a loss in the death of Mr. Thomas Bird, one of the founders of the church, and for more than thirty years a deacon.—On September 4, at Bloemfontein, from wounds received in action, Richard Vivian Cory, 1st Company (Wiltshire) Imperial Yeomanry, son of Mr. Richard Cory, J.P., Oscar House, Cardiff.—Aged seventy-one, Rev. H. F. Long, Canon of Newcastle. In the year 1864 he was appointed vicar of Ferryhill, and in 1887, vicar of Bamburgh. He held the latter position up to the time of his death.

The Christian Life-Boat Crew.

At the recent muster of the "crew" at Miss Child's Welcome Home, Canning Town, Col. Macgregor and Mr. R. C. Morgan spoke on the text for the month, given by Miss Child, in the words taken from Rom. xii. 1, "The mercies of God." A sea captain, soon to sail, said he should go forth under the blessing of the mercies of God. Miss Dabinett, an old friend of Miss Child, linked the mercies of God with chapter viii. of the Epistle. Mr. Wm. Luff, fresh from the hop-yards of Worcestershire, concluded by referring to the returning hop-pickers bringing away the apples of the country. The mercies of God were more numerous than the fruit in the orchards. Let us make some our own, and bear them to our homes. The Life-Boat Crew are preparing for the winter work. Missions desiring their services should write to Miss Child, Welcome Home, Canning Town, London, E.

Dublin Deaf and Dumb Institution.—The useful and worthy efforts of this agency in the interests of the afflicted are continued with much encouragement. The deaf and dumb of all denominations are assisted in securing suitable employment, while the sick are visited in their homes or hospitals, and pecuniary relief is administered to deserving cases. But the great object of the Association is to furnish religious instruction in the language of finger and sign. Weekly services and meetings are held, and the reading-room is well supplied with interesting and simple religious literature. The mission thus renders instruction, consolation, and assistance to God's afflicted children. The secretary and missionary is Rev. Maurice F. G. Hewson, Deaf and Dumb Association, Lower Abbey Street, Dublin.

Conference at Glasgow.

THE twenty-first annual conference has proved in different ways to be probably the most successful of such gatherings at St. George's Cross Tabernacle, Glasgow. Pastor Findlay struck the key-note at the opening—on Saturday, September 30—by reading from Malachi iii. 10-16, the call to "prove" the Lord by bringing "all the tithes," as well as the reference to "the book of remembrance." He then bore testimony that during his absence on a recent foreign tour the work of the Lord had so prospered as to be in a better state on his return than when he left. The two evangelists who had conducted the services during that period were the opening speakers. Mr. James Macfarlane's message was based on Ittai's words to David (2 Samuel xv. 21), which he compared to Ruth's declaration to Naomi. Taking Ittai as a type of the young convert, his profession was shown to have been made voluntarily, publicly, and openly: "God will not have a divided heart. . . . Ittai gave all he had, and himself as well." Mr. Hugh Paton gave an address on "The Love of Jesus" (John xiii. 23), in which it was pointed out that while the apostle answers many questions in his Gospel, one still remains unanswered—"Why does Jesus love me? If you ask me, I cannot tell you. Why does the sun shine? I do not know. It is just the way, the nature of Jesus to love us in this fashion."

THE CALL FROM CHINA.

The many links between the Tabernacle and China lent a particular interest in the reappearance on the platform, after an interval of fifteen years, of Mr. Stanley P. Smith (China Inland Mission). After a searching and helpful address, in which he showed that true joy and happiness, alike in heaven and on earth, consist in God having his right place, he told a terrible tale of the sufferings and martyrdom of some of his fellow-missionaries in North China. He called attention to the remarkable testimony borne by one of the survivors, that through all the time there had never been heard one word of murmuring. The prayerful sympathy of the congregation was roused to the highest pitch when Mr. Walter B. Sloan asked to be remembered before the Throne, during the trying and difficult mission to China on which he hopes to set out in a few weeks. Dealing with the call to the Church which is ringing out from China, his cry was: "If the China Inland Mission can go through what it has done, and not be a far greater spiritual blessing than ever, God have mercy on us! If the Church can hear all these things from China, and not rise to an entirely new level in missionary work, God have mercy on us! We believe that all these sufferings, even in death, are but one way in which God has expressed his love to his people."

BRAZIL AND EGYPT.

Brazil was represented by Mr. Harry J. McCall, who began by emphasising the fact that while "the blessing of the Old Testament was prosperity, the blessing of the New Testament is adversity;" pointing out at the same time the danger of God's people being so much taken up with the glorious inheritance in Jesus Christ, that they forget the other side—namely, his inheritance in the saints. He said he had the joy, some years ago, of being the first missionary sent from Britain, by a missionary society, to "dark Brazil." His testimony was that no one should ever go to such work without being "filled with the Spirit;" and, as an illustration, he told the story of a time of rich blessing in his own work, when the Spirit was graciously experienced in his fulness, after a season of barrenness.

The "Pastor's Hour," following the interval for tea, was given to prayer, with an address by Mr. J. Gordon Logan (from Egypt). Declaring that those who have written or spoken in praise or toleration of such religions as Islam, have done so from inexperience or ignorance, Mr. Logan showed that Mohammedanism can never prepare the way for the Gospel. He pointed out the fine field for mission work afforded by the Delta of the Nile, with its 4,500,000 people dwelling in 11,000 villages, in perfect security under British rule; and said he did not wonder at the lack of blessing at home when such fields are neglected.

"WITH THIS MAN."

Dr. D. Duncan Main (Hangchow), who has received permission to return to China immediately for special service, dwelt on the need of Christians, before there can be any real service anywhere, to be in touch with God, with his commands, and with his cause. "I. The touch of adjustment, Dan. x. 10; II. the touch of equipment, v. 16; III. the touch of power, v. 18."

The closing word for the evening was spoken by Rev. J. Stuart Holden, on the question, "Wilt thou go with this Man?" (Gen. xxiv. 58). The importance was laid on the "with." An affirmative answer, which is the only one that will be acceptable to Jesus Christ, means (1) a choice between the world and Christ; (2) absolute submission to his plans; (3) mutual possessions—all that we have and are belonging to Jesus Christ, all that He is belonging to us; (4) going forth in his presence.

The Lord's Day was a busy time, as well as one of special refreshing. Beginning with the early morning prayer meeting at seven a.m., followed by a missionary prayer meeting at ten a.m., great congregations gathered up morning, afternoon, and evening. The ministry was much blessed; and when, late in the evening, the large company of believers gathered round the Table of the Lord, all felt that his seal was being set on a day of true spiritual feasting.

"BE FILLED WITH THE SPIRIT."

At the "continuation meeting" on Monday evening, the topic was "Being filled with the Spirit" (Eph. v. 18). The first speaker—Mr. Stanley P. Smith—drew special attention to the original glory and beauty of our first parents before the Fall, when the image of the Triune God was reproduced in his creatures, with righteousness, truth, and holiness like his own: the creature in full communion with his Creator, and the fulness of the Creator manifest in the creature. All this was lost, and the Holy Spirit is the Person of the Trinity, with whom we, as sinners, have first to do. He teaches us (1) that we have no native goodness, and (2) the truths which circle round the Cross and Spirit of Christ. After pointing out the real inward meaning of the utter denial of self, Mr. Smith closed with a short personal testimony on the filling of the Holy Spirit.

Following on the same topic, Mr. Holden closed by quoting from the margin of his Bible, the following steps into the fulness of blessing—"(1) I know and believe that there is a Pentecostal blessing still to be enjoyed. (2) This promise is for me as surely as any promise in the Word of God. (3) I cannot grasp it; God must give it. (4) I can never work up to it. (5) I long and desire at any cost to become possessed of this blessing. (6) I am going now to surrender all to obtain this promise. (7) I believe that He accepts me, and I accept Him this very moment."

Among other features which contributed to the success of the conference was the singing of Mrs. Raphael. Before the close a large number testified to having received definite blessing through the presentation of the truth in speech and song. As the result of the collections, a sum of £44 has been divided among various foreign missions.

The Blackgang Mission.—This Mission was commenced in 1873 by Mr. and Mrs. Charles Reade and the ladies of their family. Mrs. Christopher Smith (Mr. Reade's daughter) alone survives, and the Mission is continued by her with all its original devotedness and blessing. A beautiful new iron hall was built two years ago, a thing of beauty inside and out. It was designed by Mr. Newman, of Sandown, who presided at the twenty-seventh anniversary meeting held last Thursday, the speakers from the platform, beside the chairman, were Pastor Gaunt of Sandown, Mr. Corney, and myself. Several spoke from the body of the meeting, one especially remarkable for native wit and wise observation. M.

Prayer for Israel.

THE annual gathering for prayer of the friends of Israel was held at the Central Hall, Philpot Street, E., on Saturday week, and to many it proved a time of blessing. Three meetings were held during the day. The presence of Mr. Wilkinson after his recent serious illness called forth much thanksgiving throughout the day.

The morning subject was "Confession and Thanksgiving, with prayer that God may awaken in the Church of Christ an interest in the Jew warranted by the Word of God." Colonel Morton presided, and spoke on praise as a real power if we bring it into use. Of it God has said, "Whoso offereth praise, glorifieth Me." Dr. McKilliam was to have given an address, but was prevented by professional engagements from coming to the meeting, so Mr. Mathieson spoke in his stead in a sympathetic and helpful manner. Mr. Wilkinson also delivered a brief address.

The afternoon meeting was opened by the reading of Psa. cxlvii., and the subject was "Prayer for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit on the Jews throughout the world," and a considerable time was spent in prayer. Mr. Mathieson presided, and prayer was offered that the Holy Ghost might convict many Jews of sin during their gatherings on the Day of Atonement to be held on the following Tuesday and Wednesday. A rousing address was given by Pastor Fuller Gooch.

Rev. J. Wilkinson presided over the evening gathering, when the special subject for intercession was "Prayer for all Missions to the Jews; that men and women engaged in the work may be filled with the Holy Spirit, and that the modes of work may be such as are approved by the Word and the Spirit of God." The chairman's address was preceded and followed by much prayer and thanksgiving. Rev. Samuel Wilkinson and Mr. E. Samuel, lately returned from Morocco, followed.

Evangelical Alliance Conference.

ARRANGEMENTS for the fifty-fourth annual Conference of the Evangelical Alliance, to be held at Liverpool on October 24, 25, and 26, are rapidly approaching completion. St. George's Hall, near Lime Street Station, has been secured, and the local clergy and ministers are manifesting a deep interest in the proceedings, which promise to be largely attended. Particulars of the meetings are appended:

Wednesday, October 24.—6 to 7, Reception; 7 to 9, addresses of Welcome; Chairman, the Lord Bishop of Liverpool.

Thursday, October 25.—10.15, Prayer; 11, "Textual Criticism, with special reference to the Word of God," Professor Margoliouth; 3, "The Union of all Believers," Rev. G. Campbell Morgan and Rev. C. G. Moore; 7.30, China and the Gospel, Mr. Stanley Smith and Rev. H. B. Macartney.

Friday, October 26.—10.15, Prayer meeting; 11, "The Inspiration and Authority of the Word of God," Rev. H. B. Macartney and Pastor Fuller Gooch; 3, Evangelical Alliance work in Russia, Finland, France, Germany, and other countries; speakers, Dr. Baedeker, Dr. Gritton, Mr. E. W. Lonnbeck (Finland), Pastor Mascher (Saxony), and others; 7.30, "The Romanizing Movement in our land, the relation of the Evangelical Alliance thereto;" chairman, Ven. Archdeacon Taylor, D.D.; speakers, Mr. Samuel Smith, M.P., Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, and Rev. F. Stuart Gardiner.

A meeting will also be held in the Holy Trinity Presbyterian Church, Birkenhead, on Thursday, October 25, at 7.30. All information will be gladly furnished by the general secretary, Mr. E. P. Field, 7, Adam Street, Strand, W.C.

Friends of Armenia.—In a recent letter, Miss Cantlow, secretary, writes:—"We are finding it more difficult to help the women this year by disposing of their work. Some of the poor workers have had to be turned off at Harpoot and Marash. We earnestly desire to take them on again during the winter months, as many of them are absolutely dependent on the few piasters they can earn this way. We are shortly having a sale in the neighbourhood of London. The office of the Society is 47, Victoria Street, Westminster, S.W."

Obituary.

TWO EVANGELISTIC VETERANS.

THE ranks of the Evangelization Society have been thinned recently by the home-call of two veterans, who, during many years preached the Gospel faithfully and with much acceptance—Mr. John Harris and Mr. Henry Murch. The former had the longer and perhaps the wider sphere, but both were men of sterling worth and fidelity, possessing accurate knowledge of the Word of God, and gifted to preach the Gospel to the multitude. Both were much used in their ministry.

J. W.

REV. A. GRIFFITHS.

The name of Rev. A. Griffiths, who recently passed away at the age of seventy-five, is intimately associated with Llanelly, where he had been rector for many years. He was a staunch Evangelical. In spite of great difficulties, he worked with much energy and zeal, and several mission churches were erected in the parish. The deceased loved to talk of the great revival which took place in his parish during the early years of his ministry.

MR. HENRY WOOD, J.P.

Many will learn with sorrow that Mr. Henry Wood, J.P., treasurer of the Baptist Union of Great Britain and Ireland, has just passed away. Mr. Wood was only taken seriously ill two or three weeks since, with an internal complaint, and though Sir William Broadbent performed an operation, the end came with alarming suddenness. Mr. Wood was officially connected with nearly all Baptist societies and institutions, and many philanthropic agencies have received from him substantial help. Throughout London and the provinces his death will be sincerely regretted by Free Churchmen of all denominations, and especially in Baptist circles, where his deep piety was known and admired.

REV. DR. MUIRHEAD.

Intelligence was received in London on Thursday last of the death of Rev. William Muirhead, D.D., the veteran missionary of the L.M.S. at Shanghai. Dr. Muirhead was held in high and general esteem for his spirituality, his devotion, and his conspicuous services to the missionary cause. Dr. Muirhead was born at Leith in 1822, and studied at Cheshunt College. In addition to his work in Shanghai itself, which began in 1847, he has made repeated journeys into the country beyond, on one occasion narrowly escaping death at the hands of a Chinese mob. For some years he was pastor of Union Chapel, Shanghai. As early as 1866 he visited Peking, and from there made a tour into Mongolia. He has, in the course of his long missionary career, prepared numerous educational and other works in the Chinese language, and also a book for English readers on "China and the Gospel." Our readers will recall Dr. Muirhead's jubilee in 1897, and the cordial and widespread interest which was shown in the event.

MR. ABRAHAM WALLIS.

An old warrior has just been called home to rest. Abraham Wallis, seventy-nine years of age next birthday, gently passed into his Master's presence on Monday, October 1. For some years he has been conscious of physical infirmity; yet he manfully and patiently struggled against being counted an invalid, and his bath chair took him to many a Gospel service, where he simply, and yet with a warmth of tender earnestness, told out the Saviour's love. He will be much missed in many centres of evangelistic activity, especially so at Bignold Hall, Forest Gate, a work in which for many years he took a keen interest, both as an under shepherd and in the public ministry. By birthright a Quaker, he ever maintained a deep appreciation of spiritual worship, but was very large-hearted in his sympathies, and welcomed to his house all who loved our Lord Jesus Christ. The occasion of his golden wedding some three years ago was quite a gathering of the servants of Christ, with many of whom he had laboured side by side for years. Some ten months afterwards his devoted partner, Ellen Wallis, received her home-call—she who had for so long been one with him in service for Christ.

On the Thursday before he died, it was arranged that Mr. Wallis should conduct the marriage service of two young Christians of the meeting at Bignold Hall, and indeed the two recent Sundays he had preached there to large audiences, with great power and tenderness, from the texts: "And sitting down, they watched Him there," and "Let him that is athirst come." Once a week he conducted a Bible reading for young women engaged in business, assembling in his own house from 9.15 p.m., after their day's toil; and many received blessing at that service. He was generally punctual at his men's class at nine o'clock on Sunday mornings, and his fatherly interest endeared him much to the members. For many years he was a diligent preacher in the Evangelization Society, conducting Gospel meetings wherever the door opened for him. His ministry was direct, personal, and loving; and his face beamed with tender zeal as he pleaded with his audience to decide for Christ now. The evangelists and workers of the great American London Tent Campaign made his house their rendezvous for hospitality in the East End, and he was never more happy than with half a dozen of God's tired workers sitting at his simple table, where he made everyone feel welcome. His only unmarried daughter was his constant companion in Gospel work, and seconded his testimony by her consecrated voice in Gospel song.

There were some 800 persons present at the funeral service, which was touchingly conducted by his old and valued friend, Mr. C. Russell Hurditch, with whom he had been closely associated for many years in the Gospel. The coffin was lowered into the grave by his six sons and grandsons—an interesting incident in the sad ceremony. Abraham Wallis used to say that, as a little boy, the sainted Sarah Grubb led him to the knowledge of the Saviour's love; and though perhaps the last part of his life showed the greatest devotion to the cause and work of his Saviour, yet quite recently, in a Railway Mission meeting at Stratford, did he thrill his 400 hearers with the story of his conversion, and his nearly seventy years of Christian experience. This meeting was felt by all present to be one of great power and much blessing to many hearts who felt the spirit of his loving entreaties. Mr. Wallis took a very keen interest in the medical mission work, being president of a prosperous branch in Bignold Hall, Forest Gate.

Gosport Convention.

ON September 25-27, meetings were held in the Thorngate Hall. A prayer meeting held at seven each morning, commencing in the Board Room, was so well attended as to necessitate its transfer to the hall. Captain T. M. Riley, K.R.R., presided throughout, giving a brief exposition each morning on the Epistle to the Colossians.

Dr. White led his hearers on by easy steps from the acceptance of Christ to assurance, cleansing by the blood, and finally to the infilling of the Holy Spirit, with all his manifold blessings. Mr. Thomas Hogben, of Portsmouth, dwelt on the privileges connected with prayer, supported by striking answers to prayer occurring within his own knowledge. These two addresses were very helpful, and were much enjoyed.

At the close of a public tea on Wednesday, Mr. and Mrs. Dickins, from Alexandria, gave an account of their work in the Delta, while Miss Dixon told of her labours on behalf of railway men.

This Convention, the first of the kind held in Gosport, was well attended throughout, and has proved a time of great refreshment. W. T. F.

Flower Girls' Mission.—Harvest-thanksgiving services, in connection with Mr. John A. Groom's work, have been held at the Mission Chapel, Woodbridge Street, Clerkenwell. A considerable amount of produce was given, mostly by the poor, and is to be sent to the Clacton Orphanage. The spacious chapel was filled, and the preaching was of an impressive character.

The Free Church Council.

AN important meeting of the General Committee of the Free Church Council was held last week at the Memorial Hall, Rev. C. H. Kelly presiding.

Dr. Paton, of Nottingham, expounded his scheme for "A Ministers' Concert of Prayer." His idea is that "every Saturday evening all the evangelical ministers throughout the world should be engaged in prayer for each other and for the purity, spirituality, and power of the Church of Christ, and for the Kingdom of God all over the world." Dr. Paton is willing to receive the names of those who desire to enrol for this concert.

Mr. Kelly assured Dr. Paton of the hearty support of the Council, and promised that everything possible would be done to further the scheme. A circular is to be sent out by the National Council explaining and commending it.

Reference was made by Rev. Thomas Law, to the forthcoming simultaneous evangelistic mission. He spoke of the heartiness with which councils throughout the country are taking up the work, and acknowledged the valuable help which the Press is giving to the project. The scheme for the Free Church Girls' Guild is to have the first place in the National Council's programme immediately the simultaneous mission is over. But, in the meantime, local councils throughout the country have begun to enrol members and to develop various forms of activity.

Mr. Law also reported that, starting with the county of Sussex, it is proposed to supply all deficiencies in the provision for Free Church worship that may exist in that county. A well-known layman in Sussex has offered to give financial help to set the scheme in operation, and it is expected that other counties will follow the lead of Sussex. Mr. Law added that sixteen new councils have been formed, and that the movement throughout the country is displaying great activity.

Pastor A. G. Brown's Work.

LAST Monday was a high day at Chatsworth Road Chapel, West Norwood. Since Mr. Archibald G. Brown entered upon the pastorate three years ago, 500 members have been added to the church. There was not sufficient accommodation for the Sunday school; but a man of business gave a thankoffering of £1,000 for spiritual blessing in his family, and another friend replaced the pulpit by a platform, at a cost of £140. The former sum was towards an addition, now completed, of two fine halls, with class-rooms, which greatly add to the efficiency and possibilities of the work. The cost has been £4,500, of which something less than £2,000 remains to be provided.

On Monday afternoon Dr. A. T. Pierson preached a powerful sermon on "The Lamb, from Genesis to Revelation," accentuating God's unspeakable gift in "the precious blood of Christ." At the evening meeting Mr. R. C. Morgan presided, and addresses were given by Dr. John Robertson, Pastor W. Fuller Gooch, Mr. W. H. Seagram, and Pastor Douglas Brown, of Bristol, son of Mr. Archibald Brown. They all, with the pastor himself, emphasized the foundation principles of the Gospel, which is the power of God unto salvation to everyone that believeth.

Notes & Comments

OUR next issue will contain as a Supplement a copy of The Christian Sheet Almanack for 1901, with portraits of Messrs. Moody and Sankey, and illustrations of Northfield and its institutions connected with the life and work of these great evangelists. The sheet displays a Scripture portion for every day in the year, and contains the usual postal information. This year there will be no additional charge for the Almanack; but the price of the issue will be, as usual, One Penny.

The news from China this week has been depressing both as regards the state of "British interests" and missionary work. It is reported that fifty-six missionaries in North Shan-si, hitherto missing, have all been massacred. The American Bible Society has received news from Shanghai concerning sixty-six men, seventy-three women, and thirty-nine children of the Protestant missionary parties in China, of whom eleven men, nineteen women, and thirteen children have unquestionably been killed, while few of the remainder can possibly have escaped. Seven more missionaries, belonging to the China Inland Mission, have been martyred, and the worst is feared concerning several others. It is clear that the infuriated Chinese have ceased to distinguish between the Roman Catholic missionaries, who have by their interference in political matters brought the missions into disrepute, and Protestants, who have rigorously refrained from exercising any but spiritual influence. Innocent and guilty have been involved in one common ruin. The outlook is indeed dark; but it is out of these terrible calamities that Christian truth has ever won its greatest and most abiding victories.

Amid the shadow that has fallen on one of the most important mission fields, an optimistic note is welcome and justifiable concerning the future of missionary enterprise. An American preacher in this country just now, in a recent sermon put the case thus:

> The Anglo-Saxon population doubles itself in every seventy years, in England every fifty years, in America every twenty-five years; within the borders of some pagan lands in ten or even five years; and the Anglo-Saxon is essentially Christian in influence, and carries Christianity with him wherever he goes.

This may be a little crudely put, but there is no doubt about the facts. Broadly speaking, the path of the Anglo-Saxon during the past century has been identical, or at the least parallel, with that of missions. In order, therefore, to evangelize the whole earth, we must thoroughly imbue the Anglo-Saxon with an ever deepening faith in Christ. The battle of missions abroad will thus depend on the evangelization of our people at home—i.e., in every English-speaking country.

One of the features of the election is the alleged wholesale giving of the Irish vote in England, at the bidding of the Roman Catholic hierarchy, to the Government with a view to securing a Catholic University in Dublin. The sympathy of some of our most powerful politicians has already been openly declared in favour of this, and it is clear that the Protestants of the country will have to watch this question carefully, lest a crying evil be perpetrated, and the clock of the Reformation be set back two or three centuries. The danger is all the more immediate and subtle, because nothing has been said publicly during the election about the matter, though the evidence seems conclusive that a private arrangement was come to in some of the constituencies. All things considered, there is not the slightest doubt that keen vigilance will be required during the term of the coming Parliament on this and other allied movements.

The first task, therefore, which the true leaders of the people will have to undertake will be to restore the old love of peace, and a belief in it as the condition of true moral being and progress. The next will be to turn the public attention resolutely from its exaggerated absorption in foreign or even Colonial affairs to the difficult problems and crying evils that confront us at home, and have long been calling loudly for settlement. The recent election addresses and manifestos were singularly silent on these evils. Nothing serious was said or promised by any of our leaders on the drink question, on the better housing of the poor, on due provision for old age, and these are matters that cannot wait indefinitely, especially the first and second. The "home programme" was practically a blank. When the nation begins to recover from the war-fever, it will have to face these arrears of legislation with spirit and determination, if we are not to fall into a state of national decay and ruin.

New Zealand has set the Mother Country a good example in the way of legislation in regard to the relations between capital and labour, the Industrial Conciliation and Arbitration Act in that land having rendered strikes and their consequent misery impossible, work going on even during the period of the arbitration. The conditions of labour generally have been improved under the Act, while, on the other hand, the masters are protected against the stoppage of business, and also against the competition of the "sweater." Naturally, trade is very prosperous. It is earnestly to be hoped that the new Parliament will have both the desire and the opportunity to deal with the matter in these islands, if only in the interest of the women and children who suffer so much during the unhappily frequent conflicts between masters and men.

Manchester has given a capital lead to other cities in regard to the management of the drink traffic. No new licences have been granted anywhere in the district, except in Salford. Applications for rebuilding have been very sharply watched by the magistrates themselves. In Manchester ten licences have been refused owing to police objections, and in addition there are twenty-two licences that have lapsed owing mainly to "public improvements." The police opposed seventy-nine licences, many of which had more than one conviction recorded against them. This determined onslaught on the drinking centres of the city of Manchester was made possible, indeed, only because public opinion was so thoroughly roused on the side of Reform—and in this great praise is due to the splendid service rendered by the Wesleyan Mission, superintended by Rev. S. F. Collier.

Take one instance. The Watch Committee heartily backed up the protest of the chief constable against the way in which the bar at one of the theatres was conducted, and decided that the play licence should be renewed only on condition that no excise licence be taken out. The drink interest was alarmed, and convened a meeting of sympathisers, at which only forty-two persons attended; while congregations of 4,000 and 1,700 at the Free Trade Hall and the Central Hall passed enthusiastic resolutions in support of the Committee. The City Council, as a consequence, upheld the decision of the Watch Committee, and a sturdy blow for decency was struck at a crying evil. Other towns and cities will do well to follow the lead of the two great Lancashire cities, of Liverpool and Manchester, in this direction.

In the American Outlook, there is an outspoken article by an ex-prohibitionist on the condition of the drink problem in civilized countries. His chief point is directed at the common mistake of denouncing the "dram-seller," instead of attacking the "dram-drinker," without whose custom the former would not exist. It would be equally well not to forget the shareholder in the drink traffic, whose interest it is, indirectly at least, that there should be as much drinking as possible. These three form a tri-partnership in the maintenance of the "trade," and as they form a very large percentage of the community it is clear that the battle of temperance will be a long and bitter one.

A speaker at a recent congress called attention to the very remarkable deterioration which has taken place within the last few years in periodical religious literature. It is evident in this way, that whereas once we could open certain magazines with the assurance of finding something for both mind and heart, now we are treated to repletion with short stories and scrappy bits gathered from all sources. No doubt it is a question of demand and supply. People are more frivolous than they used to be, and the present demand is for light reading, even in the religious world. Some light reading there must be, but at present we are overdone with it, and the effect of it cannot be healthy, either for mind or heart. People forget that they have but one mind, and that if they dissipate it with an excess of light reading, they unfit themselves for hard and serious thought. We wish some Editors had the courage to go against the tide, and to provide strong and durable aliment for mind and heart.

The churches of Wales are awakening to the fact that serious inroads are being made on the observance of the Lord's Day in that country. Sunday travelling, golfing, cycling, &c., are greatly on the increase, extra trains having been recently put on by some of the Welsh companies to meet the demand. A conference is to be held immediately on this subject at Pontypridd, and the Congregational Churches of Glamorganshire, where the evil is at its worst, are about to open a vigorous campaign against all kinds of Sunday travelling. There is no country where the Sabbath has been better kept for generations, or to better purpose, than Wales, and it would be a grievous evil if its pre-eminence in this matter were to be lost. "Let no man take away thy crown."

One of the noblest utterances on patriotism that has been delivered for many a long day was given by Rev. Moffatt Logan at Leicester last week. It is not surprising to learn that he received a great ovation at the conclusion of his address. We wish that in some way this address could be distributed throughout the country at the present juncture when patriotism is so largely an affair of shouting. Mr. Logan uttered the following trenchant words in his peroration :—

I shall venture to tell even the men of Leicester that Christian patriots can only come from Christian homes. Woe to this nation when the family altar is removed to make room for the table where the members of the family circle play at cards, until all thought of unity in prayer has disappeared. Woe to this nation when the modern novel ousts the ancient Scriptures as the standard of morality. . . . If you are really a lover of your country's lasting glory and do not wish her to become as Babylon and Tyre, you will do well to make your home, and through your home your children, altogether God's.

Lady Alice Royle's paper in a contemporary, upon "A Century of Legislation for Women and Children," shows what striking improvements and developments have been effected for the good of the two classes in question during the past hundred years, leading to a wonderful change in their lot. What vast strides have been taken is shown by the fact that only in 1817 was the Act passed to abolish the "public whipping of female offenders," and that even so recently as 1842, women and children were required, as Lord Shaftesbury said, to work

Surrounded by an atmosphere of vice and pollution, and under circumstances of coarse and loathsome exposure to which savage life scarcely affords a parallel.

It must not be forgotten, however, that, much as has been done by legislation, more has been affected by religious and philanthropic effort, without which many of the evils now swept away would still have continued to disgrace our national life. Christianity must ever be a leading factor in genuine social improvement.

The retirement of Dr. Bickersteth from the see of Exeter is a matter of deep interest outside that diocese, for, valuable as the venerable prelate's labours have been in that district, he has, perhaps, been even a greater power beyond its boundaries. As the compiler of the Hymnal Companion, so widely used in Evangelical churches throughout England, his name is known in many places which have not been reached by his theological writings. It may be said that his whole work has been for Christ, the guiding influence being love for the Master. Referring to his life and work in terms somewhat qualified by the fact that that he was "a Protestant," a High Church contemporary says :—

Were we all—bishops, priests, and laity—as single-minded and as single-hearted in the love and service of our Lord, error would soon be dissipated by the very force of charity; and understanding one another, we should soon find our common basis on the rock of the Faith, whole, unmutilated, unimpaired, once delivered to the Saints.

The recent unveiling of a Bunyan memorial window in the church of St. Saviour's, Southwark, the "South London's new cathedral" as it has been called, marks another point in the history of the "inspired tinker," and may serve to show how the influence of Bunyan continues to grow age after age. Although centuries have gone by since he preached the Gospel in the little Meeting House in Zoar Street, Southwark, he being dead yet speaketh to thousands through "The Pilgrim's Progress," that immortal volume of which Froude truthfully remarked, "time cannot impair its interest, or intellectual progress make it cease to be true to experience." It would be of priceless advantage if it were read by young and old as diligently in the present as in former days.

Some months ago, in commenting upon the destruction of a notorious block of houses in London, we remarked upon the probable dispersion of the dealers in immoral literature who for so long had made that district their headquarters. A contemporary now says :—

At the present time the bestial crew has emerged from the alley to the street, and sells its debased and debasing wares unchecked; and comments upon the grave decline from a decent standard of public morals which the fact indicates. There is little doubt that in such matters the supply creates the demand, and certainly it is a crying scandal that such things should be in our midst, whilst those whose duty it is to watch over the public morals sit regardless, or make flimsy excuses for their laxity. The Psalmist's question is as pressing as ever to-day—"Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his way?" And the answer is true as ever—"By taking heed thereto according to thy Word."

A Welsh contemporary estimates the cost of the Taff Vale strike at about £400,000, of which sum the men had to sustain upwards of three-fourths, the Company losing about £20,000, and the unfortunate miners—about 30,000 colliers having been thrown out of work in consequence of the strike—having suffered heavily, the reduction in the production of coal showing a loss of £300,000. Think of the family suffering this involves.

"Finally, brethren, be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might." It is significant that this is the climax of the "Epistle of Growth"—that to the Ephesians. The last great end of the Gospel in relation to the formation of the Christian character is—to make men strong in Christ. His wonderful gentleness of spirit, and quietness of manner, were but the silken robe that covered a Divine and immovable strength. And what He was, we are to be, deriving from Him the power to be steadfast, immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord. We are usually so absorbed in listening and responding to the wonderful voices of tenderness, and compassion, and appeal, which echo through the Gospel, that we forget the many rousing calls, the clarion cries, which send forth their quickening summons to us, to show ourselves to be true followers of the "unconquerable Christ." The weakness of Christians is the reproach of the Church. The Christian faith is qualified to develop a race of strong men and women in all that is Christlike and good.

There is a growing habit of applauding preachers during the delivery of sermons upon "great occasions." In many quarters it is becoming quite the fashion for audiences to cheer the preacher much as they would applaud a lecturer or a politician. It strikes us as both mischievous and irreverent. It places both preacher and congregation in a false position, and it constitutes a terrible temptation to the preacher to utter mere pleasantries. When Lacordaire was once applauded in this manner, he stopped, and said with severity, "Gentlemen, this is indecorous; the Word of God is not to be applauded but obeyed." The habit would soon cease if preachers would emulate this noble example.

The Vision and the Veil.—I.

By the Late Rev. W. A. GRAY.

"Seeing then that we have such hope, we use great plainness of speech: and not as Moses, which put a veil over his face, that the children of Israel could not steadfastly look to the end of that which is abolished" (2 Cor. iii. 12, 13).

THIS text brings before us the boldness and freedom which attend a firm persuasion of the Gospel. Those who know and realize it, in its certainty and clearness, and especially in its permanence, as an indestructible and unfading thing, will use great plainness of speech.

That is the point the apostle is speaking to. He refers to Moses, and the veil with which he covered his face, as he came down from Sinai, with the radiance on his countenance caught by speaking with God.

And why did he veil his face? The apostle gives the reason, not lest the children of Israel should be dazzled, but lest they should "look steadfastly to the end of that which was abolished." What was that? What was the thing the abolition of which Moses was unwilling that the people should see? The light that was playing on his face. That light was a fading one. It got less and less as he spoke. And it finally vanished altogether, only to shine again when he re-ascended the mount, and caught it, where he caught it first, in the sacred place of vision, amidst the beauty and brightness of God.

The thought is just this: The consciousness of a dying vision imposed a certain restraint and reserve upon Moses. "But we," says St. Paul, "have no such fear. Our vision is permanent; its glory is abiding; the possession of a light inextinguishable, shining more and more to the perfect day—such is the Gospel heritage; and with such prospects as these, having a hope so great, so divine, so everlasting, we can afford to use great plainness of speech."

The sense of a fading vision begets uncertainty and irresolution of speech: the sense of a vision that is fadeless begets, just as really, openness and determination of speech. On these two points, then, let us meditate for a little: (1) the passing glory which necessitates a veil; and (2) the abiding glory that needs no veil at all.

I. The Passing Glory that calls for a Veil.—Observe, the case of Moses is not in all points parallel with ours. The disappearance of the brightness from his face was necessary, for the manifestation of another and a better glory—a glory that crowned and fulfilled it, as the glory of the Gospel crowns the glory of the law, as the glory of the New Testament crowns the glory of the Old. The one fact to be noticed for our purpose is, that it was passing. And if that were sufficient to make even Moses use a veil, with all his belief of the reality of his message, and with all his persuasion of its power, much more will it make others use a veil, for whom the glory is passing, for different reasons and with different effects.

And there are such. We find them in other than religious spheres. Here, for instance, is a man who, in beginning of life, is wedded to and possessed by some particular theory, perhaps scientific, political, or social. He is filled with the thought of it; he is fired with the fervour of it; he proclaims it everywhere. But in time you see a change. He does not speak with the same frequency. Language, once definite, is now ambiguous. Mottoes and watchwords, once clear, now become vague. He does not put things with the same strength or outspokenness that he did before. Why? Because in his heart of hearts he feels the supposed revelation to be vanishing. It is ceasing to shine in the light of truth, and therefore it is ceasing to inspire with the sense of certainty. Hence the vagueness, the faltering speech.

But we see it in religious spheres too. There is a large class of people at the present day, including not a few religious teachers both in the Pulpit and in the Press, whose inner relation to the great Christian truths is of a

DOUBTFUL AND HALF-HEARTED KIND.

The traces, the remnants, the flicker of the old certainty are there; but the glow gets less and less. Conscious of this, they alter their speech accordingly, and begin to talk through a screen. They soften, they shade, they mystify. There is the dropping of the great Christian phrases, and the putting of others in place of them. There is the drawing of the pen through the time-honoured watchwords of the faith, and the writing of substitutes above them fraught with a naturalistic meaning and capable of a naturalistic use.

Thus the Deity of Christ becomes the divineness of Christ; forgiveness through atonement becomes stimulus through example; justification by faith becomes peace through self-sacrifice; sanctification through grace becomes amendment through effort; and so on, through the whole round of Christian doctrine, to the perplexing and over-shadowing of all.

Yes, and the same result is reached by some who retain the old Christian phrases, and give them a CHANGED AND LOWERED MEANING.

They adhere to the old vocabulary; they use the old Christian watchwords—the Incarnation, Cross, Resurrection, Ascension, Regeneration, Conversion, Prayer; they will write books and preach sermons that will often lead the unsuspecting to believe they are speaking from the fulness of the warmest and simplest of evangelical creeds. And yet to those who know better they are shuffling with words, using them in a double and ambiguous sense, and are at heart uncertain of the faith. Ah! from such men the glory may be gradually vanishing. They are unwilling to confess it; they do not want others to see to the end of that which is, in their case, about to be abolished—old principles, old enthusiasms, old beliefs. And so they have recourse to a veil.

And in our personal religious life have not many of us had to own to the same tendency, this growing vagueness, this growing reserve in speaking of spiritual matters? Once you could talk of them freely; now not quite so freely. Once, if religious parents, it was your pleasure to gather the children round your knees, and instruct them in Christian story and Christian truth: now—well, the Sunday school will serve the same end; let the children go there. Once, if religious workers, it was your pleasure to visit the sick, with a word of Christian consolation or of Christian experience to them that are weary: now—well the minister may do that; let the sick look to him. Once you were up in arms when a Christian principle was sneered at, or a Christian doctrine was assailed; the fire kindled suddenly in the heart, the testimony leapt readily to the lip: now the feelings are comparatively unmoved, the tongue is comparatively silent.

WHY HAVE YOU CHANGED?

Why, instead of outspokenness, quick, sharp, clear, have you turned to whispers, hints, feeble, timid, and mechanical? Why have you taken to wearing a veil? Ah! can it be that the glory is going? The light that is reflected from spiritual realities, the light that is fed by spiritual zeal, is it passing away? You are losing the things you have wrought; you are parting with the visions you have gained. And till you get them back again—and, thank God! it is possible to get them back, to have the glow rekindled and the face rebrightened—till that is the case, if it is ever to be the case, the veil must remain.

ARE OUR METHODS OF EVANGELIZING THE BEST?

No reader of The Christian will deny the need of a mission such as the Free Churches are planning for the New Year, in view of the startling fact that, notwithstanding the evident prosperity of the different Christian Churches in the land, more than half the population of the country are actually outside their influence. But what method is to be adopted? Whence are we to obtain the preachers who will draw the masses to the Gospel. There are hardly a dozen really popular evangelists in the land altogether. It is reasonable that only the largest centres of population shall command their services. There is, in addition, a fair number of earnest, faithful, and consecrated men who have accomplished in this department of Christian activity a large amount of abiding good. But, as they are not so well known in country places, and no particular romance gathers around their names, it is extremely doubtful whether they will be able to lay hold of the very people we are anxious to reach.

And now I come to what has been in my experience of united missions, and which ought not, I think, to be withheld. As a secretary of a provincial council, I have been intimately connected with two great united missions in my town. Two years ago we had one, and more recently another, well-known evangelist, each for a nine days' mission in the largest public hall in the town. We made preparations on a liberal and extensive scale, both as regards advertisements and house-to-house visitation. The Free Churches were in perfect accord, and our united prayer meetings, preceding the mission, were most helpful and happy. And yet neither of these good brethren was able to draw more than the barest sprinkling of the very people for whom the mission was specially undertaken; while the converts were, with few exceptions, drawn from those who were previously attending our own churches.

Why do I mention this? Not to depreciate the memorable services these brethren have rendered us. Both of them are, in a true sense, men of God. Their words were charged with grace and power. Still, that the large mass of outsiders was barely touched.

What, then, is to be done? Are such attempts to be abandoned altogether? By no means. But, guided by our past experience, is it not high time now to revise our methods, and ask whether an evangelist from a distance is altogether a sine qua non in united missions? I am inclined to think that we have been leaning too much on outsiders. In many country towns one or other of the local ministers, by a well-devised plan, and a thoroughly united effort, may, under God's blessing, succeed even more than such a visitor, of whom the non-church-goers know absolutely nothing. I submit, that when a minister has been in a town for a number of years, and thus become known to almost every inhabitant, if a united mission were held in a public building, with equal preparation as to advertising, effective choir-singing, and willing helpers, and the minister himself were the evangelist, a fair number of outsiders might be gathered in. There are, I believe, non-church-going people in every town who would like to hear their local ministers preach, but for some reason or other do not care to come to their respective churches. In a public building they would feel perfectly free, and might come there in great numbers. Only let the preparations be honestly taken up, and conducted on a thoroughly generous scale; then, with faith in God, a quenchless love for souls, and a devoted band of workers, the effort might yield a harvest that would rebuke our hesitation, and make us ashamed of our groundless timidity.

Every Minister of the Gospel ought to be his own evangelist.

WE MINISTERS CLAIM to have been called by God and our churches to preach the Gospel; if we fail in this, we have missed our calling. For myself, I feel that the time for writing for the pulpit finely-polished essays on literary or ethical subjects is long past. The world around us needs nothing so much as the Gospel of the grace of God. There are sorrow-stricken homes, aching and broken hearts, and sin-plagued souls everywhere around us. And if we, who have been called and trained for this very work, cannot bring to these our fellows the all-healing balm of the gladdening evangel, we are of all men the most miserable.

In the name of our Holy Redeemer, for the good of withered and starving souls everywhere near us, let us do something in this direction, even if needs be out of the common run—something that shall help to bring the sweet music of the old, old story home to the people of our land, and win them for the kingdom of our Divine Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

Ashford, Kent. J. P. Thimann.

* Abstract of a paper read before the Kent Free Church Federation.

The Old Hymns.

There's lots of music in 'em, the hymns of long ago.
An' when some gray-haired brother sings the one I used to know,
I sorter want to take a hand—I think o' days gone by,
"On Jordan's stormy banks I stand, and cast a wistful eye."

There's lots o' music in 'em—those dear sweet hymns of old,
With visions bright of lands of light and shining streets of gold;
And I hear 'em ringing—singing, where memory dreaming stands,
"From Greenland's icy mountains to India's coral strands."

They seem to sing for ever of holier, sweeter days,
When the lilies of the love of God bloomed white in all the ways;
And I want to hear their music from the old-time meetin's rise,
Till "I can read my title clear to mansions in the skies."

We never needed singin' books in them old days; we knew
The words, the tunes of every one the dear old hymn-book through!
We didn't have no trumpets then, no organs built for show;
We only sang to praise the Lord "from whom all blessings flow."

An' so I love the dear old hymns, and when my time shall come—
Before the light has left me and my singing lips are dumb—
If I can only hear 'em then, I'll pass, without a sigh,
"To Canaan's fair and happy land, where my possessions lie!"

Elisha, the Prophet of Vision.

By Rev. F. S. WEBSTER, M.A.*

THE superficial Bible student often finds it difficult to distinguish in all their details between the lives of Elijah and Elisha. Both worked miracles, and some of the miracles of Elisha were almost an exact repetition of those of Elijah. Both withstood kings, both witnessed against idolatry, both were the channels of God's overflowing mercy to the heathen. And yet the two men were thoroughly diverse in character and almost the opposite of each other. What St. John was to St. Peter, what Philip Melanchthon was to Martin Luther, such was Elisha to Elijah. Elijah was the prophet of the wilderness, a recluse, an ascetic. Elisha was the prophet of the people, the domestic prophet, the prophet of peace.

The contrast is seen in the introduction of each on the page of Scripture. Elijah appears suddenly, as though dropped from the clouds, with no mention of parentage or early training.

We see him proclaiming the terrible drought and then hiding by the brook Cherith, where he is miraculously fed. A picture of conflict and isolation and Divine guardianship. And this is typical of his whole twelve years' ministry. He is continually in opposition to the king and nation—continually alone without home or following—continually under the special protection of God.

Not so Elisha. He is introduced as the son of Shaphat, a man evidently of wealth and position. We see him ploughing with his eleven men like an ordinary prosperous farmer, enjoying the loving care of father and mother and returning that love with all his heart. He enters upon his ministry as one who rejoiced at the high privilege accorded him. Not the vigil and fast of a mediæval knight, but an al fresco meal, a feast of gladness and goodwill, marks his acceptance of the prophet's mantle. And the contrast continues.

Elijah commences his public ministry with the word of judgment: "Thus saith the Lord, . . . there shall not be dew nor rain these years, but according to my word." Elisha begins with a message of deliverance: "Thus saith the Lord, I have healed these waters, there shall not be thence any more dearth or barren land." Throughout his whole public ministry of over sixty years Elisha is the friend of all, mixing freely with the home life and the public life of his country. So the impression made by Elisha was different from that of Elijah. Elijah impressed the nation with his greatness, his loyalty to Jehovah, his championship of truth, his zeal in opposing error. Elisha impressed men with his goodness. The Shunammite said to her husband, "I perceive that this is a holy man of God which passeth by here continually."

Elisha was pre-eminently the prophet of vision. His faith was clearer and brighter than Elijah's. Elijah in his hour of reaction, when threatened with Jezebel's revenge, exclaimed, "I, even I only, am left; and they seek my life, to destroy it." But Elisha, when surrounded in Dothan, quieted the terrors of his servant by the memorable answer, "Fear not, for they will be with us, are more than they that will be with them." Elijah saw the abounding idolatry and sin until his whole soul burned with indignation, and then sank into despair. He knew nothing, apparently, of the 7,000 that had never bowed the knee to Baal.

Elisha saw the heavenly side of things. He had seen the heavens opened, and his great master swept up in a chariot of fire. That heavenly vision had given to his faith an element of certainty and triumph, which no root of bitterness, no chill of despair, could disturb. If Elijah is, during his public ministry, a type of John the Baptist, Elisha is surely a type of the Christian disciple. We, too, begin with the vision of an open heaven and an ascended Lord, and with the mantle of Divine power. We are called to live amongst men as Elisha did. May we leave the same impress. May we triumph by means of the same vision of faith!

From Rev. F. B. Meyer

TO THE READERS OF "THE CHRISTIAN."

I TRUST it may not be deemed egotistic on my part so often to crave a corner of The Christian, to record God's gracious dealings with me; but it is my only way of corresponding with so many in all parts of the world, who pray for me, because they have derived benefit from my books. And I am so deeply conscious of my dependence on God's blessing, in answer to prayer, that I am driven to take every opportunity of reiterating the Apostle's appeal, "Pray for us."

After the Swedish Conference, described last week, I accompanied the Prince and Princess Bernadotte and other Christian friends to Stockholm, where we had a wonderful Sunday. Twice, one of the greatest churches, which holds 3,000 persons, was densely filled to hear the Word of God, as interpreted by my dear friend, Dr. Fries. In the afternoon the Queen telephoned that I should go out to give an address at the royal residence, but all the time was already fully occupied. The crowning blessing was at a young men's meeting at night. Even as I write, I see again that great gathering of eager faces. And it would seem as though three or four months could be easily spent in Sweden and Norway alone, going from place to place, with the tidings of the full salvation to be found in Jesus Christ.

Here at Berlin we have met with the same blessed welcome. To our surprise, some 600 persons have crowded, night after night, into the noble auditorium of the Y.M.C.A. to hear a series of addresses on the offices and work of the Holy Spirit. Besides which Bible-readings have been arranged for the upper classes in various houses, and in the hall where Fräulein von Blücher, a relative of the famous general, is so usefully and successfully at work.

In all these meetings one is compelled to glory in one's infirmity, for nothing so absolutely divests a man of self-confidence as to be obliged to speak by interpretation. My interpreters have been of the best. Count Bernstorff, Countess von Waldersee, Fräulein von Redern, have done all they could, but one has often cried with Paul, "Remember my bonds." It is therefore with the more confidence I can say, "What hath God wrought. To Him be all the glory."

It had been feared that the strong feeling entertained in Germany on the subject of the Transvaal War would have deterred many from coming to the meetings, but this does not appear to have been the case; and nothing could have been heartier than the welcome extended on all hands to Mrs. Meyer and myself. I am, however, thankful to be returning home, in time for my Thursday noon-service, October 18. F. B. Meyer.

Berlin, October 12.

B.W.T.A.—The National Executive of the British Women's Temperance Association met in Craven Hall, W., on October 9, Lady Henry Somerset in the chair. Resolutions were passed urging the branches to work during the coming winter to create a great public sentiment on behalf of Sunday closing, and against the sale of intoxicants to children. At the instance of Miss Agnes Slack and Mrs. Pearsall Smith, it was agreed to urge the public to abstain from treating the soldiers with intoxicants on their return from South Africa. It was also agreed to widely circulate Lord Wolseley's letter.

"Shamrock and Seaweed" is the title of the fiftieth annual report of the Connemara Orphans' Nursery. It is a record which cannot but appeal to all into whose hands it falls. Hundreds of boys and girls have been trained and educated at Glenowen and Ballyconree, for although the Nursery was established to receive and rescue the orphans of Galway and Mayo rendered destitute by the famine of 1847, it is now open to the whole of Ireland. The inspectors' report, visitors' book, and communications from former inmates of the institutions, attest the value and stability of the work. Several changes have been effected during the year, and new cares and responsibilities lie ahead. Some £250 is required to put in order the Home at Ballyconree, an undertaking which it is essential should be carried out immediately. Communications may be sent to Mr. William Pasley, 11, Buckingham Street, Adelphi, W.C.

Mr. Sankey's Movements.

THE brief provincial tour undertaken by Mr. Ira D. Sankey continues to arouse the deepest interest. Proceeding Northward from Middlesbrough and Sunderland, Mr. Sankey visited Newcastle-on-Tyne on October 9, giving his Service of Sacred Song and Story in Brunwick Place Wesleyan Chapel. Notwithstanding the atmospheric conditions, which were certainly sufficient to deter anyone from going out of doors, the attendance was enormous. Long before the advertised time for the service to commence every available seat was occupied, and people were crushing and crowding the steps in a vain endeavour to gain even standing room. His songs included, as usual, a number of old favourites, sung as only Mr. Sankey can sing them. During his discourse Mr. Sankey made many touching references to Mr. Moody, which were received by the audience with eager interest. Owing to the large number who were unable to obtain admission, Mr. Sankey held a supplementary service in the same building on the following afternoon. The edifice was again crowded to the doors long before the hour for commencement. The subject of Mr. Sankey's address was, "My Journey Through Palestine: Illustrated with Song." Mr. Sankey told his story in that peculiarly interesting manner which is one of the and interspersed his address with solos. He was again listened to with deep attention by the vast congregation.

Mr. Sankey next journeyed to South Shields, visiting that town at the earnest solicitation of the Free Church ministers. The meeting was held in the large Assembly Hall, which the veteran evangelist described as one of the finest he had seen. It was filled to its utmost capacity, and many were unable to get in. A choir of nearly 300 voices was drawn from the choirs of the town, and the congregation, having been supplied with music leaflets containing a selection of the songs rendered, joined effectively in the singing of the choruses. The Shields Gazette says: "The service was one of the finest imaginable, and was marked by great enthusiasm." The general feeling was that, though it occupied about an hour and a half, its only fault was that it was too short. All the Free Church ministers of the town, and some from neighbouring towns, were on the platform. The chair was occupied by Rev. W. Hanson, who, in introducing Mr. Sankey, spoke of the effectiveness of the service rendered by Messrs. Moody and Sankey twenty-seven years ago. At Berwick-on-Tweed, again, very large audiences came together, both afternoon and evening, and received Mr. Sankey's addresses and solos with great heartiness.

Mr. Sankey's engagements are: Oct. 18, Dundee; Oct. 21, Greenock (Town Hall, 9.30 and 7 p.m.); Oct. 24 and 25, Stirling Nov. 6 and 7, Belfast.

Christians and Railway Shares.

DEAR SIR,—Mr. J. Fox Wilson, in his letter in your recent issue, appears entirely to overlook the fact that a shareholder in a public company is as equally a partner with the other shareholders as if it were a private concern, and, as a partner, he is a party to all that is done and allowed by the partnership generally. He is helping to run Sunday trains, to sell intoxicants at the refreshment bars, to advertise theatrical and other displays, to promote races and all the other means by which the servants of the partnership—the directors—seek to increase the gains of the firm. They are acting within the strict limits of their partnership articles, and he certainly has no legal right to object.

I submit it as the duty of the Christian shareholder to sell out of such a partnership. The true principle is to withdraw from participation in unlawful gains, and from a partnership in which the articles allow such things to be done, and not to seek to coerce the worldly shareholder. We have not to force the world to do right, but to do right ourselves, and see that God's children are not parties to these compromising partnerships.

This letter may sound harsh, but I think a careful reconsideration of the matter will show that it sets forth the Scriptural principle.—Yours truly,

T. H. E.

SUNDAY, October 21. Isaiah xlix.

THE Divine Servant is speaking here—He who took upon Himself the form of a servant that, having descended to the lowest depths of humiliation, He might become Lord of all. We may count Him the Pattern Servant, and in our poor measure appropriate some of these deep and rich sentences. There is a sense, for instance, in which God makes mention of our name long before it is spoken by our mother; He waits to make our mouth as a sharp sword, to hide us in the shadow of his hand, and to make us polished shafts. The polishing is the result of friction with the grit of sand-paper, and it is often by a variety of little things borne patiently and sweetly for Christ that the noblest results in our life and character are achieved.

There is, as St. Paul indicates (Acts xiii. 47), a clear reference to our Lord's mission to the Gentiles in the sixth and following verses. And in the eighth verse it would appear as though the gift of Christ to men and their salvation were due to his own intercessions, expressing, as they do, the deepest purposes of God. What else can be meant by the words, "In an acceptable time have I heard Thee"? The prime work of our Saviour is intercessory. For Zion's sake He does not hold his peace. And it is in answer to these, that comfort, compassion, and salvation visit us.

Has God forgotten, dear soul? Has He forsaken thee? Has He withdrawn his tender mercies? It cannot be. The print of the nails on his hands has graven thee there for ever, and, unknown to thee, He is preparing a great surprise, when the results of thy long suffering shall crowd around thee, and thine heart shall gird them as a bride her jewels.

After a protest on the part of Jehovah that He has not cast away his people, and that his power was not in fault, but that their sins had separated between Him and them, the Messiah is again introduced, speaking prophetically. Paragraph from 4-9 is remarkable for its fourfold mention of the Lord God, and in each case we may reverently, though lagging far behind, appropriate the words.

The gift of the tongue (4). Notice the difference between the two versions: A.V., "The tongue of the learned; R.V., marg., "The tongue of the disciple." Even Jesus was ever waiting on his Father's teaching. He said, "As the Father hath taught me, so I speak." We can never speak to men as the learned, but only as learners; not as masters, but as scholars, who still sit on the forms, though it may be a little higher than some who have just entered the school of grace. We can only comfort others as we have ourselves been comforted.

The open ear (5). Not as some think the ear bored to the door-post, according to the significant old Hebrew custom referred to Ex. xxi., but the pushing back the bushy locks from the ear, that nothing may intervene to obstruct the slightest whisper of the Divine voice. Oh speak Thou thus to me. Morning by morning uncover my ear, and utter thy deep things to my soul, and make me thy obedient disciple, whatever may be the cost of pain and spitting, of shame and suffering.

The Divine Help. Twice over "The Lord God will help me" (7, 9). Those who walk on the path of the Divine will, may count certainly on the Divine help. Where the cloud broods, the manna falls. If the soul goes down to death, let it trust and stay on God; through the darkness it shall emerge into the resurrection morning.

TUESDAY, October 23. Isaiah li.

This chapter reminds one of sunrise, as one may see it in a mountainous country, in the flush of dawn. But as the hour draws near for the appearance of the sun, the signs of his presence multiply, the clouds are bathed in intenser colour, and the higher peaks catch fire. So, notice the thrice "Hearken" (1, 4, 7), and the thrice "Awake" (9, 17; lii. 1). In this brief space it is impossible to treat this chapter worthily, for it is a very cloth of gold glistening with jewels.

Note the designation of the persons addressed. They follow after righteousness; seek the Lord; they are his people; they know righteousness; God's law is written in their heart; they have drunk the cup of indignation, but it is taken out of their hand, and they shall no more drink it again. Are you such? If so, draw near, and take to your comfort these Divine consolations.

Are you lonely? You are not lonelier than Abraham, who was but one in his father's house, standing by himself, lonely enough as he led the pilgrim march across the desert! But God hath made of him a great people, and can do as much for you. Do you despair for the cause of God? Hush your foreboding; his righteousness is near, his salvation hath already gone forth, and neither of them shall be abolished. Do you fear the reproach of men? Be not dismayed; they shall be consumed as a moth-eaten garment. Do you fear continually all the day, hedged in with circumstances like a captive exile? You have forgotten the Lord your Maker; He waits to cover you in the shadow of his hand. Do you feel afflicted, and drunken with grief and sorrow? God waits to take that cup out of your hand, and to give you the chalice back brimming with salvation.

WEDNESDAY, October 24. Isaiah lii.

These words may be supposed to be addressed to Israel, captive in Babylon; but they pass beyond that immediate occasion which may have suggested them, and stand for the Church of God in all days of oppression and rebuke. There is also a further reference to the restoration of Israel in the future, with which the prophetic Scriptures are full.

Again, stop to look at the imagery. The fair city, whether Israel's metropolis or the Church of God, like a captive sits in the dust, with strong bands around her neck, her garments dishevelled and unclean. The cry to awake summons her to arise, shake off her bands, and array herself in virgin white. May not this be God's summons to your soul? You are weak; put on his strength. You are uncomely; put on the beauties of his holiness. You are sitting in the dust of neglect; arise and sit down with Christ on his throne. You are bound with cords; in the act of rising to obey, they will drop off. You have been oppressed; learn to know God as your deliverer.

Then across the mountains speed the messengers, bringing good tidings to the desolate city or soul, that God reigns. Their advent had been expected. Watchmen upon the ruined walls have waited for their appearance, and now they break into song, until the waste place, the ruined walls and gates, catch up the melody and pass it on, that God hath comforted and redeemed. Then comes the final challenge to the exiles to depart from the land of their bondage, not aggrandizing themselves with the unclean riches and jewels which delighted those among whom they had dwelt too long. Let us be separate children of God, going forth without fear or haste, for God leads and brings up the rear; He besets behind and before.

THURSDAY, October 25. Isaiah liii.

Now the sun rises at last. "Behold my Servant!" is the inscription on this Holy of Holies, this sacred centre of Old Testament prophecy, this mirror in which the Cross is reflected backward on the Old Testament world, as in the Epistles it is reflected on that of the New Testament.

But, ah, how different the appearance of this dawn to what we might have expected after such announcements! The weakly shoot from a decayed trunk, which gives no promise of beauty or value! The root that draws no moisture from the ground! Devoid of the rank and wealth, the worldly genius and commanding bearing which are so attractive! Stricken, smitten, wounded, bruised, oppressed, slaughtered, cut off, buried, travailing, numbered with the transgressors, pouring out his soul unto death, bearing the sin of many!

But take the other side. He hath done no violence; He opens not his mouth; He is stricken voluntarily, not for Himself, but for the people; there is no deceit in his mouth; He shall see his seed; his days shall be prolonged; the pleasure of Jehovah shall prosper in his hand; He shall be satisfied; shall make many righteous; shall make intercession with the transgressors; shall divide a portion with the great, and the spoil with the strong. Again death is the gate of life. Sorrow is the veiled angel that rolls back the curtain and admits the everlasting day. For Him the everlasting recompense of joy; for us the everlasting deliverance from our dreaded ills.

FRIDAY, October 26. Isaiah liv.

This chapter may be addressed not only to the mother city of Jerusalem, but to every soul that has for long been barren in the sense of having no spiritual children. It is good when the heart breaks with longing for a spiritual seed. God is near his child, and promises that there shall be so great an increase that tent and habitation will alike have to be enlarged.

Treating these words dispensationally, this surely refers to the enlargement of God's people, by the taking in of the Gentiles which followed the crucifixion and resurrection of our Lord, as this chapter follows the chapter of the Cross. The Acts of the Apostles is full of enlargement, the stretching forth of curtains, the lengthening of cords. Take, for instance, chap. x., where Peter enlarged the Jewish tent to take in Cornelius.

How precious these promises! Thou shalt forget; thou shalt remember no more in the rapture of knowing thy Maker as thy Husband, and the Holy One of Israel as thy Redeemer. And when God takes us back to Himself, his everlasting mercy compensates for the small moment of forsakenness. His kindness can never depart, though mountains depart; the covenant of his peace can never remove, though hills remove. He will set Himself to build with fair colours where, through our sin, we had brought desolation. He will teach us and give us peace, establishing us in righteousness, condemning every adverse tongue, and giving us the heritage of his children. The closing sentence of this chapter is so infinitely blessed, because it gives us the warrant to appropriate all its contents. Every servant of God has a right to claim them as his heritage, and to assume that righteousness in which the soul stands complete and accepted.

SATURDAY, October 27. Isaiah lv.

The gracious work of Christ opens the blessings of his Gospel to the whole world. In chap. liii., you have his mediatorial work. In chap. liv., its immediate application to the Church. In this, its proclamation to the world. Everyone that thirsts includes the great multitude that no one can number, of every tribe, and nation, and people.

The world of men are invited to share in the sure mercies of David, and nations whose names have never been known or uttered in the streets of old Jerusalem shall gather around Him whom Israel rejected, but whom God has given as a Leader and Commander to the people. Verse 5 reminds us of our Saviour's words that He would draw all men to Himself.

We must forsake our way, if we would find his; we must give up our thoughts, if we would apprehend his; we must return from our wanderings, if we would share in his abundant pardon. But oh, who can estimate the greatness of God's thoughts of love? High as heaven is his mercy, soft as the fall of the rain in spring, certain as the yearly gift of food. And He calls us to be fellow-workers with Himself. We must plough and sow; He must give the increase. O sowers, get your seed from Him, and do not forget to be eaters too. O hungry eaters, get your bread from Him, but do not forget to sow (1 Cor. ix. 10). Do not despair of the buried seed: it will fruit in God's good time, and the curse of Eden shall be reversed. God is not content with uprooting thorns and briars; He replaces them with myrtles and firs. Ask that these transformations may come over the world, your church, your family, and yourself.

Other Lands.

Anxious Times in S. Africa.

THE Wellington Convention, which some thought it would not be well to convene this year, has been largely attended, perhaps more so than in former years, and has proved a season of blessing to many. The prayer meeting, when, as previously announced, the subject was "For our country and for peace," was a peculiarly solemn time, many being deeply moved, as men and women —one in Dutch—unburdened their hearts, and pleaded that the sorrow and strife might cease in the land, and that love might rule among the children of God.

The Bible-readings and clear teaching of Rev. J. Gelson Gregson brought help to many. We greatly value his work in the Camp Homes. Mr. Howe has just returned from a three weeks' visit to the Homes in the Transvaal. His journey there was an adventurous one through a much disturbed district. The enemy waylaid the train, which, however, was delayed by a rail-road wash-away, a terrific storm having occurred. Day having dawned, they hid themselves behind the hills. Later the train crept cautiously on with two guards of armed soldiers on board, through a scene of desolation, wrecked trains, burnt farms, remains of mail-bags, and rude graves.

In the train that followed was one of our managers travelling with stores for the Homes. An hour before daybreak he and some soldiers were startled out of sound sleep by a volley being fired into the guard's van in which they travelled, and the train being derailed. On either side men were wounded, the one nearest him shot dead. Whilst he was attending to the wounded they were ordered to march. He pleaded to remain, as he was a non-combatant, but they left a hospital sergeant instead.

After marching for two miles, carrying his bag and rugs, a Boer riding by his side said, "Oom, you are done up; give me your bag to carry." After a time he handed it back, saying, "Here, you fall out, and if anybody meddles with you, say I told you to do so." Whilst he rested, another rode up, saying, "Give me the rug and strap—the best rug—at once, or I'll shoot you dead!" Some time later, when it was certain Brabant's Horse was hot in pursuit, the other men were also released.

They returned to the train to find it blazing, but managed to save a portion of the mails. All the stores for the Soldiers' Home were burnt, with the exception of some boxes of biscuits which had been used as a prop for the poor, dying soldiers. These biscuits were now most acceptable to the famished men. Dynamite had been placed under the engine. The stoker, being a Dutchman, hid himself in the box, and had the explosion been wholly successful, he must have perished.

The armoured train picked up the survivors after Mr. Edgar had buried the dead. Of course there were no passengers.

A day later another supply of stores for the Homes was captured and destroyed. These calamities serve to draw us in closer dependence upon Him who has worked so wondrously for us, and who continues to bless his own work.—

National Home Reading Union.—While the chief object of this society is to attract and instruct young scholars, provision is made, through its general course and various special courses, for the assistance of readers of all ages and all grades of culture. At present a special effort is being made to aid parents and teachers who wish to grasp the philosophical principles underlying all systems of education. A course on the elements of education, commenced last year, is to be continued, dealing with "Some Applications of Psychology to Education." Its aim will be the elucidation of the laws which govern the development of the mind. The Indian Famine.

NOTES FROM WORKERS.

MRS. HARRIET TYLER has established an Orphan Home near Simla, where she is receiving waifs from the famine districts. Miss Eltzholtz, M.D., a Danish-American lady who has devoted herself to the work in association with Mrs. Tytler, has been collecting orphans. She writes:—"The first little girl we picked up was a wee tot of about five; she was begging all alone at one of the stations. Near a watering station lay a little dead child, a flock of vultures picking it to pieces. I have now more children than I can take." A start has been made in the Home, with who since their reception have improved greatly. "I pray," adds Miss Eltzholtz, "that they will grow up bright Christians." Rev. H. Plowman, chaplain at Umballa, speaks in high terms of the Home and its management. Mrs. Tytler's address is "Bonnie Morn," Simla, India.

Mr. C. F. Reeve, of the Poona and Indian Village Mission, writing on September 21, says: "Last season we provided means of livelihood to 1,560 famine people, who were employed on our settlement at Nasarapur, carrying stones, quarrying, burning lime, building, gardening, &c., and we apprehend it will not be many weeks ere we have that number in our midst again. At the moment, we have about 700 men, women and children, and fresh hands are daily being taken on. Many of those who have returned still look very

EMACIATED AND SICKLY.

We are now interesting ourselves in orphans, of which there are a large number left as a result of the recent calamities. It seems that the evangelization of this vast country is largely dependent upon the work and influence of the rising generation, as they are able to get closer to the people, and are more readily listened to than we Europeans."

In a letter from Bundi, Rajputana, Dr. William Huntly says:—"Your readers' gracious and timely gifts have been a stay in these times of trouble. They have enabled me to do just what I thought was needed without the attendant delay, which is unfitted for helping at the right moment. The harvest does not ripen until the end of October, but a crop of rich grass seed, which is being reaped and ground into meal, is furnishing the poor with food until the grain prices are lowered at harvest time. I was making a hundred or two when your gift reached me for them. I had just risen from a bed of dysentery and fever, contracted when out distributing among the poorer farmers. With all help, what desolation, what ruin, what destitution! The land is robbed of half of its cultivating class; it is a never-to-be-forgotten year. At one village we saw a procession of the gods of the village. There were only three images, and no following. A native said there used to be six images. Two large melas in honour of the gods were altogether forsaken."

The need for continued help is emphasized by Rev. Albert Norton, of the Boys' Christian Home, Dhond, Poona, who writes:—"Friends in England and America are liable to get a wrong impression as to the famine being over. Though good rains have fallen in most parts of the famine area, the decline in prices of food grains is only slight from the highest prices of the famine. Also the high death rate in many sections continues; and while the rains have been good in most sections, and the crops, such as have been sown, are doing well, yet in the districts of our part of the Bombay Deccan, there has been such a deficiency of rain, that in some places there is a and in other considerable sections a promise of only a one-fourth crop. This coming on the back of last year's suffering is very hard on the poor cultivators and labourers. Though the prospect of a substantial decline in prices of food grains (owing to the good monsoon generally received) will help them yet, as they are without money, property, or credit, they must suffer severely: famine conditions of life will undoubtedly be continued to them for another year. In behalf of our 611 orphan boys, rescued from the present famine, I thank you for the money sent us during the past nine months."

Rev. C. W. Posnett, of the Wesleyan Mission, Medak, says: "Again I have to thank your readers for much-needed help. We have now about 1,000 people on relief work, 800 of whom are receiving gratuitous help merely to keep them going till they can reap the harvest of the little acre of land for which I was able to provide them with seed, but until that harvest is reaped they have absolutely not a farthing to live upon or to provide for their children with. They are looking far worse now than when they were with the rest in the famine camp, and though they toil from dawn till dark they have no reward save the prospect of a harvest, and that, poor things, they cannot live upon. Our dispensaries and houses of blessing tell of unspeakable sadness, sorrow, and suffering, and want. Daily we are besieged with starving women falling at our feet and begging us to and feed and care for them. Every week brings a demand for a teacher, an evangelist, or a Bible-woman for some new village; and the country which has seen the love and pity of Christ has seen also truck-loads of little starving girls sent into the great city to be sold as slaves, and worse. Yet the question is, What am I to do with the children? The parents are many of them dead from cholera, or are perfectly destitute from famine."

Lady Missionaries for India.

POSSIBLY in nothing is the success of missions in any country more apparent than the number of appeals for additional workers. India's demands in this respect are both urgent and numerous, and the Zenana Bible and Medical Mission are making strenuous endeavours to respond to her calls. It was for the purpose of bidding farewell to a contingent of missionaries, who are proceeding under the auspices of the Society to India, that a meeting was arranged at Exeter Hall on Tuesday afternoon of last week. There was a good attendance of friends, and the sympathetic interest manifested in the proceedings must have inspired the confidence of those who are offering themselves for service abroad.

SIR CHARLES ELLIOTT,

as chairman, tendered some timely counsel and practical advice to the young missionaries. Speaking from his own experience of Oriental life, he gave some useful hints in reference to the climate, and the care which is necessary in this respect. They should also endeavour to keep in touch with other English residents and officials, whose influence and sympathy would be found of much value in times of difficulty as well as prosperity.

The valedictory address, by Dr. Geo. Hanson, was a helpful and inspiring message. Its theme was Christ's only miracle after his resurrection, when He appeared unto his disciples, and was known of them by the great draught of fishes. The incident teaches significant lessons, among these being the duty of faith and obedience, on whatever errand we are sent, and the infinite resources of our God for the supply of our spiritual and material necessities. Another special comfort is that a night of failure is often the prelude of a morning of joy. Our disappointments are God's appointments. The history of missionary enterprises frequently proved how times of weary labour were often

THE PRELUDE TO SUCCESS.

Referring to the numerous indications of progress and development of missions in India, Dr. Hanson reminded his hearers that it is not always given to the sower to reap the harvest of his labour, and earnestly besought the outgoing missionaries to pursue with patience, and confident trust in the power of God, their glorious work.

Rev. A. R. Cavalier introduced the eleven new missionaries. This number, with two who are returning after furlough, will only meet the most pressing needs at Benares, Lucknow, Bombay, Fyzabad, Patna, Gorakpur, &c. Two of the medical missionaries (Miss Lena Fox, M.B., and Miss S. H. Smith, L.R.C.P.) briefly spoke of the particular branch of service which they are taking up, and pleaded for remembrance in the prayers of those who remain at home. Others followed with words of farewell, and expressed the joyful expectation with which they enter upon their labours. The meeting was notable for its impressive and solemn spirit, and the closing hymn, "Father, to Thee our sisters we commend," was the united prayer of all hearts.

Social Reforms in Canada.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

VARIOUS questions of reform are now prominently to the front in Canada. One of these is Sunday observance. According to a recent sermon by one of the most prominent ministers of Toronto, the chief peril of the Dominion is in Lord's Day desecration. That there are many encroachments on the day of rest is evident on every side. Street cars are running in many cities where they would not have been tolerated some years ago. Various other forms of Sunday toil are also on the increase, while the tendency to use the day for pleasure and recreation becomes more marked. To meet these encroachments various agencies are at work, the chief of which is the Lord's Day Alliance. For some years the Alliance has confined its operations to the Province of Ontario, but now that a field secretary has been appointed organizations are being formed in other provinces of the Dominion with encouraging results.

Another noticeable reform movement is the temperance cause. The last few years have been remarkable in the growing stringency of the licence laws. In this respect Ontario has taken the lead, but some of the other provinces have out-distanced her in the matter of prohibitory legislation. To Manitoba and Prince Edward Island belong the credit for enactments looking to the total

SUPPRESSION OF THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

In the former province the measure which is to become law in a few months closes all places where liquor is sold, both in bulk and by the glass, except drug stores, where it can be procured under the orders of a physician. The manufacture of liquor for use outside the province is not forbidden, but free drinks and the dispensing of liquor to friends are prohibited. The penalty for violating the Act is severe, the first offence calling for a fine of 200dols. to 1,000dols., and the second imprisonment for three months with hard labour. Altogether temperance people are well satisfied with the measure, and are vigorously pushing the campaign in the other provinces.

The reforms of a more general character have been made manifest in the annual Canadian Conference of Charities and Corrections, which has just adjourned in Toronto. In the discussions, prison reform was prominently to the front, when emphasis was placed on the importance of separating young offenders from hardened criminals, and the adoption of indeterminate sentences and the probation system. In the administration of charity, it was shown that much better results could be obtained through organization and active intelligent co-operation. The treatment of inebriates was also the subject of an interesting discussion, when the founding of asylums for this purpose was strongly recommended. But to no subject was a more prominent place accorded that to "child-saving," the thought of the Conference being upon formative rather than reformatory measures.

Nor are the churches indifferent to reform in its truest and best sense—Sunday observance, temperance, and all other advance movements find their earnest and most consistent champions among the members of the various churches. The distinctive work of the churches, too, is taking new life and energy with the coming of autumn. Evangelistic services are being generally announced, and large ingatherings may be expected. Missionary zeal and activity are also on the increase. One reason for this is the itinerant campaign of the veteran missionary from the New Hebrides, Dr. John G. Paton, whose visits to many villages, towns, and cities during the past few months have been greatly blessed. Representatives of various other denominations have also been doing good service while home on furlough, and the indications point to a good fall and winter's work for the extension of God's kingdom at home and abroad.

Missionaries and the Peace Congress.

DEAR SIR,—Permit me to correct the statement in your Notes of last week as to the resolution adopted by the Peace Congress with regard to the war in China. The resolution which you quote was presented by a committee, but was met by a strong protest from Dr. Trueblood, secretary of the American Peace Society, and myself. An entirely different one was in consequence adopted, which simply blamed "certain missionaries" for their action in claiming special privileges for themselves and their converts, and for appealing to their Governments for armed protection. The former clause, as was pointed out to the Congress, only applies to the Catholic missionaries. It has been shown that the recent outbreak of the Boxers was intimately connected with a case of this kind.

It is, however, unfortunately true that some American missionaries at Peking telegraphed an urgent request for additional troops to their Government just before the siege of the legations began, and there have been a few other cases of the same kind, though, as the Congress was informed, the attitude of the China Inland Mission, the Church Missionary Society, and other leading British societies is quite unexceptionable. Those who object to war on Christian grounds cannot but deplore and condemn all reliance of missionary enterprise on armed force, which they believe to be contrary, not only to the teaching of Christ, but to the example of the early church, when its missionary zeal was brightest and purest.

The venerable Pastor Appia recently stated, in an address delivered here on the Early Christian Church, that he had been unable to find a single instance, during the first three centuries, of a Christian having had resort to armed force, even in defence of the most sacred rights.—Yours truly,

JOSEPH G. ALEXANDER.

School for the Blind at Peking.

OUR prolonged anxiety regarding the possible fate of Rev. W. H. Murray, of the above mission, has at length been set at rest by a letter from Professor Russell, of the Imperial College at Peking, announcing that he is safe and well, and has already secured temporary premises in which to house his blind pupils and carry on his work.

Professor Russell, who acts as honorary treasurer at Peking for this mission, adds that so effectual has been the destruction of our excellent mission buildings, which had originally been very good Chinese houses, that it will cost double our original outlay to restore them. Our recently-acquired sanatorium at Pei-tai-ho has also been totally destroyed.

Mrs. Murray and her six children, in two separate parties, have come through terrible dangers, four of the children being under bombardment for three weeks in Tientsin. They are now together at Wei-hai-wei under British protection.

The family have, of course, lost everything they possessed in the burning of these houses. I will gratefully receive subscriptions to enable them to replace their personal losses—clothes, books, furniture.

Young Women in Gibraltar and Spain.—In connection with the Y.W.C.A. and mission work in Gibraltar and Spain, a pressing need exists at San Roque for procuring a Protestant cemetery. The priests have given out that they have the names of all who attend the Protestant meetings, and that, should they die, they will be denied burial in the only cemetery. Both at Tunara and San Roque, the various efforts in the interests of young women have been abundantly fruitful. The attendance at the school at Tunara has never been higher than at present, and the progress in general knowledge and religious instruction is particularly encouraging to those who are endeavouring to prepare young minds to withstand and refute the errors of Romish teaching, and enable them to witness to the truth among their own people. Miss J Squire, 90, Huntingdon Road, N., may be communicated with upon the subject.

"Regions Beyond" Missionaries.

IN a recent letter, Dr. Harry Guinness says: "Here at Harley House we are recommencing work. With September our financial year came to its close, and we are most anxious, ere the demands of a new session are upon us, to clear off all the liabilities of the old. The quarterly allowances of our Congo missionaries are now due, and amount to £700, towards which we have nothing in hand! The expenses in connection with the transport department of the Mission have been peculiarly heavy this year, as we have sent back eleven missionaries to the field. We are glad that a number of these bills do not fall due for a few days.

"Early in November we anticipate the sailing of our second Indian contingent, including Rev. E. Palgrave Davey, and Messrs. Hodge-Wynd and Wilson. We are full of hope in connection with the establishment of our first two stations in Behar, and the hills. The Passage and Outfit fund will be largely drawn upon, especially as we are hoping soon to send out two new missionaries to the Congo, one of whom is our brother Bond, who has completed his training with us, and is ready for the front. At home there is an immediate need (apart from the current expenditure of the new session) of over £1,000 besides the other expenses before alluded to, which, together with South American needs, amount to not less than £1,500, making a total of £2,500."

Persecution in Sicily.

IN the October number of A Voice from Italy, some details of persecution and annoyance committed by the priests and their followers at Pachino, are recorded. While a meeting was being held in the Waldensian church, the priests headed a procession with a crucifix draped in crape, and halted outside the door. Cries were raised, "Down with the Protestants," and stones were thrown. The evangelist at once came out, barely escaping being struck on the head, and began to preach. The priests resumed their march, but instead of following them, a large number of their company entered the building, and listened quietly to what was being said. Others joined them when the procession was over. A most favourable impression was made on the community, and the people were heard saying "The Evangelicals are the true Christians, and the priests the real destroyers of the law of Christ."

Jews at the Paris Exhibition.

HAVING resolved that no Jew or Jewess should leave the Paris Exhibition without receiving copies of the Scriptures, or having heard the Gospel, Rev. A. and Mrs. Sternberg, with other workers, have pursued with commendable earnestness their efforts for the attainment of this object.

As a result many Jews have learnt to appreciate the New Testament. In a recent communication, Mr. Sternberg writes:—"As we have to do, so to speak, with a world of Jews congregated in one particular spot, we hear from their lips their religious opinions, convictions, aspirations, and phases of belief, which impress one with the marvellous and astounding tenacity with which they still hold to their indestructible future destiny as a nation. There is a solidarity among them which no power on earth, be it ancient or modern, has hitherto been able to weaken."

It is proposed to follow up the Exhibition work by reopening missions in France, as well as strengthening other foreign and home missions. The office of the British Society for the Propagation of the Gospel among the Jews is at 9, Great James Street, Bedford Row, London, W.C.

Naples.—The Church here continues to grow, and has opened a new station in Vamero, in response to the wishes of many residents in that district. Signor Gay, junior, has been appointed by the Central Committee of Evangelization as assistant to his father in the widely-extended work in and around Naples. Dr. Gay has been invited by the important parish of San Giovanni in The Valleys to the pastoral charge there, in succession to Rev. W. Meille, who has been laid aside by illness.—A Voice from Italy.

London Tent Campaign.

"RALLY" AT EXETER HALL.

SELDOM has Exeter Hall been the scene of a more crowded and enthusiastic meeting than that of the concluding "rally" of this year's London Tent Campaign, held on Tuesday evening of last week.

Long before the time fixed for commencement, the entrances had to be closed, and the crowds which subsequently arrived thronged to in the Examination Hall and Theatre of the Royal College of Surgeons on the Victoria Embankment.

In Exeter Hall, the meeting was full of spiritual vigour. Conventionalities were forgotten in such an atmosphere of revival. Nor was this to be wondered at, for the majority of those present were young converts or Christians who had received stimulus during the campaign. The singing was led by a large choir. Among the pieces rendered were two hymns written by Messrs. L. Weaver and Van de Venter respectively, and set to music by Professor W. S. Weeden.

Mr. T. A. Denny presided. He was supported by members of the tent committee (which includes some well-known friends of evangelistic enterprise) and by the prominent workers engaged in the campaign. After prayer, led by Mr. C. Russell Hurditch, the chairman gave a hearty and sympathetic address, in which he praised God for the renewed proofs supplied by the tent work, that men and women who will not attend church or chapel are attracted by the homeliness and freedom of the tent services, and hear the Gospel willingly. Dealing with the financial position, Mr. Denny said it had been anticipated that £3,000 would meet the outlay, but owing to the poverty of the congregations in many places there remained a deficiency of £800.

Dr. L. W. Munhall followed with a stirring address, in which he reminded his hearers of their obligations to the masses. The Church is not to sit waiting in cloistered halls, but is to go forth

TO SEEK THE WANDERERS.

The Church cannot evade her responsibilities in this matter. Her glorious Head commands: "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature." The welfare of the State also demands it. We may have many and wise laws, but they will prove ineffectual unless the law of Christ is operative in the hearts of the people. It was the revival under the Wesleys and Whitefield which saved Britain from following Bolingbroke and the deistical party, as France followed Voltaire. The very existence of the Church depends upon her seeking the lost; if she fails to undertake the mission, spiritual inanition ensues. Reformatory enterprises have their value, but the chief need of London is not reformation but regeneration.

Mr. and Mrs. Baker, the Philadelphian blind singers, whose ministry of song has been much blessed during the campaign, next sang, "I shall know Him," and Mr. Charles Cook bore testimony to the soundness of the work, as evidenced by many letters received from those who have found peace.

Lady Hope received a cordial welcome. In the course of an address which was full of encouragement and practical wisdom, she said that their hearts were on fire at the good tidings they had received of the results of the work. The old Gospel is as fresh and powerful as ever; the bread of life is always welcome. We remember how our Lord said, "I am the light," but we are apt to forget that He also said, "Ye are the light of the world." Filled with his light we may carry its rays to those in the darkness of sin. The Gospel needs anointed workers to proclaim it. Lady Hope urged that the campaign must be continued in scripture teaching for those who have been blessed, and concluded with practical advice to those converts, especially the girls and young women who have to endure misunderstanding in the home circle. She encouraged such to continue in prayer, that their families might meet in unbroken order round the Throne.

Lady Hope next undertook what she described as a delightful duty—that of presenting Mr. Leonard Weaver, the initiator and evangelistic superintendent of the campaign, with a gold watch as a token of respect from the workers. Professor Weeden of New York, who has done much to organize the musical arrangements, was the recipient of a travelling-bag. These brethren briefly expressed their thanks.

Gipsy Smith, who followed, said he was there to say, in the name of the Free Churches, "God bless you." God had given them these and they must prove themselves to be worthy fathers and mothers in Israel. With much pungency and telling arguments in favour of evangelism, Mr. Smith bade his hearers not to be discouraged by cold critics who say deprecatingly, "I hope this sort of thing will stand." After all, what has been done is but "a drop in the bucket" compared to what may be if the churches will seize the opportunity to co-operate.

MR. L. WEAVER.

From photograph by Messrs. Heaton Bros., 257, Lavender Hill, S.W.

Mr. Bewley Weaver added some forcible words on the attractiveness of the Gospel and the readiness of the people to hear and accept.

Now came one of the most striking incidents of the meeting. Mr. Leonard Weaver invited those who had received blessing through the work personally, or in their families, to rise to their feet as a testimony. People immediately sprang up in scores in all parts of the building, and words of heartfelt praise rang out. One thanked God "for three children brought in." "For my eldest boy," said another. "My father," "My three daughters," "Our family of five," added others; and the hall resounded with fervent thanksgiving, which found united expression in the hymn started by the choir—

I'll never cease to praise Him,
He's done so much for me.

The entire audience rose en masse and caught up the chorus with enthusiasm, repeating it again and again. At the invitation of Mr. A. Garstin, treasurer of the movement, Mr. Pengelly, of Deptford, spoke as the representative of the local secretaries. Mr. Pengelly described the processions through the slums, and other means adopted to gather in the people. Drunkards, harlots, and thieves, as well as the respectable, have heard the Gospel, and the mission was gloriously fruitful.

A poor ill-clad woman recently stopped the speaker and handed him a small sum of money for the work. Her reprobate husband had been brought to the Lord, and in gratitude for the extraordinary change in him, she had resolved, if he should persevere in the good way and seek employment, to give one-half of his first day's wages. He obtained some work immediately, and was paid 2s. 9d. for it. Accordingly, his wife insisted on donating 1s. 4½d., even before obtaining necessaries for herself. This is one instance of many which show how generously the poor contribute to the funds.

Subsequent speakers were Mr. Charles Inglis and Mr. William Grove, who, with many other evangelists, have prosecuted the Campaign with such faith and energy; and after Madame Annie Ryall had sung, "When Israel out of bondage came," the meeting terminated, after prayer by Dr. H. Guinness, with an announcement by Mr. Weaver, to the effect that it is hoped, by renting or erecting suitable buildings, to find a means of continuing the work through the coming winter.

The Effects of Revival.

WHILE in Scotland I often heard persons refer with deep interest to the revival in Cambuslang in the year 1742. There were only about 900 people in the parish, and yet 500 professed conversion. Preceding that work, there was daily prayer for twelve weeks, generally in tents. Whitefield preached twelve sermons to people coming from near and far, often totalling 20,000. After his visit, at the first Communion, 17,000 sat down to the tables which were spread under the tents. It is said that no fewer than 40,000 people assembled to see this solemn act. This seems incredible.

The question arises, what were the permanent results of these marvellous gatherings? A careful student of the history of those times can easily learn the facts. Profanity, which had been very common, was almost unknown; nearly every house in that locality became a house of prayer; old enmities were forgotten; religion became a controlling principle in men's businesses; infidels and scoffers were silenced, and forced to exclaim, "There is indeed a difference between him that serveth God and him that serveth Him not."

I saw meetings, somewhat similar to the above, in the southern part of Scotland, in Glasgow, Aberdeen, and many other places in 1861. Sometimes the interest was so great that they continued nearly all night. Three and four churches were sometimes crowded by those who gathered expecting to get into one church. It was not an unusual thing to be obliged to walk to the pulpit or platform on the solid shoulders of men packed together. I have seen this done, and have had to do it myself. There are times when, in answer to much prayer, people with terrible earnestness pay heed to the admonition, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness."

Last winter at Allen University, Columbia, Ohio, a work began at our first meeting. There was such power and deep conviction of sin, that though we were there for only one service, all the lectures for a whole week were suspended, and a large proportion of the students, who before had not been Christians, professed conversion. I have often heard from them since, and the work has been blessed, and permanent in its results.

Is not God still saying to his people in many places—"Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse, that there may be meat in mine house, and prove Me now herewith, saith the Lord of Hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing that there shall not be room enough to receive it"?

The Late Mr. John Davis,

THE DORSET EVANGELIST.

I FIRST became acquainted with my late much-valued friend in the days of early youth, but when he already had a wife and several children fast growing up. He was then settled in business at Crowcombe, in Somerset; but being even then an active local preacher of most promising zeal, I was often his companion on the road to one or other of his cottage services. Having at that time lately removed from the neighbourhood of London, I was greatly struck with the extreme picturesqueness of the country, and with the old-time manners and modes of life of the farmers and others. The short range of the Quantocks come inland from the Bristol Channel about seven miles, and at one point touch "Taunton's fruitfull Deane." All about, there were memories of Wordsworth and Coleridge, as well as of Crosse, the philosopher of that hill country, whose romantic home had been "where seaward Quantock stands."

John Davis was born in 1822, at Crowcombe, where his father held a position as an easy-going and well-paid bailiff under the ancient family of Carew. John attended the National school; he went to church on Sundays; he duly reverenced his superiors; but, meanwhile, religion was at such a low ebb in the Quantock village that both parents and children were quite ignorant of the Gospel. It even became the fashion to hate and persecute all such as showed any evangelical enlightenment. Until he was twenty-five, John was a kind of local Saul of Tarsus, who breathed out threatenings against all "Methodists."

The change was sudden and unexpected. Some evangelists held a week-night service in the village, and, notwithstanding that he had formed a plot with some others to dip the preacher in water, the Word reached John's heart, and he became totally changed; and among old comrades he was, for the time being, the wonder of the parish. He passed through a time of great mental distress and of persecution from his family, and so unconsciously underwent a process of preparation for future service. His father declared that he would have preferred seeing his son hanged at Taunton gaol to his turning "Methodist;" and on his joining the Baptist congregation at Stogumber, his mother refused him admission to his home; a daughter of a leading high-born family thought that such a renegade should be tied to a post and have his Methodism whipped out of him. At Stogumber—a village which supplied two victims to Jeffreys' "Bloody Assize" of 1685—the convert found good friends, however. The pastor was a son of Andrew Fuller, and the chapel was a most interesting western landmark of seventeenth century Puritanism. A pastor, who succeeded several years later, was a younger brother of the author of the once popular "Persuasives to Early Piety." To this friend the young evangelist became especially indebted, the bond of sympathy being a very close one. Mr. Davis once told me there were times when he seemed to feel with a strange vividness, which to him was quite unaccountable, that his old glorified pastor was still interested in the salvation of men. Again and again, during long, lonely walks at night in Dorsetshire, he at times became even nervous; he would imagine that he once again saw a well-remembered face at his side, just as though the old days in Somerset were being lived over again.

For some time after experiencing the great change, Mr. Davis was "set upon" by those who disliked evangelical religion; and in some cases there seems to have been a withdrawal of trade custom as a penalty exacted by such displeasure. Our late friend held bravely on his way, however; and I am well convinced that he would sooner have died than show the white feather to the enemy. But as is commonly the case under such conditions, the tide soon turned, and when all things seemed to be against him, he found himself on the way to distinguished conquests.

Take this early example. The highborn young lady, who had thought that young Davis should have been tied to a post to have his "Methodism" whipped out of him, lived to see things in a different light. One day this lady called on old Mrs. Davis, when the latter had a letter from her son John. Although she had as yet hardly got rid of her prejudices, the lady still seemed to speak in an altered tone, and even asked to be allowed to take the letter—which was full of Gospel truth—to her home. In her turn, the once proud lady now herself underwent the mysterious change. She who had so bitterly opposed the poor local preacher, now began to show the most lively interest in his work. He was supplied with evangelical literature for distribution; he was commissioned to see that all the cottagers of Crowcombe had Bibles, and any copies needed were freely supplied. The lady next purchased books from the Religious Tract Society sufficient to found a lending library in the village. In addition to all this, when she thought he needed rest and change, this lady invited Mr. Davis to Brighton, where she and her family then lived, all travelling expenses being paid.

For some time longer, Mr. Davis continued to work as a local preacher in and arouud Crowcombe, while earning his livelihood at his trade. Some very striking conversions occurred, and, in one case, a man who became a happy church member was called upon just when about to commit suicide. Then, when in 1862, the Western Association of Churches decided to break new ground by employing evangelists, Mr. Davis became one of the first of the agents engaged, and he entered on the district in Dorset, embracing eighteen parishes, and having a circuit of over fifty miles, in which he continued for thirty-eight years. On calling at one cottage and offering a tract, Mr. Davis was accosted with, "Come in; thou art come in answer to prayer;" and then the truth came out that such an agent had been prayed for during two whole years. At first Mr. Davis and his family settled in Charminster; but soon afterwards he removed to Piddletrenthide, seven miles nearer Sherborne, and there his headquarters remained until he died on the birthday of his old and steadfast friend, C. H. Spurgeon, June 19, 1900.

When Mr. Davis first settled in Dorset, he found that there were 12,000 persons living in the eighteen parishes which constituted his sphere of labour. At first it might seem something like trying an experiment; but ere long the evangelist and his work grew so much in favour with the common people that he seemed to have become indispensable, so that while some marvelled that such an agent had for so long been done without, one member of the Evangelistic Committee said that he would pay the entire cost himself rather than have such effort suspended. Mr. Davis possessed what one friend described as unique gifts for dealing with individuals; and, in addition, he soon commanded the respect and admiration of all classes, including the Established clergy and ministers of all denominations, as well as persons of the highest social rank. His tracts might at first be rejected, but in the end they were sure to be civilly received. In the early days of the City Mission in London, the work was occasionally a service of danger; and it has been known for a missionary to be actually killed in his district. The symptoms of opposition were sometimes very similar in the Dorset country-side. At all events my late friend once pointed out a cottage where a man had threatened to stab him if he did not at once retreat. "He didn't allow no strangers there," he remarked, and was otherwise demonstrative and threatening. But the intruder replied that he had come with good news. "Good news, eh; what was it?" That Jesus Christ came to save sinners! The situation at once changed. "Oh, if that be wot yer come for, stay as long as yer like; my wife wants someone like you to talk to her." In numbers of similar cases Davis would compel the enemy to make a willing and unconditional surrender.

On more than one occasion I visited Mr. Davis in his wide district, and was thus well able to judge of the character of his work. When he removed his headquarters to Piddletrenthide, he got a chapel erected there at a cost of £600, and to this was attached a well-attended Sunday-school. At Buckland Newton there was another chapel with a house attached to the mission. Religious services were also regularly conducted at Broadmayne. There was also a chapel at Bradford Peverell; while, through Mr. Davis's instrumentality, a chapel was likewise erected at Winterbourne Abbas. Thus, through his own individual energy he had everything thoroughly organized and the whole work well in hand. Nothing could well be more striking than some of the conversions which occurred; and while want of space precludes details being given, there are friends who think that no more effective way of stimulating popular enthusiasm in country evangelistic work could be suggested than to issue a biography of John Davis, giving details of the many strikingly interesting conversions which he was instrumental in effecting. At different dates the late C. H. Spurgeon published four extended articles in the Sword and Trowel. The evangelist's only son was also admitted into the Pastors' College, and is now settled in the ministry at Ottery St. Mary, Devon. Other good friends were found in London; and at the town house of one well-known family, near Hyde Park, he was hospitably entertained whenever he visited the metropolis. Mrs. Davis, who died some years ago, was a true helpmeet for her husband. In addition to the son just mentioned, four daughters survive, two of whom are unmarried, while all are worthy of their honoured father. G. Holden Pike.

Soldiers' Hotel for London.

In good time Lady Hope has taken up the cause of the troops about to return home. Writing recently, she said:—

Now that the wounded and invalided men are returning from Africa in such large numbers, we are feeling most acutely the want of a place to accommodate them. A soldiers' hotel, or central home, in London is the pressing need. A very large proportion of those who are sent home partially recover on the voyage; they do not require, or do not enter, the distant convalescent homes, which are invaluable, no doubt, to those who come straight out of hospital and still want nursing.

Good food is absolutely essential to the present and future health of these men; but, alas, the greatest danger they can have is the continual offer of drink, which is the general hospitality shown them in our streets. Surely, when the whole country is ringing with their deeds of bravery, and every heart is beating with gratitude to our soldiers, we might be permitted to offer them something better than this. I would have an excellent temperance bar and the best cooking provided for them; both beds, food, and reception rooms being offered at very moderate prices.

Our soldiers on furlough, as well as those just discharged, both greatly need this centre. There are two classes of men for whom we desire to provide—the unmarried men, whose families often live in crowded rooms in parts of London which are not healthy, and where they really cannot now find accommodation; the other class is that of married men, who really have a room which they can return to, shared by the wife and children. Here they can sleep, but they still need good food and a place in which they can meet their friends, and find some well-deserved rest after their long toils.

Lady Hope's suggestion has met with hearty approval on many hands. Lord Wolseley has not been slow to express his conviction that a Home of the nature described "would be of great benefit to many soldiers returning from South Africa." His lordship adds that he wishes Lady Hope every success in starting and working the Home. At length her ladyship's plans have taken a definite form, and she writes:—

Everything is in readiness now, and premises can be obtained. We wish to offer invalids a comfortable resting-place during the part of their furlough which they spend in London, as well as to keep them under the moral influences of a good home, without the restrictions of ordinary Soldiers' Homes. The house will be open all night, a night porter being on duty to receive them if necessary. The cold nights are coming on, and it is of the greatest importance that there should be no delay in carrying out this scheme.

I could occupy a great deal of space in detail, about the cases of men who are suffering, and have suffered most severely, from the lack of such a shelter, and their continual exposure to the offer of drink, without being able to obtain shelter, bed, and food at a reasonable rate, and without the possibility of payment from their limited resources.

All the Funds hitherto which have been gathered from a charitable English public have been bestowed on the wives and families; it is the men now that are wanting help. A sum of £5,000 is required to start and run this Hotel.

Street-Preaching in Ireland.

A MEETING in connection with the Open-Air Mission for Ireland was recently held in the lecture hall of the United Presbyterian Church, Abbey Street, Dublin, presided over by Rev. R. C. Hallowes, of Arklow, who may be described as the champion of street preaching in that unrestful country. Addresses were delivered by Revs. T. W. Cairns, H. J. Ransom, and J. W. Harrison (curate of Arklow), and Mr. Walker, one of the missionaries, also spoke.

The report for the past year is prefaced by a touching anecdote of an old man who lay a-dying, a convert from Rome, passing away in peace and triumph, and with this remarkable testimony, "If God were pleased to let me live my life over again, I would spend it going from town to town preaching the Gospel in the market places." During 1899 forty towns in the south and west heard the Gospel message proclaimed in the streets through this young but vigorous society, whilst in Ulster about 400 open-air services are held every week.

Opposition has now taken an organized shape the Urban Councils of Queenstown, Cork, Galway, Athlone, Blackrock, and Tullamore having distinguished the first year of their existence by passing bye-laws to stop the preaching, but in vain. During the year upwards of 3,000 Gospel addresses were delivered by the regular workers, assisted by 200 volunteer helpers, and heard by many thousands who would not enter a tent or mission hall.

Y.M.C.A., Stratford, E.

MEETINGS for men were held on three successive evenings last week, in the Town Hall, Stratford, which seats about 1,500.

The first of the series was by Dr. Harry Guinness to a crowded house. It may be described as a lecture to men on "Man; his body, soul, and spirit; with primary reference to the use of the body." With the authority of a medical man, well instructed in his subject, the lecturer appalled his audience by a vivid portraiture of vice, and its terrible results, giving instances where the youth's first fall wrecked his whole life, and, in the solemn words of Scripture, brought "rottenness into his bones," and consigned him to an early grave.

The great audience listened with gravest attention. About ten minutes before the close, the speaker made a five minutes pause, saying that he had a few more important words to speak, but that any who wished could retire then. Not a score left, and for ten minutes Dr. Harry urged the acceptance of Christ as the Deliverer from the thraldom of evil habits, and as the Giver of eternal life. He urged those who trusted Christ to rise, and the whole house rose. This was not what the speaker wanted; he therefore explained, that he only wished those to stand, who knew that they were saved, and begged the rest to resume their seats. Two-thirds, or more, did so. Those who now determined to forsake sin and accept Christ, were asked to rise; they did so in numbers, and upon a further invitation to prove the courage of their convictions by going into the inquiry room, a stream of men—young, middle-aged and older, at once flocked in.

I never saw a more remarkable men's meeting. Many must have shuddered or despaired, or hoped, as the word pictures passed before them. But the rapt attention never swelled into excitement. There was no forcing, no persuasion, no pressing to rise; the appeal to reason and conscience, to forsake sin, and turn to God, needed nothing of that kind. And the after-meeting was of the same subdued character, all the mightier on that account. Many came out on the Lord's side.

The following evenings had for their subjects, Drink and Gambling. The speakers were Rev. G. Gladstone (Glasgow), Rev. J. Wilson (Woolwich), and Rev. H. F. Pegg (of St. Leonard's), whose addresses were all excellent. "Altogether," writes the secretary, "we are greatly encouraged, and are thankful for what has been accomplished." M.

The Evangelization Society.

DESCRIBING the work during the recent tent season, Mr. John Wood writes:—The tent season which has just closed has again given us much cause for thankfulness to God. In spite of the weather being at times trying, we have had many missions of an unusual character, and in which God's grace and power have been singularly manifested. The Society is averse to tabulating results, as we know so well that these are known to God alone; nevertheless we have had testimony from many telling of their own conversion to God, and letters from numerous clergymen, ministers, and others, speaking in the highest terms of the work, and of manifest results. The number of such letters is so large that none except those in the office are aware of the great things God is doing through the evangelists.

During the season we have taken about 200 tent missions, in which thousands of evangelistic addresses have been delivered, reaching hundreds of thousands of our needy population. We endeavour to conduct the work carefully, wisely, economically, and without any extravagance. Our office expenses are kept so small that practically all the money contributed goes directly to the work. Moreover, every evangelist is urged to keep clear of all subjects but the Gospel, and to preach it lovingly, clearly, faithfully, so that every address must be "unto life or unto death."

It may surprise some to hear that 70 per cent. of the Society's work in England and Wales is done in tents, town halls, mission halls, soldiers' homes, and buildings of an undenominational character, although we are ever thankful to receive invitations from clergymen and ministers, both in England and Scotland, for help in denominational buildings if others cannot be offered, the one and only essential thing in all our work is, that the motive and object should be the conversion of souls, and the strengthening the hands of God's people. The expense of the tent work has been between £3,000 and £4,000, and we have, as usual, heavy charges before us for repairs and renewals.

Strangers' Friend Society.

HOW many of the multitudes constantly coming into the metropolis, from the towns and villages of this and other lands, have to realize the loneliness of a great city, especially when sickness or other misfortune assails them, and they have no earthly friend near to help? Nor is it so merely with fresh arrivals, for thousands habitually residing in our midst find themselves equally friendless at such times. A young widow, weak and helpless, and without food or fire, was visited on a bitterly cold winter's day by a visitor of The Benevolent or Strangers' Friend Society, whose special work is the assistance of such cases. Very early one morning, her husband, as usual, proceeded to work, and in course of it was drowned three hours later. Since then (though often hardly able to crawl about) she had gained a precarious livelihood, for herself and child, by needlework of the worst-paid kind. Immediate relief was given, and continued until she was well enough to enter afresh upon life's struggles.

Those in need, irrespective of religious persuasion—as members of the same human family—are at all times treated alike by the Society, and each receive assistance as far as funds permit. The visitors always carry to the homes of the afflicted the Gospel of Christ in addition to temporal help. The Society likewise renders its subscribers the service of investigating cases brought to their notice, but into the merits of which they themselves have not the time to enter.

There are 160 visitors—all gratuitous agents—engaged in the Society's Good Samaritan work the year round, and for the last 115 years it has, without any break, been persevered in. There is plenty of need for a large extension of such service, instead of having to contract it, through want of funds. Convalescent Home and Hospital letters, as well as clothing, are also most acceptable gifts. The office of the Society is 121 (late of 52), Finsbury Pavement, E.C., and the secretary is Mr. B. H. Gerrans.

Literature for Seamen.—Gifts of books, magazines, tracts, &c., are gratefully received by the Thames Church Mission, for distribution among sailors and others on the River Thames. The secretary is Mr. F. Penfold, 31, New Bridge Street, London, E.C.

Bandages and the Gospel.

Mission Hospital Ship, "Queen Victoria," North Sea, 54° 43' North lat., October 4, 1900.

ADRIFT on the North Sea! This may cause some who read this to conjure up visions of shipwreck and disaster, and these also are all too common amongst the great trawling fleets which, summer and winter, year in year out, carry on the great fishing industry far out at sea on the notorious "Dogger Bank." In our case, however, it only means that we have, for the time being, lost the whereabouts of the steam fishing fleet—the Game Cock of Hull—to which we are appointed; and emphasizes the new difficulty that we now have to contend with, namely, trying with our sailing hospital-ships to keep touch with and follow up the steam fishing vessels, that are constantly changing their position according as the amounts of fish taken in the huge trawls may vary in quantity and value. Could our friends ashore see the efforts made by our skippers to keep their fleet within sight or reach, realise the anxieties of being adrift, not knowing what needs may arise demanding instant help and skilled assistance during the days it sometimes takes to rediscover a fleet once lost, know the hours that are spent aloft vainly scanning the empty horizon, the hopes that arise when smoke is descried in the expected quarter, that may after all turn out to be some tramp steamer bound "across"—how much greater would be the sympathy bestowed upon who is longing to be amongst his fisher friends, to tell in a simple way the story of redeeming love, and how much more frequent and earnest would be the prayers that ascend to the throne of grace on his behalf.

The "Royal National," then the plain "Mission to Deep Sea Fishermen," was founded in 1881, when the attempt was first made to carry the Gospel to the fishermen amidst their familiar surroundings, and show in practical form the gracious sympathy and pitiful love of Christ to them, whilst carrying on their daily work, by our sharing their lives of dull monotony, and their common perils and misfortunes.

The start thus made in humble dependence upon Almighty God was richly blessed, and the Mission has through nearly twenty years been the constant friend and helper of the deep-sea fishermen afloat and ashore. The writer will never forget the first night he spent at sea as a mission surgeon to one of the largest fleets of fishing vessels—sailing craft they all were then. It was in the month of February, nearly seven years ago, and after a stormy passage from London in a steam fish cutter, the Short Blue fleet, now non-existent, was reached, and the writer, a dreary-looking object, was handed into the boat sent to convey him to his proper quarters on the mission ship Albert. That night one of the memorable gales of the North Sea broke over us, and when the scattered fleet could reassemble, it was found that no less than nine vessels in this one fleet alone had foundered, two of them with every soul on board. It was with mingled feelings we gathered in our fore-cabin with the skippers from various vessels around us, to return thanks to Almighty God for our safety and welfare through the gale, and to commend to our loving Father in heaven the widow and the orphan weeping for those never to return "until the day break and the shadows flee away."

MISERABLY SEA-SICK,

What stories some of these old sea-dogs can tell, stories of stress and heroic endurance, of gallant rescue and deeds of bravery! What stories, too, one hears of suffering patiently endured in times past, when no help could be obtained! What marks many of these men bear, telling a tale of injuries untreated and accidents untended; the hospital steward and surgeon's mate has just been showing me his fingers scarred and distorted, the trademark of the fishermen in days when were unheard of on the North Sea. Simple-minded, kind-hearted fellows these fishermen too. It would do many a landsman good to hear their honest voices rolling out some of the good old tunes that somehow are being forgotten ashore. Their simple faith and trust in God are often a reproach to many of us, who forget that "it is the Father's good pleasure to give us the Kingdom."

Our present burden is the lack of funds, and our work is seriously threatened unless the friends of fishermen rally round. Surely this work, which God has so manifestly blessed these past nineteen years to the salvation of many, the healing of the sick and suffering, and the declaration of his love from one end of the North Sea to the other, shall not, now that its first romance is over, be allowed to languish and grow weak for the sake of the needed funds to keep the society in the vigour of its early manhood! The need is great, the call is pressing, and the time is short in which to carry out his last message to us, his disciples and followers—"Go ye into all the world (even the world of waters) and preach the Gospel to every creature." How shall they hear without a preacher, and how shall they preach except they be sent?

FREDERICK W. WILLWAY, M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P., Assistant Superintendent, Royal National Mission to Deep Sea Fishermen.

Irish Notes.

ARRANGEMENTS are being made for holding a Simultaneous Mission throughout Ireland, in all Methodist Churches, at the commencement of next year. No undertaking of the sort has ever before been attempted in this country on so large a scale, and it therefore requires a great deal of careful arrangement. Some of the districts are initiating the services by a convention, but in Belfast, which is the largest district, it has been decided to have a general interchange of pulpits on the second or third Sunday in November, in order to announce the matter and bring it before the various congregations. Thus it is hoped that the mission will result in awakening widespread interest and attention.

Colonel Saunderson is strongly in favour of the Government dealing with the ritualistic question. Speaking at Lurgan, he said the most urgent measure at the present time was one dealing with ritualism in the English Church, and he added: "It was as a Protestant nation we had obtained the blessing of God. We had built up our liberty and prosperity upon it, and had become thereby the greatest nation on earth; but if we were to allow our Protestantism to be sapped and destroyed, we could no longer expect the blessing of God, and our prosperity would wither away." To prevent this, he said he would "drive the traitor bands of clerical impostors out of the Church whose bread they have been eating, but whose principles they have betrayed."

There are thirty-eight colporteurs in connection with the Irish Presbyterian Mission, and during the past two months these sold £252 worth of books.

Rev. Dr. Talmage has had large audiences in both Belfast and Dublin. In Grosvenor Hall, Belfast, he lectured to 3,000 persons on "The Science of Good Cheer," and taught several useful lessons in a pleasing manner. He stated that his wife's father was born near Belfast and that he liked Ireland.

The harvest in Ireland this year has on the whole been a bountiful one, and harvest thanksgiving services are now being held in many churches and with more than usual success.

Protestant Reformation Society.

A LECTURE on "The Causes and Preludes of the Glorious Reformation," was delivered last week at Mill Lane Mission Hall, Cheshunt, by Mr. W. A. Limbrick.

At St. George's, Battersea, Rev. A. G. Wilcox has a prosperous "Men's Own" on Sunday afternoons. Rev. Dr. Wright and Mr. Limbrick have addressed the men on Protestantism.

Dr. Wright is fulfilling a series of important engagements at Lowestoft. He has preached the first two of a course of four sermons at Christ Church. The subjects were "Confession of Sins," and "Forgiveness of Sins." The vicar of Christ Church, Rev. David Dickson, M.A., is taking a warm interest in the gatherings.

The Conversion of Children.—Rev. E. Payson Hammond is preparing a new work on the conversion of children. He will be glad to receive authenticated cases of conversion suitable for inclusion in the volume. Mr. Hammond may be addressed, care of THE CHRISTIAN, 12, Paternoster Buildings, E.C.

Welsh Notes.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

AT the recent meetings of the Anglesey Temperance Association, it was decided to send a message to church officers of various denominations urging them to come out strongly in favour of total abstinence. The churches were also urged to refuse to elect to office those who are not abstainers. It was further decided at the Association meetings to institute a temperance examination, the subjects in the three classes to be "The Report of the Royal Commission on Licences," "Doctors and Drink," and "The Catechism of the Four-fold Pledge."

The meetings of the Welsh Students' Christian Union at Bala were highly successful. Representatives were present from the various colleges of the Principality. Papers were read and addresses delivered by several well-known ministers. The missionary meeting was attended by returned missionaries from the foreign field.

The Welsh Young People's Christian Union is yet in its infancy, but the programme it is promulgating shows it to be possessed of much vitality and hopefulness. District meetings are to be held in various parts of the Principality, and provision is made to affiliate Young People's Societies already existent should they so desire. It is contemplated to bring out a quarterly magazine in connection with the Union.

The meetings of the South Wales Calvinistic Methodist Association, held at New Quay, in Cardiganshire, were well attended. Ministers and deacons from the southern part of the Principality attended in considerable numbers. Some of the meetings were devoted to the discussion of Connexional affairs, while others were set apart for preaching. The Association will not meet again until the spring of next year.

The Twentieth Century Funds of some of the Welsh Nonconformist bodies are making good progress. The Welsh Wesleyans have collected over £15,000, which will go to swell the total of the Million Guineas Scheme. At the recent meetings of the North Wales Synod £500 was promised in one meeting alone. Out of the £20,000 which the Welsh Congregationalists have set themselves to collect, over £10,000 has already come to hand. About £6,500 of this amount has already been loaned to weak churches at a low rate of interest.

It is pleasant to be able to record an instance of generosity upon the part of a Welsh nobleman—himself an Anglican—towards one of the Nonconformist bodies of the Principality. The lease of the Welsh Baptist chapel at Llandudno having recently expired, the landlord, Lord Mostyn, has renewed the lease free of all charge. This is equal to a gift of £600 to the cause.

The Welsh Calvinistic Methodist Book-Room is to be congratulated upon bringing out an exceedingly useful series of penny booklets, dealing with subjects affecting the welfare of all. Some of the subjects written upon are "Marriage," "Christians and the Drink Traffic," "This Great Evil," and "The Testimony of Medical Men with regard to this Great Evil."

Last week the Welsh branch of the Bible Society in Liverpool held its annual gatherings. Meetings were held in three places simultaneously, and were attended by several prominent Welsh ministers. From the report submitted, it appears that since the formation of the Welsh branch in 1834, it has collected no less a sum than £32,031 19s. 4d. towards the funds of the Bible Society. During the same period the same auxiliary has distributed 19,914 Bibles, 25,129 Testaments, 4,585 portions of Scripture amongst the Welsh inhabitants of the great city on the Mersey.

Little more than a year ago Wales mourned the loss of one of her best and noblest sons, Mr. Tom Ellis. The uncrowned king of Wales — king because of his goodness, as much as because of his ability—was the object of earnest admiration on the part of all creeds and classes. Since his death a committee has been at work securing subscriptions for a memorial, and has just decided to erect a statue at Bala, and to found a Tom Ellis scholarship.

The Welsh Baptist Union is to meet next year at Porth in the Rhondda Valley. The president-elect is Dr. J. A. Morris, of Aberystwyth, while Dr. W. P. Williams, of Landore, editor of Saren Cymru, is to fill the vice-chair. The secretarial work falls to the lot of Rev. E. Edmunds, of Swansea.

Lantern Lectures.—Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode, Bible Warehouse, Great New Street, E.C., indicate that they have secured the services of several well-known writers to prepare lantern lectures, copies of which are sent (with slides) for a small fee to societies, institutions, schools, &c. Particulars will be forwarded on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.

*The Spotted Tiger Foiled.

MY camp was pitched in a valley between mountains towering up 4,000 feet above the sea, and 1,700 feet above my tent. I had been visiting, instructing, and encouraging the little Christian congregation there, and preaching in all the surrounding towns and villages for several days. It was necessary to move camp that day to another cluster of Christian villages on the other side of the mountain, many miles around by a tortuous route through the valleys. . . . There are many wild beasts inhabiting these mountain jungles: wild boar, deer, Indian elk, hyenas, jackals, wolves, an occasional striped tiger, and more spotted tigers. . . .

The spotted tigers have spots like a leopard, but are not leopards, for they have claws like a tiger and cannot climb trees as a leopard can. In size they are between the royal tiger and the leopard. In disposition and habits they are tigers, and they have a tiger's strength. A friend of mine, from an opposite hill, saw one of them spring upon a small horse, kill it, suck its blood, and then drag it to its lair in the mountain recesses. The spotted tigers do far more damage in our region than the striped, as they are much more numerous. If one gets a taste of human flesh, nothing else will satisfy it; but such diet soon makes it mangy and shortens its life.

We usually carry arms through these mountain jungles, but that day I had none. I had made the ascent of 1,700 feet, and, walking along the west slope of the summit for a quarter of a mile, I had crossed over to the east side of the rocky crest.

It was now one hour before sundown of a cloudy, drizzly afternoon. I had my double umbrella, black inside and white outside, for fending off both sun and rain, but had closed it over my hand, without clasping it, to go through a narrow opening in the bushes. I had crossed a little open grass-plot of a few rods, and was just entering a narrow footpath through the mountain jungle that would take me down to the east foot of the mountain, where I was to meet my pony.

Suddenly a spotted tiger sprang into the path between the bushes and disputed the passage. I saw at once what he wanted; only great hunger impels these tigers to come out during the day; he had had no breakfast, and wanted

MISSIONARY MEAT FOR SUPPER.

I did not wish him to have it; I had an appointment for that evening with the people of three villages, and wished to keep it. He stood in the only path through that dense mountain jungle, glaring at me. I eyed him intently, and, gaining his eye, held it while I formed my plan.

It is always best if a scrimmage is to take place to be the attacking party. My old grandmother used to teach me that everything would come in use within seven years, if you only kept it, When I was a boy I had gone out among an Indian tribe in Michigan, and learned their warwhoop. I had kept it for thrice seven years, but it proved trebly serviceable then. When my plan of attack was formed, springing forward toward the tiger I raised this warwhoop, and at the same time suddenly opened my double umbrella.

What it was that could so suddenly change a perpendicular dark figure into a circular white object, and at the same time emit such an unearthly yell, the tiger did not know. He stood his ground, however, until I dashed forward, and, suddenly shutting my umbrella, raised it to strike him over the head. It seemed instantly to occur to him that I was the more dangerous animal of the two, and that one of us had better run; as I did not, he did. Springing aside, over a bush, into the open ground, he made for the crest of the hill which I had just passed. His spring was the neatest specimen of animal motion I had ever seen. His forepaws were stretched straight out, and he had his nose between them. His hind feet were stretched equally straight, and between them his tail. Straight as an arrow he went through that opening. . . .

Putting my head with its big white sun hat into the opening, I once more raised the warwhoop. Down he dashed again with impetuosity. Withdrawing my head until he slackened his pace, I repeated the operation, and on he dashed, and so continued, until I had seen him cross the stream, and go up into the woods on the opposite side of the valley. Then, feeling sure that I could see no more of him that day, I turned and wended my way down three miles to the foot of the hill, mounted my pony, and kept my appointment.

I am thankful to say that such incidents are not common in our preaching tours. I have never known of a missionary being seriously injured by ravenous beasts or venomous reptiles. But such an incident forcibly reminds us of the protection promised in the last few verses of the Gospels of Matthew and Mark, in connection with the giving of the Great Commission, and that promise is wonderfully fulfilled.

"Well Done, the Little Ones!"

RESULTS OF THE PRIZE COMPETITION.

ONCE more I am happily able to congratulate a large number of my "boys and girls" upon their success in the Quarterly Prize Competition. Some of them "worked very hard," they tell me, and I can quite believe it; and so did my helpers and I in correcting the multitude of papers. Our prizes consist partly in seeing such a long list of names, and still more in thinking that you all know a good deal more about Jeremiah than you did a month or two ago!

But how is it that the papers are done better by the younger than by the elder members of each division? Why should boys and girls of ten be beaten by those of eight; or of seventeen by others at fifteen? This is a matter I hope will receive attention; not that I want the younger ones to do worse papers, but the elders to do better ones. As it is, I am reminded of Dr. Moffatt's story of the appearance of the first waggon in a certain part of Africa, when the people were so surprised that the little wheels kept ahead of the big ones that they ran alongside, crying out, "Well done the little ones, well done the little ones!"

PRIZE LIST.

FIRST PRIZES.

Division I.—Jessie Palmer, Edward Wheeler, Annie Wood, Willie Hooper, Alice Crang, Isabel Goudge.

Division II.—Gladys Phipps and Dudley Toye (Special Prize), Edith Harvey, Duncan Campbell, Marjory Dyke, Pringle Wilson, Walter Fleet, Kathleen Slark, Edith Wheeler, Elsie Hanson, George Locke, Vera Dickinson, Clarice Gale, Hetty Hill, Herbert Braddon.

Many thanks for flowers received. Also for some bags of lavender.

Jack Henderson.—I am glad to welcome you as a new "Searcher," and hope you will enjoy the study.

Gladys and Maurice Young.—Please do not write your Searchers on each other's paper.

Alice Reid.—Your answer to No. 238 was incorrect, otherwise you would have been in the honours list.

Some of my nieces and nephews have sent me their photographs, in a group, which includes their page boy, who is also a "Searcher." I am always pleased to note instances of this kind, for I have heard of more than one case in which servants have been brought to Jesus through our Bible Searchers. The study of God's Word overcomes "class distinctions" among members of the family of Christ, who are "all one in Christ Jesus."

SUNDAY, OCT. 21.

Our Stewardship. (Luke xii. 42-48.)

SOME years ago, so it is said, a circular letter was addressed to a number of successful American business men, asking what were the secrets of their success. The answers were very various, such as: Sterling integrity in all things; rigorous adherence to promise; deal with every person as if you were to meet him again; be temperate; broaden your mind. And again: Close application; integrity; attention to detail. And yet again: Good moral character; gumption; a practical education. Jay Gould declared, "I have had to shove down every man I ever met."

How different to all this is our Master's word, that the Lord sets faithful and wise stewards over his goods. Without doubt, God's purposes work through such qualities as industry, foresight, &c.; but promotion comes from Himself. Where could we find better illustrations of this than in the business career of men like Samuel Budgett, George Moore, or Samuel Morley, who were able to dispense fortunes in their princely generosity to the cause of God!

Life is a stewardship of any money we possess or earn, of any talent with which we are entrusted, or of any influence that we are capable of exerting. It is most necessary, at the beginning of our life, to fix this definitely and certainly before us—we are not masters but stewards, not proprietors but trustees; that we are not free to do as we like, but that our accounts will be strictly inspected, and that our Master may come at any time for the audit.

If this is the literal truth about our life in this world, the sooner we accept it, and begin to build our lives upon it, the better. To live on one supposition, whilst quite the reverse is true, is like building a house on the supposition that floods will never come and winds will never blow, which is contrary to all known facts. Make an inventory of all you are and have, and then say to yourself, "I am a steward of these things, committed to my care by my Lord, to be used by me for the good of others; and I shall have to meet Him at the Judgment Seat of Christ and give an account."

Of course it goes without saying that the steward has a perfect right to live out of the proceeds of his trusts. As they accrue, it is permissible to write off certain amounts for the maintenance, recreation, and well-being of himself and his family. These amounts will be determined as a matter of conscience between his Master and himself. But as to the overplus, he must consult his Master's wishes, and especially he must remember that his fellow-servants and other members of the Lord's household have to be considered. He must remember the poor and needy, the sick and helpless, the lonely and desolate. It is for their sake that he has been put into his position; and he may not miss them over without being called strictly to account. Suppose that these poor members of the household complain to their Lord that they applied to his steward for maintenance, and were refused; and suppose that the Lord discovers that he has used in wantonness and riot the funds entrusted to him for others, may he not be severely scourged (R.V. mar.) and deprived of his office?

Of course the punishment will be in proportion to the offence. If the steward was not rightly informed of the nature of his responsible charge; or if, after investigation, he thought that those who applied to him for help were not members of the household, though it turned out afterwards that they were, he will suffer a less penalty than if he had sinned in the full noon-day of clear and certain knowledge. According to the greatness of his responsibilities will be his reward or blame.

We are all tempted to beat our fellow-servants, instead of feeding them; to eat and drink, and steep ourselves in the delights of the flesh. Let us be on the watch against these insidious and urgent temptations, and aspire after the blessedness of that servant who, whether the Lord comes late or soon, in death or the clouds of the Second Advent, shall be found standing faithfully to his post. F. B. M.

C.E. NOTES.

A London Society has spent a happy evening, entertaining 40 cripple children from the immediate neighbourhood. Each child received a toy, a book, and a marked New Testament.

The Yorkshire County Convention was recently held at Huddersfield. During the afternoon the Mayor extended a very warm welcome to the visitors. Throughout there was a most helpful and practical tone, auguring well for the new year of work.

* * *

The Fifth Convention of the Devon County Union was held on October 2 and 3. It was reported that there were 220 Societies in the Union, with a membership of 8,206. During the year, 217 associate members have become active, and 390 active members have joined the Church. The concluding Consecration Service was conducted by Rev. W. Knight Chaplin, and proved a very solemn and earnest time.

International S.S. Lesson.

October 21, 1900.

The Prodigal Son (Luke xv. 11-24).

Golden Text.—"I will arise and go to my Father" (18).

Introduction.

THIS parable is so familiar that it is difficult to make it appear fresh; the best way would be, perhaps, to gather up the points into a few short sentences. The whole subject may be summed up into the following: "God's willingness to receive penitent souls."

Sinful	.. .. ..	vv. 12, 13.
Miserable	.. ..	„ 14-16.
Penitent	.. ..	„ 17-20.
Forgiven	.. ..	„ 20-24.

1. Father, give me.
2. ar country.
3. amine.
4. ields.
5. ood of husks.
6. ather, I have sinned.
7. eet and body clothed.
8. atted calf killed.
9. riends.
10. ound.

Key to Blackboard Plan.—First picture shows us the first part of the prodigal's life. The second shows us the latter half.

1. Father, Give Me.

The Father represents God; the son the sinner; the goods (12) he demanded, are to us all the blessings and gifts God bestows upon us daily. The son used his own free will, (13) and went away from home.

2. Far Country.

(13) Far, far away from the Heavenly Father; "wasted" life; so does the sinner waste his gifts and talents when only used for his own pleasure. (Isa. lv. 2). Are you afar off? Peter was once, and then he fell. (Mark xiv. 54).

3. Famine.

(14) A "mighty" famine; no food, no money, nothing but misery. (Prov. xxviii. 19; xxiii. 3.)

There is a worse famine than even that of food, and those who will go away from God will suffer from this famine, see Amos. viii. 11, 12; Jer. ii. 19.

4. Fields.

(15, 16) Anything to earn a few pence, anything to get some food, however coarse; but with it terrible misery; he was not used to this work, nor to these husks.

5. Food.

(17) He is at his lowest depths, he thinks of the plenty even his Father's servants enjoy, and he, a son, eating swine's food; now comes the turning-point.

6. "Father, forgive."

(18-21). The first step to God is to see our own sinfulness and to know what sin means (Luke xviii. 13). "I perish," "I have sinned," "I will arise" (Isa. lv. 7, Jer. iii. 12, Hos. xiv. 1, 2). The Father's love, on the look-out, runs to meet when yet a great way off (20) (Psa. ciii. 8, Matt. vii. 11, Isa. xlix. 15, Eph. ii. 13).

7. Feet and Body Clothed.

Best robe, rings, shoes (22); Robe of righteousness, Ring of assurance, Shoes of peace. See Joseph (Gen. xli. 42). It meant not only pardon, but honour as well (Rev. iii. 18; Zech. iii. 4).

8. Fatted Calf Killed.

(23) Specially kept for thanksgiving services and festivals; no better time than now. It seems as if the great love of the father could not do enough to welcome home his prodigal son.

9. Friends.

(24) Joy and happiness amongst friends as well. Have you made your friends happy? Have you rejoiced God? Have you made the angels sing?

10. Found.

(32) What a beautiful word, with a beautiful meaning—"Was lost, is found."
"Was dead, is alive."

Ritualistic Appointments.—Protestants need to watch lest our public institutions one by one fall into the hands of the Ritualists. In Elham Workhouse, near Folkestone, a few years ago, there was an evangelical chaplain, ably supported by the Board of Guardians and a godly Nonconformist chairman, whose aim was the spiritual welfare of the inmates. Under his guidance ladies paid weekly visits to the union to read the Bible and sing hymns in the wards with very blessed results; and the whole religious tone of the workhouse was distinctly Evangelical. At the present time the chaplain is of the sacerdotal school; the "workhouse aid," the "ladies' visiting," and the "chaplain's ladies'" committees, are almost entirely composed of clergy and ladies with advanced ritualistic views. The ratepayers will have to bestir themselves, and see to it that the Board of Guardians, who are their representatives, do not allow the sacerdotalists to carry all before them to the exclusion of the evangelical section of the Church of God.

Women's Total Abstinence Union.—The autumnal meetings of the W.T.A.U. were held in Halifax, October 7 to 11. Services were held in many of the principal places of worship on Sunday, October 7, and during the week a large number of addresses were given to Bands of Hope, and to workers in large places of business. On October 9 a reception was given in the Mayor's Parlour. Words of welcome were spoken by Archdeacon Brooke and Rev. Eric A. Lawrence, to which the Hon. Mrs. Eliot Yorke and Miss M. E. Docwra replied. At a Conference on the following day, papers were read by Mrs. Finlay on "Objections to Becoming a Teetotaller," Mrs. Hind Smith on "Why I am a Teetotaller," Mrs. Kaye Dunn on "Clubs," and by Miss E. Docwra on "How to start and work a W.T.A.U. Society." An interesting discussion followed. A Junior Conference was subsequently held in the Friends Meeting House, when Mrs. Hawkes took the chair, and papers were read on the following subjects:—"Bible Wines," by Miss Hilda Paterson; "How best to extend our Work among the Young," by Miss E. Sharpe; "Temperance Work in the Holidays," by Miss Wilkinson; "The Girls of 1900," by Mrs. Lionel Mundy. The postmen and railway men were also addressed in special gatherings for the purpose, as well as the nurses at the infirmary.

Personalia.

Mr. W. C. Parkinson, L.C.C., treasurer of the Antwerp Sailors' Rest, may be addressed 18, Carleton Road, Holloway, N.

Mr. G. T. Maclean, M.A., of Glasgow University, has become General Secretary of the British College Christian Union in succession to Mr. Tissington Tatlow, M.A., who is now Editor of The Student Movement, and Educational Secretary of the Student Volunteer Missionary Union.

Rev. John Knox, late of the London Missionary Society at Vizagapatam, has been appointed one of the Association Secretaries of the Religious Tract Society for the South of England. Mr. Knox has for some time been assistant minister with Rev. C. Sylvester Horne, of the Allen Street Church, Kensington.

Miss Child, we regret to say, informs us that Mr. Blaauw (her devoted coadjutor) is in a very perilous condition of health. Mr. and Mrs. Blaauw have been with Miss Child for many years; we have a sincere regard for them, and ask our readers' prayers for this brave little band, who have been the means of leading a multitude of sailors, one by one, to God.

Professor W. S. Weeden, who has been singing and organizing the choirs in connection with the London Tent Work, has sailed for America. He desires to express, through the medium of our columns, his appreciation of the brotherly love and fellowship he has enjoyed while in this country. Mr. Weeden's home address is 34, Seventh Avenue, New York.

Mr. William J. Lewis, the founder and for many years the indefatigable superintendent of the Spital-fields Gospel Mission, has long been laid aside from active work. I found him a few days ago at his home, Ebenezer, Swanmore, Ryde, I.W. He has recently had a paralytic stroke, and is confined to bed, but his mind is clear, and his heart as true as ever to the Gospel he preached so effectively to the East-End poor. A letter from an old friend would please him. M.

Mr. James Wharton, of Barrow-in-Furness, who has recently held missions at Mr. Fegan's Home and at High Wycombe, writes us that he sails on Saturday in the Campania for another six months work among the Freedmen in the Southern States. Referring to the visit of Mr. T. M. Wintle and ourselves two years ago, he says: "I wish I might see you again there this winter, and have the same happy fellowship we had then. The dear coloured folk, and I will not soon forget it. What changes since I first went there twenty-three years ago. . . . The many happy homes and hearts made glad through the Gospel, which suits all classes, whether black or white. I commence special meetings in Washington, D.C., first week in November. I rely upon an interest in your prayers, as heretofore, that numbers of precious souls may be won for Christ." M.

Gospel Work at Leytonstone.

FOR nearly six years Messrs. Borton Brothers have held evangelistic services for the people, at Leytonstone Assembly Rooms, and they are now starting to build a commodious building to be called the Central Hall, where their work may find a permanent home. A suitable freehold site in Ferndale Road, Leytonstone, has been purchased by a friend interested in the work, who has also generously offered to build the hall at his own expense, on the understanding that the people raise the amount required for furnishing and fitting—about £350. The services are evangelical and undenominational. The work is carried on entirely by voluntary helpers.

Hyde Park, W.—Among other Gospel efforts put forth in Hyde Park, Mr. W. Newman, assisted by a number of workers, has held meetings near the Marble Arch throughout the summer. In connection with the movement a "rally" was held at Stafford Rooms, W., on Thursday last. Mr. William Davis presided, and the occasion was one of spiritual refreshment. A large number of persons testified to blessing received at the services.

Derbyshire Villages.—Pastor G. Howton, of the Mission Hall, Glossop, writes: "In a tour through South Derbyshire I have conducted meetings amongst the colliers in the new model villages, while Mrs. Howton and other workers have been to villages near Charlesworth and Hollingsworth. Mr. H. Buxton has experienced revival times at the Masbro' centre. In some places, where unable to obtain a hall, we have taken an old cottage and removed the middle partition. The people have filled the houses to hear the Word of Life. Some who for many years lived riotous lives have been brought out of darkness into light. We are in need of a Gospel van."

The Churches.

Church of England.

The congregation of St. Paul's, Jersey, are losing the services of Rev. Bulstrode Pryce, who, after seven years of valued labours, is leaving to take up work for the R.T.S. in the diocese of Liverpool and Manchester. During Mr. Pryce's ministry the congregations have greatly increased.

Prebendary Webb-Peploe stated at the Church Congress, with respect to his congregation, that they have four curates in the mission field; seventeen of their young men are preparing for missionary work; and they have given three martyrs to the cause; while in money their contributions have grown from £000 to £5,000 per annum.

Rev. S. C. Lowry has terminated his ministry at North Holmwood, near Dorking. In a farewell letter, he says: "God has given us his blessing in many ways, and we cannot be too thankful for his goodness. I know, however, how many are drifting through life unrepentant, unconverted, unforgiven. I know how many are unfit to die. I long to see more earnestness, more love for the Saviour, more of the Holy Spirit's work."

One of the most important livings in the Principality—that of St. Peters, Carmarthen—has just been filled by the appointment of Rev. Owen Evans, Warden of Llandovery College. Its importance arises from the fact that its occupancy is regarded as leading with almost absolute certainty to the episcopal bench. This appointment is another instance of the tendency in the matter of Church preferment to favour unduly the schoolmaster at the expense of the earnest, hard-working parish clergyman

The winter session of Holy Trinity, Cambridge, Men's Service was inaugurated by a social gathering for men only. An immense crowd assembled. An address was given by Rev. Marcus Rainsford. The first service of the fifth year was held in Holy Trinity on Sunday week. A great number had to be turned away, unable to find even standing room. The address by Rev. C. J. Proctor was on "Life's Harvest." At the ordinary evening service Rev. Professor Moule commenced a course of sermons on St. Paul's "Ambitions," when there was again a crowded congregation.

Rev. W. R. Mowll, in his report upon the work at Christ Church, North Brixton, draws attention to the position of the new church scheme. At least £4,000 will be required before the building is completed. "We shall not get into debt," he says, "and shall only build that portion for which we have money in hand to pay. By faith, prayer, and effort the whole can be accomplished." In regard to the general work, Mr. Mowll says that the interest in the various Bible readings is being well maintained, and testimony is constantly being given of "definite blessing" being received at these means of grace. Open-air work has been carried on throughout the year.

The Round Table Conference, held at Fulham Palace, lasted from October 10 till October 13. The subject referred for consideration was, "The Doctrine of the Holy Communion and its Expression in Ritual." The members of the Conference were Revs. Preb. Barlow, Prof. H. E. J. Bevan, Dr. Bigg, N. Dimock, Canon Gore, Prof. Moule, Canon Newbolt, Dr. A. Robertson, Canon A. Robinson, Prof. Sanday, Preb. Wace, Mr. W. J. Birkbeck, Viscount Halifax, the Earl of Stamford, and Chancellor P. V. Smith. Dr. Wace was elected chairman. Five sessions were held. The report will be submitted to the Bishop of London, and will then probably be published by his authority.

Congregational.

A letter has been received from Rev. Samuel Pearson, stating that his health has so far improved that he hopes to resume his ministry at Broughton Park Church, Manchester, on Sunday, October 21.

At the thanksgiving meeting held to commemorate the centenary of the Broad Street Chapel, Reading, Rev. Alfred Rowland, B.A., presided, and addresses were given by Rev. Dr. George Colborne, of Oxford, Mr. George H. Leonard, of Bristol, and Rev. R. Herbert Sewell, pastor of the Church.

At the public recognition of Rev. R. D. Thomas, at Coverdale church, Limehouse, Rev. J. Morgan Gibbon presided, and the meeting was addressed by Revs. A. Mearns, H. Elvet Lewis, J. W. Atkinson, and other friends. Mr. Atkinson appealed to suburban Congregationalists who have removed from East London, still to continue their sympathy and help towards their old churches.

The thirty-fifth anniversary of Rev. R. Allen Davies's Settlement at Ventnor was recently celebrated. On the Sunday Mr. Davies preached in the morning on the Ministry of the Pulpit, and in the evening on the Ministry of the Church. On the Wednesday afternoon Dr. Newman Hall preached, and at a public gathering, at which Mr. J. W. Brake (treasurer of the Hampshire Congregational Union) presided, addresses were delivered by Dr. Hall, Rev. H. Coley, and other friends. The attendances were large, and the proceedings enthusiastic.

Calls (accepted). Rev. W. Newton, of Oldham, to Cleator Moor, Cumberland; Mr. A. Depledge-Sykes, of Western College, Plymouth, to Romford Road (Upton) Church, Forest Gate; Rev. T. M. M'Kendrick, of Innerleithen, to the Morrison Memorial Church, Clydebank, Glasgow.

Baptist.

At Rye Lane Chapel, Peckham, a large assembly came together to bid "God-speed" to Miss Muriel B. Whittaker, whom the Sunday school is sending forth as its second representative in the foreign mission field. Miss Whittaker goes to Dacca for Zenana Mission work with Miss Ewing, the sister of the pastor, Rev. J. W. Ewing.

The first Baptismal service in the new Metropolitan Tabernacle has been held. Rev. J. W. Ewing was the preacher, and took for his text Rom. v. 3-5, dealing with death, burial, resurrection, and newness of life as typified by baptism. The building was quite full. Rev. C. B. Sawday (the co-pastor) immersed fourteen or fifteen candidates.

The fifth anniversary of the Rev. H. J. Knight's settlement at Peckham Rye Tabernacle was recently celebrated. The thank offerings, with the Sunday's collections, amounted to considerably over £100. Rev. J. T. Briscoe preached, and was also present at an evening meeting, together with Revs. F. H. King (Bow) and David Tait (Clarendon), who addressed an enthusiastic gathering. The report showed a good year's work, and progress in all departments.

Preaching at Ilfracombe on the moral tone of England, Rev. T. Philpot referred to the present-day style of reporting crime in the daily press. The fruits of sin, he said, are being served up in the form of smart entertaining anecdotes. The tendency of this clever journalism is to blunt the moral sense, and to reduce the "sinfulness" of sin to a minimum. Its popularity indicates a grave peril to the young life of the nation.

The action of the Welsh Baptists in objecting to the united Communion service held in connection with local meetings of the National Free Church Council, as well as at the annual gathering of the Council itself, is the subject of considerable discussion in the Principality. The Welsh churches of the Baptist denomination, with hardly a single exception, uphold close communion. They are in hearty agreement with all the other features of the programme of the National Free Church Council.

Methodist.

At the first Sunday night service in the New Central Hall, Bermondsey, Rev. H. T. Meakin had a packed audience of the people of the neighbourhood. Hundreds were unable to get in, and an overflow service was organized in the street. The costers, whom Mr. Meakin had specially invited, were there in great force. A significant fact is that of the 2,179 coins in the collection, 2,067 were pennies, halfpennies, and farthings.

In an address at the East London Wesleyan Mission anniversary, Rev. J. Howard said that in his view temperance is the most important of all social questions. He saw recently two shoeless children coming out of a public-house, and each had a can of beer. "How old are you?" he said to one. "Six, sir." "And you?" "Seven, sir." The housing question also needs dealing with. Mr. Howard recently visited a room ten feet square; on one bed lay a mother and her baby, and another woman and two children.

Presbyterian.

At a recent meeting of the Berwick Presbytery, Rev. J. Miller, convener of the Home Missions and Evangelistic Work Committee, urged that they should not think their work had been accomplished when they had proclaimed the Gospel to those of their congregation who came to hear, but that they should carry the Gospel to everyone. To be successful we must proclaim the evangel with a strong belief in the message we are delivering. There is room for an increase of loyalty to Christ both on the part of ministers and members.

The sixth anniversary of Rev. J. More's settlement in New Road Chapel, Woolwich, has been celebrated. Rev. A. Connell, of Regent Square, preached a thoughtful and instructive sermon from Col. iii. 24: "For ye serve the Lord Christ." At the public meeting which was subsequently held, a number of ministers spoke, and Rev. J. More gave a running epitome of the last five years' work of his ministry, in which there has been some cloud, some shadow, and he was glad to be able to add, some sunshine. There is good hope of clearing off the liabilities which remain, amounting to £300.

Calls (accepted).—Rev. J. M. E. Ross to Redhill, Surrey; Rev. A. J. Marshall to New Brompton, Chatham, with the Army chaplaincy.

Fallen Asleep.

Miss Caldwell, a devoted member and worker of the Presbyterian Church at Little Sutton.—Aged seventy-nine, Mr. D. R. Dossetor, well known in connection with Bloomsbury Chapel. He was among the young men who in 1848 formed the Young Men's Missionary Association, its special object being to interest young men in the London churches and elsewhere in the work of the Baptist Missionary Society.—Methodism in Tyne Dale has sustained the loss of a true pillar of the Church by the death, at the age of seventy-six, of Mr. Thomas Lee, of Heugh House, Haydon Bridge, in the Hexham Circuit.—Aged fifteen, Miss Amy Fanny Shaw, a member of Grafton Square Tabernacle, Northampton, well known in the town for her gifts as a singer, although so young. She was a devoted Sunday school teacher.—At Dublin, suddenly in a tramcar, Rev. Dr. Fletcher, Rector of St. Barnabas, for many years one of the secretaries of the Annual Christian Convention.—At Belfast, Miss J. S. Hannah, an enthusiastic Sunday school teacher and missionary worker in connection with York Street Presbyterian Church.—At Newcastle-on-Tyne, Mr. James Birch Crozier, of Banbridge, co. Down.

Requests for Prayer.

On behalf of a mission being conducted by Rev. E. A. Stuart at the central Y.W.C.A., 26, George Street, Hanover Square, nightly to Oct. 20, at 8.30 p.m.

For blessing upon the Bayswater Convention, Oct. 29-Nov. 3, that it may be the occasion of a mighty work of the Holy Ghost throughout London.

For blessing on a mission to be conducted by Rev. F. E. Heape at Buxton, Oct. 21-28.

For a mission at Esher, commencing Sunday, Oct. 21, conducted by Mr. S. Levermore, of the Open-Air Mission.

For services to be conducted in the Duckpool Road Baptist Church, Newport, Mon., by Rev. A. T. Jones, October 21-28 inclusive.

North-West America.—Rev. J. M. Pamment, who left England some eight years since for Washington State, U.S.A., has been labouring, in the interval, amongst the Indians of Puget Sound, under the Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church, at first with the Puyallup tribe only, but during the past four years with the Usqually and Chehalis also. The work of preaching the Gospel and building up Christians in the faith has been blessed. The Indians of the Pacific coast are in a period of transition; the old people retain the language and many of the ways of their ancestors, while the young are becoming more like white people. If all the whites around them were Christians, this approximation to the white man's way would be good, but as things are, it is not always to the well-being of the Indians. Reviewing the past eight years' work, there is evidence that the Indian people are improving—more industry and settled habits of life are manifest, with less wandering; the children are permitted to remain in the school with less interruption. At the time of writing (September 13), attendances at the services were increasing, and a mission by a native minister was being arranged.

Scottish Sabbath Schools.

THE annual public meeting of the Scottish National Sabbath School Union was held in Glasgow, on Wednesday, October 10, Mr. John Ingram occupying the chair. Referring to various aspects of the work, the chairman mentioned that a new feature was about to be introduced through the formation of a Ladies' Auxiliary. The idea of a National Union had been so successful that, of forty-one Unions throughout the country, thirty-nine had been affiliated, in addition to a very large number of isolated schools. In Glasgow the teachers constitute an army of 10,000, which the directors are seeking to have raised to 12,000; and another long-cherished wish, which they hope soon to see realized, is that for the appointment of a Sabbath school agent, who would give his whole time to the furtherance of the work.

BENEFITS TO THE TEACHER.

Speaking on "The Sabbath School: its Importance to the Teacher," Rev. Hugh Black (Free St. George's, Edinburgh) said this could not be over-estimated. "If it is done in the right spirit it is one of the greatest means of grace to your own soul. Faith must have outlet in work, love must serve, and the service reacts on the faith and love. There is always a per contra in the spiritual world. Giving is not all giving; in the end it is mostly getting. If you ask how you are to teach the children, I suggest the question, how are you to learn of the children? The lessons learned in this way are those of humility, child-like simplicity, and faith; but all are summed up in the one of love. If you do not learn this, your work is in vain, but if you have learned it there is no end to your influence. Only love can give the necessary tact and spiritual impulse, and the way to impress the children is to let them impress you. Let them impress all your methods, and you are at least on the way to influence."

BENEFITS TO THE COMMUNITY.

The Lord Provost of Glasgow (the Hon. Samuel Chisholm) spoke on "The Sabbath School: its Importance to the Community." (1) The first effect which he pointed out was the assistance given in maintaining in the minds of children, parents, other members of the families, and so in the entire community, a sense of spiritual and unseen things. "In spite of all the mischievousness, carelessness, and indifference which seem to prevail, there are tens of thousands of children of whom we may not speak confidently as to conversion, but who receive an impulse, and a sense and consciousness of the unseen things which remain with them as powerful factors during their entire lives. It is that which keeps us as a people from dropping down in the sheer abyss of materialism, or to the godlessness of utter selfishness.

"(2) Do you imagine that the love, tender affection, faith, self-denial, and self-sacrifice which so many teachers manifest, go all for nought? That father and mother, whose home you visit, or who hear what you have been saying and doing, know that the child is theirs, not yours: yet they see you surround that child with a love, and thought, and care; and by a clear intuition, they see your love as a reflection of the love of God. In spite of themselves they are compelled to see and acknowledge in this way the reality of the unseen things.

"(3) Think how Sabbath schools have contributed to build up and maintain character in our midst. When you are estimating the thousand-and-one influences that have gone to make men and women what they are, it is impossible to say what each accounts for; but it is also simply impossible that the teaching of the moral duties, the holding up of the example of the heroes of the Old and New Testaments, and, above all, the perfect example of Christ, can be without the most powerful effect on these young immortals under your charge.

"If these results are attained by the Sabbath School as it is—with all its acknowledged imperfections and faults, and weak points—what might it not accomplish if we got rid of these weaknesses, if we had teachers still more intelligent, more instructed in the truths they have to teach, if we had them more consecrated and manifesting a yet greater interest in their children, sending out a yet larger and fuller stream of influence into the homes of the people?"

Rev. George Wilson (St. Michael's, Edinburgh) was prevented by the state of his health from being present; but his place was taken by Rev. E. Sherwood Gunson (Clydebank), who spoke on "The Influence of the Sabbath School upon the Child."

The Church and Amusements.

A SERIES of monthly Gospel Temperance meetings have been begun in Galashiels, under the auspices of the local lodges of Good Templars. At the first of these, ex-Town Councillor Fairgrieve presided, and an address on "Christianity and Amusements," was given by Rev. Winning Russell, of the Evangelical Union Church, Selkirk. Mr. Russell explained that it was thought such services would do good in the churches, because, while many might be on the side of temperance, and yet not be Christians, he thought all Christians should be in sympathy with temperance work. Dealing with the attitude of the Church to amusements, he showed the danger of adopting an ascetic position, and then proceeded to give warnings and cautions. "Amusement is good, but all amusements are not good. Sometimes they are carried to excess, and associated with evil things, such as the public-house and drinking." He said he could not give a list of what amusements are good and what are bad, because Christianity is not a thing of rules, but of principles. Amusements good in themselves become dangerous because of betting, gambling, and such things attached thereto being temptations and snares. A connection with sporting clubs was calculated to lead members bit by bit into drinking and gambling. He quoted cases of this kind that had come under his own notice, where people had fallen victims. Instancing football, he spoke plainly about the large number of young men who play on Saturday until they are so tired as to be unfit for church or any other service next day. Another evil he dealt with was the extent to which the reading of "trash" goes on among the rising generation. Mr. Russell closed by urging the care of the soul, and the making sure of salvation, as the wisest course for all.

London City Mission.—Fifty years ago, in what is known as the South and South-East London Auxiliaries of the City Mission, a staff of thirty-seven missionaries were engaged. To-day, the workers number 127, and their operations for one year make an interesting seventy-two pages of report. In the vast district covered by the Auxiliaries, sixty-one mission halls are located, accommodating nearly 10,000 adults. The average weekly attendance is 12,348. For the year, 413 persons have been passed on to the churches.

Bethnal Green Needlework Guild.—By means of this useful agency, work is provided for a number of the needy and aged poor of this district, whose small pittance from the parish or other source is only sufficient to pay rent of a tiny room. A large number of garments are on hand, and ladies desirous of assisting those who are endeavouring to help themselves may obtain parcels as gifts to missions or for distribution from this source. Sister Frances Laws, 33, Gore Road, N.E., will be glad to receive inquiries and give information respecting the Guild.

National Protestant Sunday.—Many ministers have fallen in with the arrangement to bring before their people on Sunday, November 4, the subject of the blessings accruing from the Protestant Reformation. Rev. Alex. Roger, of the National Protestant Federation, 50, Imperial Buildings, Ludgate Circus, E.C., writes:—"We are anxious that our published list of preachers and churches shall be as complete as possible, and shall be glad if you will permit us to ask any of your ministerial readers who have not yet communicated their intention of observing 'Protestant Sunday' to do so at once, in order that their names may be included in the list, and the necessary placards and literature, announcing the sermons, may be sent in good time."

The Minister's Ideal.

REV. JOHN MARTIN, who has been recently inducted to Free St. John's Church, Dundee, when preaching his first sermon to his new flock, chose as a title, "The Minister's Ideal." Before concluding he said: "Preachers are often invited to extend the scope of their preaching; and, if not actually to secularize the pulpit, to minister to the love of change and novelty which is so rife in this restless age. But it is not the part of the minister to tickle the ears of his fellow-sinners.

"He is speaking to men and women who are met, not for mental recreation, but as immortal souls exercised by the very deepest of all human experiences. To meet this want is the true sphere of the pulpit—Christ first, Christ last, Christ only. There are elaborate theories about the nature of God, about the ultimate decrees of God, and about the precise explanation of how the dying love and obedience of Christ cleanses sinners from their sin—to young men I would recommend the study of theology as the cream of all the sciences. But correct views of Christ will not make a man a Christian, unless he has the Holy Spirit within him; for, as Wesley said, 'A man might be as orthodox as the devil, and as wicked.'"

The same week which saw Mr. Martin introduced to Free St. John's also saw Rev. Arthur T. Walker inducted to Ward Road Baptist Church, Dundee. It is satisfactory to note that he also indicated at the outset of his new ministry that, while fully appreciating the value of all social and ethical work in other churches, his efforts would be on purely evangelical lines.

Temperance in Edinburgh.

IN view of the coming election of Town Councillors, and the awful drunkenness prevailing in Edinburgh, Miss Darling, Waterloo Place, called together a meeting of influential citizens to meet Rev. Leonard M. Isitt, from New Zealand, and Miss Florence Balgarnie, of London, who, under the auspices of the various temperance associations, are pioneering a campaign against the liquor dealers, who, with their friends, have got the control of municipal affairs in their hands, to a large extent, to the detriment and disgrace of the city.

Rev. Mr. Dickson, an out-and-out temperance man, presided. Ex-Bailie Lewis made some very startling statements as to the loose manner in which those in authority deal with licences, and the police wink at the delinquencies of the publicans in the prosecution of their infamous trade.

The first meeting of the series was held in the Free Assembly Hall last Lord's Day evening, and was addressed by Mr. Isitt and Miss Balgarnie. Hundreds were turned away unable to get in, showing that the community are waking up to the terrible state of things with which they are threatened if strenuous efforts are not now made to put men of unflinching moral stamina into positions of power.

The Y.M.C.A.

THE work has been greatly revived at Hastings, under the secretaryship of Mr. E. C. Davey. At the annual meeting on October 9, presided over by Sir George Williams, accounts of progress were given.

The annual meeting of the Association at Bolton, Lancs., took place on October 8, at the Town Hall. Rev. J. Grange Bennett, Mr. Ernest Carus-Wilson, and Mr. A. K. Yapp, were the speakers. One of the members has recently joined the staff of the Newcastle City Mission, a second has become identified with the Navvy Mission, and a third is working in connection with the Church Association.

Sir George Williams celebrated his seventy-ninth birthday on October 11, and was the recipient of many congratulatory messages. In the evening he recived a warm welcome at the Town Hall, Lavender Hill, where he presided over the twelfth anniversary meeting of the Clapham Junction Association.

Our Oxford Letter.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

OXFORD Michaelmas Term has begun, and among other hopeful signs of a movement in the right direction is consideration for the college servants. Rev. A. J. Carlyle, Chaplain and Tutor of University, convened a special meeting at his house on Monday at which the Bursar and Chaplain of Balliol (Rev. E. J. Palmer) presided. The servants were well represented. The question for discussion was a special service on Sunday at which most of the servants could be present. There was a strong feeling among the latter that opportunity should be given for attending their own church, and that the only remedy is a six o'clock dinner. Mr. Thornton, of Brasenose, urged that any real interest on the servants' behalf would show itself in some self-denial on the part of the college authorities. A cold dinner one hour earlier on Sunday could be no great hardship, and he contended that a little practical Christianity would solve the problem.

Oxford Town Hall has been asked for, for free Sunday Evening Concerts. After a long discussion, it was decided to refer the matter to the General Purposes Committee. The motion was brought forward by one of the Councillors, who urged that it was only for the month of October. We trust the city buildings will never be let for Sunday Concerts, whether free or otherwise. The fact that concerts are already held in the Corn Exchange, does not affect the matter, and there are many who would be sorely grieved if the city buildings were let for this purpose. This is a question for the ratepayers, and, if needs be, a protest ought to be made.

On Wednesday delegates from the Oxford District met for a convention in connection with the great financial scheme of the Wesleyan Methodists. All-day gatherings were held, and the scheme in the district was advanced a further stage. Beginning a year ago with promises of 8,000 guineas, Oxford District now sees its way to sending up 14,400 guineas. When we remember the spirit which has animated the scheme from beginning to end, the self-denial the sum represents, one cannot but thank God. There is enthusiasm in the land, and it beats strongest in the hearts of those who love Jesus Christ. Dr. Allen, at the evening meeting, said that "their Saviour was giving to Methodists the greatest opportunity He had ever given to them." When we are told that already more than 800,000 guineas have either been given or promised, we feel that Methodism has responded to his call.

Rev. E. G. Bowring, organizing secretary of the National Protestant League, delivered a lecture at St. Clement's on Friday on "The Crisis in the Church: its Causes and Remedies." He contended that strong measures must be adopted if the progress of the Romanizers was to be checked. He held that the first great cause was the intrigue of the Roman Church. Unable to retain its own members, it was working, through the Romanizers, in the Church of England. Four thousand one hundred and fifty English clergy were pledged to bring about reunion with Rome. A second cause, Mr. Bowring said, was the disloyalty of the bishops themselves.

Speaking on the religious education of the young, Rev. H. E. Clayton, vicar of St. Mary Magdalene, emphasized on Sunday the danger of neglecting "soul culture." Education, he said, was a most valuable possession, but unless the soul was to be educated as well as the intellect, there was no guarantee for the service of God in after life. A child wanted something definite and solid to lay hold of and digest, and by degrees that something shaped its character. Divine grace acting upon "the implanted word" developed it and made it fruit-bearing. The word, we feel, was timely. There is much excellent teaching of the young, even religious teaching; the love, too, in our schools is often all that can be desired; but the definite solid food is often lacking. We build too much for the present. We do not dig sufficiently deep and lay a good foundation.

Exemplary Magistrates.—It is stated that the magistrates of Blackburn have decided to visit before the next licensing sessions all the public-houses in their district so that they may be able to deal properly with the question of the excessive amount of the "accommodation." Apparently the admirable example of Liverpool is being followed.

Silent Victories, by Mrs. Josephine E. Butler. A brief record of the wonderful spiritual work which has been done, and is being continued, among the troops in South Africa, gathered from various sources. (1s. 1½d. post free, from F. Burfoot, 55, Ellerdale Street, Lewisham, S.E., or from the office of The Christian.)

Obituary.

MR. ROBERT ARTHINGTON.

THE death has just occurred at Teignmouth, in South Devon, of Mr. Robert Arthington, who for a long period was a resident of Leeds. He was seventy-six years of age. Mr. Arthington was an eccentric man of great wealth, and greatly interested in missionary enterprise. He gave large sums to the London Missionary Society for work among the Awamba tribes, near Lake Tanganyika, also the Baptist Missionary Society for the Congo Mission. It was pioneer work that specially attracted him, and commanded his liberal support.

MRS. P. H. GOSSE.

The death is announced of Eliza Gosse, second wife and widow of Philip Henry Gosse, F.R.S., aged eighty-seven years and six months. Mrs. Gosse died on Sunday last, after a few hours' illness, at her residence, Sandhurst, St. Mary-church, Torquay. A wide circle of friends will mourn her departure.

DR. DAVID YOUNG.

Many who have lived in Rome will hear with sorrow of the death of Dr. David Young, a British medical practitioner, until recently residing in the Via Venti Settembre. He died last week at Melville Lodge, Ventnor, Isle of Wight, at the age of sixty-one. Receiving his education at Edinburgh and Aberdeen, he took the M.B. and C.M. degree at Aberdeen in 1865, and the same year was admitted a licentiate of both the Royal Colleges of Physicians and Surgeons in Edinburgh, and also a licentiate in medicine, receiving his M.D. degree at Aberdeen four years later. Dr. Young lived for some time in India, where he was Professor of Botany at the Grant Medical College, and Examiner in Midwifery at the University of Bombay, of which University he was a Fellow. He was the author of a standard work on the climate of Italy, entitled, "Rome in Winter and the Tuscan Hills in Summer." Dr. Young was a Christian man of wide experience and sound judgment.

The Y.W.C.A.

THE London workers of the Y.W.C.A. met on October 3-5 for the Annual Quiet Days, with which the Council arrange to commence the winter's work. The presidents and secretaries from many branches were present, and the meetings were conducted by Mrs. Hatt Noble and Miss Lilian Trotter. Rev. G. Johnston Ross gave helpful addresses each evening on "The Need the World has of Christ." The Y.W.C.A. is sending out this autumn, as usual, many of its workers to the foreign field.

The secretary of the Belfast Central Y.W.C.A. Institute writes:—"The winter's work was recently inaugurated by a tea and reception to welcome 'Our own missionary,' Mrs. Graham (née McMinn), on her return from China, after an absence of nearly ten years. She was enthusiastically received by a large audience assembled in the Lecture Hall, who listened with deep interest as she told of her experiences while working in Yun-nan. The association, in its various branches throughout the city, shows signs of vigorous life, and a necessity for 'lengthening the cords and strengthening the stakes.' To God be the glory."

THE Y.W.C.A. IN INDIA.

Good news of the new Institute comes from Calcutta. Miss Radford reports 443 attendances during the month of August. When it is remembered that the Institute was opened by local funds, we rejoice with our Indian fellow-workers. August is Calcutta's empty month, and it promises therefore good work for the future.

At Simla a mission (to be conducted by Miss Hewlett) was arranged to close the season at the new Holiday Home early in October.

The first Y.W.C.A. camp in India was arranged for by Miss Agnes Hill (National Secretary) and Miss Rouse (College Department Secretary) at Adyar, Madras, for Y.W.C.A. workers.

At Jhansi the building is progressing, and Miss Stubbs will need additional help for the enlarged sphere opening to her, also a substitute when she comes home on furlough.

About Books.

ANNUAL VOLUMES.

The sixty-seventh annual volume of the Child Own Magazine is gay outside and true to nurse tastes and needs within. (1s. Sunday School Union

A high place among volumes of its class must assigned to The Rosebud Annual, 1901. (4s. Clarke & Co.) Pictures and letterpress alike ar such as the children love; and the large type ar bright style must be voted "the very thing."

The twenty-first annual volume of Young Englan contains generous supplies of stories of adventure, addition to a variety of pleasant reading for hours recreation. The principal pictures are illustrati of war subjects. (5s. Sunday School Union.)

The Religious Tract Society's magazines for your people maintain a high standard of wholesome readin The Boys' Own Annual, with its stories of adventu and enterprise, combines interviews with notabiliti and papers on amusements and sports. The popul companion, The Girls' Own Annual, is also practic as well as entertaining. In addition to sketches o domestic interests, there are many stories, serial an short. These publications command the services some of the best writers of our day. (8s. each.)

In providing useful books for the young, Messr J. F. Shaw & Co. hold a good lead. Year by yea their volumes enter our households, and exert brightening and helpful influence. First come Our Darlings (3s. and 5s., according to binding which for twenty-six years has been a favourite, wit its many pictures and stories. Then we have Litt Frolic (2s. and 3s. 6d.), with pleasant readings large type. Lastly, there is Sunday Sunshin (1s. 6d. and 2s. 6d.), also a well-illustrated boo edited by Catharine Shaw. The gay exterior of thes publications is an additional element of attraction.

Among serial volumes for the home, designed interest young and old, there is nothing more attracti than the publications of Partridge & Co. The Britis Workman (1s. 6d. and 2s. 6d., according to binding with its large pages of wholesome reading and brigh illustrations, maintains the reputation of nearly fift years. The Band of Hope Review (1s. and 1s. 6d.) fifty years old. It is more handy in size than formerl and as useful as ever as an advocate of temperanc principles among the young. Then come The Famil Friend, a magazine for the home circle, and Th Friendly Visitor, a Gospel magazine for the peopl (1s. 6d. to 2s. 6d. each). Lastly, for the young, Th Infants' Magazine in large type, and The Children' Friend, for growing boys and girls (1s. 6d. to 2s. 6d. both of them carefully edited and sumptuousl illustrated.

The Keswick Week, 1900 (2s. net. Marshal Brothers), contains the addresses delivered at th Twenty-sixth Convention.

The latest number of the Evangelical Allianc Quarterly deals with a variety of important topics "An Outlook for Russia" gives a telling review of th position and prospects in that country, and "Th Martyrs in China" presents a pathetic account Christian suffering and the ravages of the Boxers The get-up of the magazine leaves nothing to b desired. (1d. Morgan & Scott.)

Renewal in the Church, by Rev. P. Barclay, M.A is a book on revival. Both in the body of the wor and in the copious appendixes, we find an abundanc of timely teaching, with most refreshing allusions to th history of great awakenings. Mr. Barclay has rea widely and with keen sympathy, and from quite un expected quarters he adduces pertinent facts an illustrative points which many will study wit pleasure and profit. His pages are instinct with noble enthusiasm, and we trust they will have man readers. (2s. 6d. nett. Paisley: Alexander Gardner.

The Searchlight of St. Hippolytus: The Papac and the New Testament in the Light of Discovery By Parke P. Flournoy. (2s. 6d. nett. C. J. Thynne. Born about fifty years after the death of the Apostl John, St. Hippolytus has for centuries occupied place in the Roman Calendar of Saints. Th discovery, nearly sixty years ago, of his book on th "Refutation of all Heresies," exhibits him as witness against modern Roman dogmas and to the credi of what is styled the traditional view of the integrit of the books of the New Testament. Mr. Flourno opens up these matters to the confusion of Romanism and Rationalism, and Prof. W. W. Moore, of Unio Theological Seminary, Virginia, writes an introductio to the book. The pages lay no claim to originality o erudition; but they conduct a valuable argument fo Evangelical truth in a manner that may easily b "understanded" by "the ordinary reade-"

PREFACE.

The life and character of John the Baptist have always had a great fascination for me; and I am thankful to have been permitted to write this book. But I am more thankful for the hours of absorbing interest spent in the study of his portraiture as given in the Gospels. I know of nothing that makes so pleasant a respite from the pressure of life's fret and strain, as to bathe mind and spirit in the translucent waters of Scripture biography.

As the clasp between the Old Testament and the New—the close of the one and the beginning of the other; as among the greatest of those born of women; as the porter who opened the door to the True Shepherd; as the fearless rebuker of royal and shameless sin—the Baptist must ever compel the homage and admiration of mankind.

In many respects, such a life cannot be repeated. But the spirit of humility and courage; of devotion to God, and uncompromising loyalty to truth, which was so conspicuous in him, may animate us. We, also, may be filled with the spirit and power of Elijah as he was; and may point, with lip and life, to the Saviour of the world, crying, "Behold the Lamb of God."

The Official and only Authorised Edition of

. . THE LIFE OF . . DWIGHT L. MOODY

BY HIS SON,

W. R. MOODY.

A first-hand Memoir of Mr. MOODY, embracing much information which is exclusively in the possession of the family.

Cloth Boards, 10s. 6d.,

Or, Cloth, Bev. Boards, Gilt Edges, 12s. 6d.

592 pages, Super Royal 8vo, with over ONE HUNDRED ILLUSTRATIONS, including Portraits and Views specially reserved for this Volume.

Mr. W. R. MOODY, in the Preface, says:—

"The preparation of my father's biography has been undertaken as a sacred trust. Early in the spring of 1894 he was asked by an old friend for permission to issue a biography with his approval. This my father declined to do, and on that occasion expressed the wish that I should assume the task when his life work was ended." "What I want,"

MR. D. L. MOODY SAID TO HIS SON,

"is that you should correct inaccuracies and mis-statements that it would be difficult to straighten out during my life. You are the one to do this. All my friends will unite with you and give you their assistance."

Referring to the short time in which the "Life" has been written,

Mr. W. R. MOODY says:—

"It would have been my choice to have had more leisure for accomplishing the work; but the announcement of unauthorised biographies has necessitated the immediate publication of the present volume, otherwise the desire of my father would have been thwarted."

MR. SANKEY'S TESTIMONY:—

"This biography will prove

VERY SATISFACTORY TO Mr. MOODY'S FRIENDS.

It will be an inspiration to the millions who knew of his work and were interested in it."

School of Bible Study.—A course of Bible study has again been arranged by the Committee of the Central Y.M.C.A. for the winter months. The first series of lectures, which are being given by Rev. W. H. Griffiths Thomas, opened on Monday afternoon at Exeter Hall. This course is to deal with St. John's Gospel and the Acts of the Apostles, and the introductory study concerned the purpose and plan of the Fourth Gospel. The lecture was repeated in the evening.

Soldiers' Institute for Netley.—Writing from Aston House, Netley Abbey, Hants, Mrs. Digby Dent says: "It is purposed to open at Netley a small Institute for the use of the Army Medical Corps and the soldiers on guard at the hospital, also for sailors and Marines of the guardship anchored close to the hospital. The need for an Institute is great, there being five public-houses within a stone's throw of the hospital, and no place where men can go for reading or recreation without the 'glass' being on hand. We have the building, but it needs fittings and some furniture."

"Welcome Mission," Portsmouth.—The autumn Convention commenced on Sunday, September 28, and continued during the following week. A special feature was a season of quiet waiting upon the Lord at each meeting. The speakers were Revs. C. Inwood, of Belfast, and F. E. Cheney, of Southsea, Dr. and Mrs. White, Captain Riley, and Messrs. Burrows, of C.I.M., I. M. Cleaver, and George Swan, of the Egypt Mission Band. The presence and power of God was very manifest at all the meetings, but especially on the Wednesday night, when many covenanted with the Lord to follow Him wholly.

A GENEROUS OFFER.

INDUSTRIAL HOME FOR BOYS, 119, COPENHAGEN STREET, N.

A Friend has kindly offered £50 towards a special Fund for clearing off the debt of £600 on the Industrial Home for Boys, Copenhagen Street, provided the rest of that amount is at once raised.

The Home, which receives boys from all parts of the kingdom, has been established for nearly fifty years. It has done, and continues to do, good work, while the need for its services continues as great as ever.

It has accommodation for eighty or ninety boys, but owing to the death of many old supporters, and the consequent diminution of income, it has gradually become necessary to reduce the number of inmates very considerably.

In several respects it occupies a position almost unique amongst institutions of this class, being intended for unconvicted boys, who have proved unmanageable at home.

The educational department is under the charge of a trained and first-class certificated Master. The usual annual examination of the School was made in November last, the passes being 88 per cent.

The Industrial occupations are Shoemaking, Tailoring, and Woodchopping. The work done in the Shoemaker's and Tailor's shops does not add to the nominal receipts, but it causes a reduction in the expenditure.

The boys regularly attend Holy Trinity Church, Islington, and their Sunday School at the Home has for many years been conducted by the students of St. John's Hall, Highbury.

Unfortunately, owing to the numerous calls upon public charity in these times, the Home, like many other institutions, is in financial difficulties, and the Committee are making a special effort to raise funds to clear off the existing deficit, and to obtain new helpers and subscribers, so that the Institution may be fully utilised and its operations extended.

The whole work is done in dependence upon God, and looking alone to His gracious blessing for the result; of that blessing many tokens have been vouchsafed.

Evangelistic.

London Open-Air Work.

During the summer two meetings have been conducted weekly in connection with Aldersgate Street Y.M.C.A., one on Sunday evenings at Leicester Square, and the other on Thursdays at Owen's Row, Goswell Road. A worker writes:—"Inquirers have responded at different times to the invitation to stay behind and talk over their difficulties with us. Some personal testimonies of a very definite character have been given that the seed has, in some cases, fallen upon good ground."

Mr. Spiers at Newport-on-Tay.

We have had a visit from Mr. JOSIAH SPIERS, of the Children's Special Service Mission. The meetings were continued for a fortnight, and the gracious influences of the Holy Spirit were clearly manifested towards the young people of the village and neighbourhood. The after-meetings were numerously attended, and a considerable number professed to give their hearts to Jesus, so as to love and serve Him, while the Christian workers seemed to get stimulus and blessing from the numerous Gospel services. It is about twenty-one years since Mr. Spiers last visited Newport. One of the converts of those early days, now a minister, called to see and have prayer with the evangelist. J. C. S.

Dr. Munhall's Movements.

The ten days' mission to young men conducted by Rev. Dr. MUNHALL, at Exeter Hall, was an impressive and fruitful time. At some of the gatherings the lower hall was filled. Earnest attention was paid to the evangelist's expositions and invitations, and as a result nearly 400 young men signified that they accepted Christ as their Saviour.

Mr. Munhall is announced to conduct a similar mission at the Aldersgate Street Y.M.C.A., Sunday, October 21-Monday, October 29, inclusive (Saturday, October 27, excepted). The Sunday services will commence at 3.30 and 7, and the week nights at 8. During the mission Dr. Munhall will also speak at the noon prayer meeting, which is open to all, the other services being, as stated, for young men only.

Missions to Hop-Pickers.

Messrs. J. BALCHIN and A. W. F. SMITH, who have been working in connection with the Worcestershire Hop-pickers' Mission, under the auspices of Rev. J. Burnham, write: "A number of persons have given evidence of a change of heart. We have also met some of last year's converts. A mother and two daughters were led to trust in Jesus. They are still living Christlike lives, and can be often heard singing in the hop yard 'Happy day, when Jesus washed my sins away.'" Other cases given by the writers include a young man who has since given practical help in a camp meeting which was held, and a woman who was restored after years of backsliding.

In East Sussex, a correspondent informs us, a good work has been done among the pickers. "Many cases of definite blessing have come under our notice as the result of the preaching of the Word. We have been encouraged by the eagerness of the people to hear the Gospel message. We were enabled to visit the people from bin to bin daily for a month, and to tell them the story of redeeming love. The dinner-hour services were well attended, and thousands of Gospels, tracts, and text cards were distributed. Meetings were also held in the encampments by lantern light while the people were having supper. One could relate many interesting cases of blessing."

Mr. Charrington's Work.

The recent mission of Mr. ROWLAND D. EDWARDS, of the Evangelization Society, in the Great Assembly Hall, Mile End, E., has been productive of good results. The immense audiences on Sundays have listened attentively to the very effective evangelistic addresses delivered by Mr. Edwards. At the annual harvest festival on the last Sunday in September the Great Hall was crowded out. Mr. Edwards is a lawyer, and those who listen to him are strongly impressed by his directness of speech, as he uses it in his Scriptural arguments. The week-night services held in the Great Tent were sometimes so large that the people stood all round, drinking in the words of everlasting life. Mr. Edwards' words, uttered with tenderness and sympathy for the lost and perishing, have been, we believe, the means of winning many precious souls for the Master's kingdom,

Notes & Comments

A VERY interesting Round Table Conference was held in December of last year between representative Churchmen and Nonconformists on the debatable questions arising out of the Scripture doctrines of sacrifice and priesthood. It was convened by Dr. Sanday, and it was inspired by the desire to ascertain how much the divergent schools of thought that divide religion in England at present hold in common on these fundamental problems. The report of this remarkable conference has now been published. The parties to it comprised (1) those among Episcopalians who call themselves High Churchmen, among whom were Canons Gore and Scott Holland, and Dr. Moberley; (2) those who refuse that name, led by Archdeacon Wilson, Dr. Ryle, Dr. Moule (who was unfortunately unable to attend); and (3) Nonconformists, among whom were Drs. Fairbairn, Salmond, Davison, and Forsyth. All these met in the friendliest and most conciliatory spirit, each being anxious to emphasize those points in which they agreed, rather than those upon which they differed.

The result is gratifying, both in the general bed-rock of common faith that was speedily uncovered beneath the differences, and in the revelation of the points at which the representatives of the various parties diverged. Three points of general agreement stand out in the discussion: (1) The recognition of the absolute completeness and uniqueness of Christ's work for man; (2) the maintenance of the priestliness of the Church; and (3) the identification of the essence of the unity of the Church with the presence and work of the Holy Spirit. It was in the interpretation of the second and third points that divergence became pronounced, and where doubtless divergence will continue to exist. Eminently satisfactory were the pronouncements of the leading High Churchmen on the completeness and sufficiency of the one great sacrifice for sin, to which nothing can be added; and so was the admission of Dr. Moberley concerning Nonconformists:—

> I freely recognise the working of the Spirit amongst them; I do not dream of denying spiritual realities in their ministry.

No sooner has the General Election been concluded than London is called upon to elect representatives for the Borough Councils. This is the first election under the new London Government Act of 1899, and it is bound to have important consequences. The greater election has, unfortunately, somewhat obscured the issues involved in the coming poll, but every effort must be made by all who desire the people's good to return the right men. In parts London is more badly governed than any other place in the country. Scandals of the worst kind have been for long enough permitted, owing to the predominant influence of unscrupulous wire-pullers. Now, if the electors are wise, the opportunity should be seized to return representatives, independently of party, who will make it their business to sweep away the present scandals, and to lay the foundation for a better London. Three of the most pressing problems needing instant attention are the prevention of overcrowding; the compulsory destruction of insanitary hovels which serve as the dwelling-places of many of the poor, and their replacement by good houses at fair rents; and finally, the suppression of disorderly houses, whether they are in Belgravia or Bethnal Green.

The intrusion of the "drink interest" into our political elections is one of the gravest symptoms of our times. Its influence is confessedly against reform; it is indeed a purely reactionary force. One of the most significant and at the same time disgraceful manifestations of its virulent spirit was seen in the recent Newport election, at which Mr. Albert Spicer was ousted from his seat, on the ground that he had introduced and passed through the House of Commons the Sunday Closing Bill for Monmouth. The victory of his opponent was signalized by a mourning-card, "in loving memory of Mr. Albert Spicer," containing a doggerel, of which the following significant lines were the climax:—

> We shan't linger to caress him,
> When we quaff our Sunday beer, and a blasphemous reference to Isaiah liii. 3. With such an object-lesson before us, we are tempted to ask how far Mr. Robinson Souttar's defeat was due to his having introduced a Bill to prevent the sending children as messengers for beer.

The proposed "welcome" to be given to our returned soldiers is worthy of a better form than a series of banquetings, in which the temptation to excess in eating and drinking is the dominant note. The notion has been aired in the newspapers of a succession of "such dinners and smoking concerts as have never been put on record," in honour of the return of the survivors to their homes. If this idea be carried out, our young soldiers will have escaped the perils of battle only to fall into worse dangers at home. Many a downward career has been started at public feastings.

Another phase of the same mistaken impulse is seen in its results in the following paragraph from a church magazine in Scotland. It is from the pen of a city missionary:—

> Drunkenness among women, principally wives and mothers, is increasing to an alarming extent. Much of it, we believe, is due to the benevolent efforts which, at this time, are being made to assist the families of the soldiers and militiamen who are in active service. Those who have this work in hand are positively paralysed in their efforts to help these classes. Col. Noble, the hon. secretary, has asked us to help him with the families in our district. I have visited every case, and have not found a sober woman amongst them, and some have expressed the hope that the war may continue for some time to come!

Is it not possible to welcome our soldiers home, and to help their wives and families, without letting loose the demons of gluttony and drink upon the community?

The Editor of the Sunday School Chronicle is rendering a great service to youths and their guardians by his publication of the opinions of leading athletes, doctors, etc., upon the subject of smoking amongst young people. It ought to have great weight with boys addicted to this habit, that in the opinion of such men as Mr. C. W. Alcock, the founder of the Football Association; Mr. John Dixon, captain of the famous Nottingham eleven for so long; Mr. Howard Spicer, the Editor of the "Sports Library;" Dr. W. G. Grace, and many others who have won fame as athletes—the habit of cigarette smoking, so common amongst boys and youths, is detrimental to their physical welfare, to say nothing more. Each of the men interviewed by the Chronicle Commissioner expressed his conviction that men who are serious about physical training must avoid narcotics in any form.

The proposal to provide a large establishment in London for the open-air treatment of the consumptive poor is no doubt admirable in its way, but it is not possible to avoid looking upon the movement as a beginning at the wrong end, that of dealing with the effect rather than the cause. It is so generally admitted by medical scientists that overcrowding is one of the most potent causes of the disease, and the Medical Officer of Health for London recently showed that "just as the proportion of over-crowding increases, so does the death-rate from consumption." Rev. Hugh Price Hughes recently stated that he knew of a house within a few minutes' walk from St. James' Hall in which forty-three persons resided. "In one room a man, his wife, and eight children were found; in another a man, his wife, and seven children, the eldest son with a wife, all herded together like animals." Yet our statesmen continue to neglect the duty of dealing with this pressing question, and leave it to philanthropy to succour the martyrs.

Fresh outbursts in London of hooliganism, in which unoffending wayfarers are waylaid and stabbed or beaten to death by a gang of roughs, once more brings under notice the terrible currents of savagery which run beneath the quiet surface of society. Like some physical diseases, this moral canker has an epidemic quality in it which passes like an infection through the neighbourhood affected. During the last few weeks two lives have been lost and several others permanently maimed in this way, and certain districts are under a reign of terror with which the police seem utterly unable to cope. The question is, how far is our social system responsible for these periodical outbursts of ruffianism? Are we, as a community, reaping what we have sown? There must be some terrible cause for so sinister a result, and it would be foolish to dismiss it with a mere shudder of horror or a shrug of disdain.

Certainly another element in the case is the type of "entertainment" supplied at most music-halls, in which drunkenness, brawling, indecency, and blackguardism are exalted to the level of the highest virtues, and loudly applauded from pit to gallery. Hooliganism is the practice in the streets of what is glorified in the halls.

Dr. Morrison, the brilliant Chinese correspondent of the Times, contributes to his journal a vivid account of the siege of Pekin. Few men have better right to speak of Chinese affairs than he, and in his articles he makes it abundantly clear that the charge made against the Dowager Empress is only too true. She it was who urged on the Boxers to their work of assassination and destruction. Dr. Morrison, more just than the representatives of the "yellow" press, gives the missionaries their due. He also puts his finger upon the centre of the whole trouble, in declaring that the rising of the Boxers was due, not to animosity towards missionaries, but to the policy of partition which Europe openly preached. The Chinese naturally resented the dismemberment of their empire. The bottom fact of the whole trouble is, as we pointed out a week or two ago, unholy greed on the part of Western nations, and whilst the spirit of conquest-at-any-price prevails we shall continue to see vendetta in full activity.

According to Rev. J. H. Jowett, one of the perils of our modern religious life is the debasement of the conception of the "practical."

If we divorce the practical from the spiritual, the practical will soon become the superficial, and will degenerate into a very lean and forceless thing.

There is much solid wisdom in this utterance, and some of those who are most spiritual in their thoughts are guilty of making an unreal separation between the region of their conscious religious life and that of their secular intercourse and business. It is only as we realize the ideal aspects of our common every-day activities that we shall do these well, and so be freed from their tyranny. St. Paul, in his Epistles, shows a wonderful faculty for viewing the most ordinary facts and events and duties in the light of Eternity; his mind moved with the utmost ease from the discussion of abstract doctrines to the questions and needs of the hour. That is one reason why his treatment of the problems of his time throw such vivid light on the questions of to-day.

A German savant, Professor Klaatsch, of Heidelberg, claims to have made an anatomical discovery which quite cuts the ground from under Darwin's theory of the Descent of Man. Possibly we may soon witness as bitter a war over this "short strand muscle" as that which waged so furiously some years ago between Professor Owen and Professor Huxley over the famous "hippocampus" in the brain. One set of philosophers is asserting that man has descended from the monkey; Klaatsch and his following declare that they have proved that the monkey is a degenerate man! And yet there are people who look to these wiseacres for light and leading, instead of to the good old Book which teaches us not only of the origin of man but also of his eternal destiny.

Unitarianism has never been noted for its modesty. Its supposed intellectual superiority over Evangelicalism is one of its frequent boasts. When, however, its adherents meet in conference they sometimes speak very frankly about their own weaknesses. Thus in the official sermon preached at Horsham last week, the preacher said:—

There is so much loose church allegiance amongst us, half adherence, casual attendance. We are in actual possession of the Church's one foundation, which alone is universal in its inclusion; but that church oneness has not yet taken hold of us, it does not kindle our emotion or imagination, or set going that glowing contagious enthusiasm which should come from our realised place and purpose in the fellowship and furtherance of the one Universal Church.

We may ask, Does not the sterility and coldness of which they complain arise from the fact that their religion is all wrong at the centre? Where the Divinity of our Lord is denied, all true religious enthusiasm is also suppressed. This is the uniform witness of history.

A renowned French oculist, Dr. Javal, is, it is said, rapidly growing blind, and though he has not as yet ceased to work, he will soon have to confine himself to dictating books on the subject of vision. There is a touching irony in the situation, and the sympathies of the many whom he has been instrumental in healing will be given to the afflicted scientist. Is there not, however, a possible danger for those who are spiritual leaders and healers of the blind to forget that they themselves may lose their vision, and may even bring to others that light of life which they themselves have ceased to behold with a believing faith? There is no sadder fate than to be a passive instrument instead of an active co-worker in the ministries of grace.

The Position of the Temperance Party.

THERE is no doubt that temperance workers have a period of hard work and severe strain before them in view of certain national tendencies that are dominant just now. There is little to encourage them in the state of public opinion; it would be idle to ignore the fact that the present Government, like the last, is largely indebted for its victory at the polls to the support of the drink trade; and the general affectation of weariness with all exhibitions of enthusiasm for reform which characterizes the attitude of our leading newspapers is not favourable to progress in temperance legislation.

A word on the first point. Public opinion just now is in a "trough" on this question of temperance. We are suffering from many discouragements. Public commissions having been appointed by Government are flouted by the very authorities that appointed them, and their very modest suggestions for reform

SUMMARILY SET ASIDE.

Yet there is no strong expression of indignation on the part of a people whose social condition is fairly honeycombed with the evil consequences of drink, and that to an extent unknown among any nations on the earth.

There must be a deep cause for this. Nor is it far to seek. During the past ten years there has been a steady "unloading" on the part of financiers of shares in breweries, distilleries, and large syndicates drawing their income from hotels and public-houses. Some of these concerns have gone to pieces, and the over-capitalization of most of them makes the shareholders dependent on a general increase in the drinking habits of the nation for their dividends. It is easy to see how the hundreds of thousands of sober, "decent" people who have been foolish enough, and wrong enough, to invest their money in these things are

PARALYZED IN THEIR SYMPATHIES.

They would like to help on the cause of temperance on the one side; on the other, they greatly fear that if the people who now drink were to give it up in large numbers, they themselves would suffer loss in a very tender place—their pocket. We are convinced by many converging lines of evidence that this widespread distribution of shares in the "trade" accounts for much of the waning enthusiasm of multitudes in temperance reform.

Naturally the same class of people vote for the party that is most likely to resist rather than to favour reform. Hence the present political situation.

And unquestionably there is a general and widespread, if not as yet very pronounced, increase in the consumption of intoxicants in the community generally. There are now no less than 156,102 public-houses in the United Kingdom, in the proportion of one to 301 inhabitants in England and Wales, one to 566 in Scotland, and one in 271 in Ireland. The rates of mortality from alcoholic excess have, it seems, increased 43 per cent. among males during the last twenty years; amongst females they have increased by no less than 104 per cent. This is an appalling fact, fully justifying the utmost that has ever been said in denunciation of the drink habit. One of the features of the present condition of things is that this increase of drinking does not show itself in overt drunkenness to anything like the extent common a generation or two ago; and for that very reason

THE EVIL, BEING SO INSIDIOUS, is exceedingly difficult to attack with the same convincing vehemence possible when public intoxication was more common.

So much on the negative side. There are, however, many encouraging signs. One of these is the fact that temperance reformers are beginning to see that any sudden and drastic measures of reform are "out of the range of practical politics," and that the attack on the stronghold of the drink interest must be made step by step and little by little; in the common phrase of the moment, the "frontal assault" must be varied by "flank movements." There is more to be done in this way than many at present imagine.

Another encouragement is to be found in the gradual awakening of public bodies to the magnitude of the evil, and in many places we find severe treatment meted out to the proprietors of music-hall and theatre licences and publicans who have

ABUSED THEIR PRIVILEGES.

The examples of Manchester and Liverpool in this direction are drawing the attention of the whole nation both as regards their boldness and their beneficent results. The time will come, we hope, when local and borough councils all over the country will be thoroughly awakened to the imperative necessity of controlling and purifying the drink traffic from some of its more blatant and obvious abuses.

Finally, if those who are at work on temperance lines will not grow weary in well-doing, they shall reap in due season. The present apathy cannot last much longer; the khaki craze will soon be a thing of the past, and "Army Reform" will presently be relegated into the competent hands of the new Commander-in-Chief and his advisers. In the near future, when these questions will be disposed of, that will force themselves to the front is this of temperance reform. As Lord Rosebery said the other day, it is among the things that "cannot wait."

Thus, both the difficulties and the encouragements of the times constitute an appeal to Christian people not to "faint or grow weary in their minds," but to do their utmost to move the lethargic, rouse the indifferent, and by wise and far-seeing methods prepare for the time when a great measure of reform will be possible and inevitable. It is the time for the consolidation of forces, the laying down of foundations, and the preparation for a great campaign into the heart of the enemy's country.

"Elisha, the Prophet of Vision."—We regret to be compelled to hold over notes of the second discourse on this subject, by Rev. F. S. Webster, in All Souls Church, Langham Place, W. The outline, which is singularly instructive, will appear next week.

The Vision and the Veil—2.*

(Concluded.)

By the late Rev. W. A. GRAY.

HAVING looked at the one side, the fading glory and the veiled speech, let us turn to the other, THE PERMANENT GLORY AND THE OPEN SPEECH. "Let who will," says St. Paul," bear about with them a vision that vanishes, and therefore speak vaguely; we with a vision that endures speak clearly, in ringing accents, in resolute words—not walking in craftiness, nor handling the Word of God deceitfully, but by manifestation of the truth commending ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God. Seeing we have such hope, we use great plainness of speech."

Brethren, have you this hope? Then, in proportion as you experience, and live up to it, you will be set free from hesitation, delivered from reserve, and rendered able to testify of it. "We cannot but speak the things we have seen and heard."

The fact is, there is not a single temptation to soften, shade, or withhold in a speech on the matters of religion, but here is a saving and encouraging influence. Once say, as Paul said, "The glory that beams upon me, the vision that attends me, the expectation that inspires me, is a sure and abiding one"; and you will be freed from all those that go far to restraining your plainness of speech. What are these?

For one thing, there is the fear of being falsified. Take the case of the Christian promises. Some may feel fettered in the proclamation of them on this account. So much is involved. It does mean a great thing to say, in spite of all in heart and intellect that dissents from it: "Believe, only believe, and you will be saved." "Look, only look, and your iniquities will be pardoned." "Submit, only submit, and your life will be purified." It does mean a great deal to say, "Pray, and you will be answered: the good you need will be given you; the guidance you seek will be granted." Where men crave satisfaction and comfort, it does mean a great deal to say these things. You shrink from the thought of disappointment; you recoil from the idea of deceit; the CHEATING OF THEM WITH A DREAM.

But in proportion as the truth is a real and living experience to yourself, it will not be. Why should you falter? Why hesitate? Why cover your face with a veil? The glory is not passing or transitory with you. It is as clear as God's Word, enduring as God's life; and the consciousness of this should deliver you from fear, so that, secure in a hope that maketh not ashamed, you may well use plainness of speech.

Or, again, there is the fear of being confuted. Here we pass from religious promises to religious doctrines. And, I ask, am I wrong in supposing there may be a timidity relating to these? You become silent or vague as regards your Christian belief before some people, because you are afraid they will overthrow you in argument. Their wits are too nimble; their tongues are too sharp. You think they will humble you in the estimation of others, and in the estimation of yourself, if you once give them the opportunity to begin. "Not," I reply, "if your hope be a real and experimental one." No argument can touch that. No one can any more than the scribes and the Pharisees could argue the healed man in the temple out of his. Once get your foot planted on the firm rock of a personal experience, and neither logic nor laughter will avail to beat you off. To their earthly philosophy, you can oppose your own spiritual sense; to their shallow, "We argue," your own deep, "I know."

And there are those who have reached this. They are not much troubled with assaults on the inspiration of the Bible; to each and to all they reply, "The Bible has enlightened and quickened me." They are not much perplexed with disproofs of the efficiency of prayer; they can look the objector in the face, and say, "I cried, and He answered me." No fear of refutation restrains them. Having a hope so sure, so certain, so abiding, they use great plainness of speech.

Again, take yet another kind of fear—unworthy apprehensions for the interests of religion itself. This, too, interferes with plainness of speech in regard to religious difficulties and discouragements. It seems the policy of some people to obscure and ignore them. Perplexities here and there in the Christian records, failures here and there in the Church's work, they are unwilling so much as to own them. And the men who do own them they pronounce at once to be disloyal, and seek to reduce them to a silence like their own. May not this be due, not to a jealousy for the truth, but rather (though such people know it not) to a secret distrust of it; to a want of confidence in the strength and permanence of the great Christian verities themselves, as if it were perilous to test them in the light of honest criticism and

CANDID, UNPREJUDICED THOUGHT?

But those who are most strongly rooted in the Christian faith have least reason to be timid. To be suspicious of facts is to be suspicious of truth, and to be suspicious of truth is to be suspicious of God, for God and truth are one. With such a hope as he has, the Christian should be above the temptation of ignoring them, but in regard to religious difficulties and discouragements, as well as religious doctrines and promises, use, when the time comes, great plainness of speech.

Such, then, is the principle brought before us—the principle of boldness and plainness of religious speech on the part of believing men and women. Never was there a time when the practice was more needful; and more likely to be effectual. Still, as of old, plain speech is the one thing that will tell. We make a vast mistake if we suppose that, to keep the world in sympathy and in touch with the Christian faith, we must swerve from the ancient and time-honoured plan of clear, positive, and even dogmatic statement. Christ, whose truth we publish, whose message we bear, was the sublimest dogmatist that ever lived. And if we are ever to catch the ears, and impress the hearts of our fellow-men, it is by doing as He did, and employing great plainness of speech.

PLAINNESS, NOT VAGUENESS.

We shall never commend Christianity, though sometimes we think that we do, by softening its sharp lines, by blurring its clear statements. Why, what the world is impatient with, is just the very vagueness we imagine pleases it. Men want the presentation of something definite. Life is definite; and they want something definite to help them to live—definite comfort, definite strength. Death is definite; and they want something definite to help them to die—definite knowledge, definite hope. To us they are looking, on us they depend, and from more than we think comes the cry, "Speak out!" Plainness as opposed to vagueness is a present-day duty.

And you, my reader, who are saying, "Alas! I cannot speak of Christianity to others as I once did, for the vision is fading from myself; like Moses, I wear a veil because the glory is gradually going from me," why not have the glory rekindled? It is not impossible. There have been those, not a few, from whom the vision has once departed, to visit and to beautify them again, with more than the old gift renewed, more than the old joy restored.

GO BACK WHERE THE GLOW IS.

Stay where the glow is. Live much with the men that have the glow. Live much with books that have the glow. Above all, live much in that Presence where the glow is most steady, most central, most bright. Then you, too, will glow. And when your face takes brightness, your lips will take fire; and you will speak with the boldness, the courage, the certainty, and the plainness, of one who knows both whom and what he believes, and cannot but publish the same.

Fret or Rest?

Psalm xxxvii. 1-7.

By Rev. J. GLYN DAVIES, Newport, Mon.

NOTE how the psalm opens—"Fret not thyself." Literally, heat not thyself. Cf. Judges ii. 14, "The anger of the Lord was hot"—the same word. Do not work thyself into a heat because of evildoers. "Neither be thou envious." This word comes from a root signifying "redness." It may be rendered, Be not flushed. Look at that child! So restless, so peevish, and oh, so hot! Its little body is like a kiln. The child, you say, is in a fever. Very soon the heated blood mounts up, and the face is in a deep flush. The fever and the flush; they are the words used in this verse. "Fret not thyself;" there is the fever, the heat of discontent in the heart. "Be not envious;" there is the flush, the outbreak of discontent in envious thoughts, and words, and deeds.

"It is no good trying," says the man. "Honesty does not pay. I have tried hard to conduct my business on strictly honest lines, and I am not prospering. There's So-and-So; he is not so particular, and he is getting on." And the man frets and fumes, and works himself into a high fever. He envies the workers of iniquity. To that man comes the message, Fret not.

Fretting, because of the success of evildoers! It is not worth one's while, for "they shall soon be cut down like the grass, and wither like the green herb." Look at that gay meadow, bright with daisies, with the myriad marigold! See how the tall grass—and such a crop!—waves up and down with the summer breeze. Everything betokens fertility. It is the full flourish of the field. You lean against the gate and rest your eyes upon the fair scene. It is delightful! But hark! Swish! swish! swish! The scythe is at work. At the other end of the field the mower has entered, and in a few hours all that proud grass will lie in rows of mown and fading green.

THE SCORCH OF THE SUMMER SUN

will pour upon it. The daisies will die; the greenness will fade; the freshness will be no more. To-morrow, the waggons will come, and all will be gone! "Evildoers shall be cut down like the grass." Worldly prosperity is so short-lived that no man need envy it. There is nothing worth getting into a heat about.

What then shall we do? Here comes a threefold message. It is worthy of note in these our feverish times.

I. Trust in the Lord.—Verses 3 and 4 are really one. They tell the tale of him who trusts. Trust. Cf. Judges xviii. 7, "They saw the people, how they dwelt careless." That is, they dwelt without care. It is the same word as is here rendered trust. Be without care—in the Lord. Cf. Prov. xxviii. 1, "The righteous are bold as a lion." That is, they are without fear. It is still the same word. Be without fear—in the Lord. Cf. Psa. xxvii. 3, "Though war rise against me, in this will I be confident." That is, without misgiving. Still the same word. Be without misgiving—in the Lord. It is a grand word! Trust—be care-less, be bold, be confident—in the Lord.

Look at the picture of him who trusts. (1) He does good. In the calm of his faith he has time and thought for goodness. He is not distracted by care, by fear, by misgiving. "Trusting Jesus, that is all."

(2) He dwells in the land. In his life and work there is a permanence, a perseverance, a continuity, upon which one can always rely. He does and he dwells.

(3) He shall be fed. Note the marginal reading of R.V., "feed on faithfulness." He is able to do and to dwell, because he feeds on the fidelity of the Lord. It is his manna, which he gathers daily. It is his food of strength. He lives on the Lord.

(4) He delights himself. This word means luxury. Cf. Isa. lviii. 13, "call the Sabbath a delight—i.e., a luxury. The believer finds more than food, more than strength, in the Lord. He finds his joy, his pleasure, his daily romance.

(5) He gets the desires of his heart. The previous points cover all one's life. What more can one desire? All is in the Lord. Fret, indeed! No, never! We shall trust.

II. Commit thy way unto the Lord.—Verses 5 and 6 are also one. They tell the tale of him who commits. Commit! Cf. Gen. xxix. 3, "they rolled the stone from the well's mouth." The word rendered roll in Genesis is rendered commit in Psalms. Roll thy way upon the Lord. Thy way, thy course of life, thy circumstances, thy duties, thy difficulties—cast them, turn them, roll them all upon Jesus. Thy way and thyself. He will carry both.

Look now at the picture of him who thus trusts and commits. The previous section was active. This section is passive. (1) "He shall bring to pass." Literally, "He shall do." Do what? The psalmist does not say. Designedly it is left blank. It is a blank cheque, which the believer can fill according to need. "Roll thy life upon the Lord, and He shall do . . ." Whatever the need may be, that will He do.

(2) "He shall bring forth thy righteousness as the light." Righteousness shall triumph in the end, Evildoing may thrive for a wee while; but its day is coming. Just now, perhaps, the believer is under a cloud; but the dawn will break. "Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun." Fret, indeed! Why should we? The future is ours. We look at things eternal.

III. Rest in the Lord.—Literally, be silent before the Lord. This is the climax. An absolute surrender of all to Him who is our Lord. Deo volente—our watchword ever. "We wait patiently for Him." He goes first, and we follow. If He goes not, we go not. Whatever be the proposal, the enterprise, the circumstance, we wait for Him. Speech is his; silence is ours. This is worlds apart from fretting. From fretting to resting, from garrulous discontent to silent patience, from fever to health—such is the progress of faith in the Lord.

Seen and Unseen.

The things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal (2 Cor. iv. 18).

Not for ever gazing
At the things we see,
Thinking, toiling for them,
Hour by hour, should we.
There are things eternal,
Lying far beyond;
Urging us to seek them,
May our souls respond.

Calling, ever calling,
Is the "still small voice;"
In our saddest moments,
Bidding us rejoice.
In our hours of danger,
Bidding us be strong;
In our lonely midnights,
Cheering us along.

Oft we fail to hear it,
Or we do not heed;
Temporal things still pressing
Seem our care to need.
Anxiously we listen
To the calls around;
So we lose the sweetness
Of diviner sound.

All we see around us
Soon must pass away;
While the things eternal
Will for ever stay.
Should not this remind us,
Not to grieve too sore
Over things, which passing,
Soon will be no more?

Grocers' Licences.—The law in regard to grocers' licences urgently calls for amendment. At the Rowley Regis Licensing Sessions recently, the Bench granted a number of grocers' licences, which they stated were unnecessary, "the facilities for getting drunk" in the districts concerned being already more than sufficient, and they stated that they had no discretionary powers in the matter, and that the Legislature was to blame in allowing such an anomaly to exist.

"The Christian" Almanack, 1901.

As a Supplement to this week's issue, and without extra charge, we present our readers with a copy of The Christian Almanack for 1901. Of the general features, it may suffice to say that the passages of Scripture for the days of the year have been selected in a prayerful spirit, with the object of bringing heavenly truths and principles, Divine counsels and promises, before those who would seek a word from God at the morning watch, or in moments of evening meditation. The illustrations form the special feature, and though they seem to "speak for themselves," they demand a word of explanation and afford opportunity for profitable remark.

It is a platitude to say that the portraits bring before us men who made a deep impression upon the religious life of their time. The surrounding engravings give us some idea of various directions in which Mr. Moody's influence was very powerfully exerted. In evangelization he was under bondage to no man, and free to labour in any land: "the world was his parish." In educational work, however, other conditions were essential, and Northfield and Mount Hermon remain as the home-centres of the beneficent institutions which the evangelist founded in the interest of the young manhood and womanhood of America and the world.

Northfield Seminary for young women was opened in 1879. It aims at developing a symmetrical womanhood, combining education with physical exercise. Young women in the humbler walks of life are, through its agency, enabled to secure a Christian education such as would otherwise be beyond their reach. Wanamaker Lake, a picturesque sheet of water, is the scene of skating in the winter, and boating parties in the summer, the surrounding country of hill and dale affording to the students delightful range for various forms of recreation.

The Auditorium, one of the Northfield buildings, was erected in 1894. There, in the summer, conferences are held, and about three thousand people tax its capacity, by crowding the platform, stairways, and aisles, as well as the ordinary seating accommodation. Crossley Hall is one of the buildings at Mount Hermon, the school for young men, conducted on similar principles to the Northfield Seminary. Here young men are exercised in practical self-reliance, as well as equipped with book learning.

The picture of Mr. Moody's residence at Northfield calls to mind a tender purpose of his heart, and one which he was graciously permitted to realize. Returned from his work in Great Britain in 1873-5, the evangelist thought of his children then growing up around him, and was not long in determining upon measures for their mental and spiritual development. As the Life tells us, he bought, at a moderate price, "a barren little tract of twelve acres near his mother's place . . . his purpose being to hold the land for his mother, and to spend a few summers there for the sake of his children." That excellent purpose was fruitful beyond calculation, for the place of summer retreat and study became at length the centre of his most engrossing labours. Gradually his interests in Northfield increased, until the home he planned for rest and quiet became the scene of his greatest activities and most lasting works.

It is right to add that the illustrations of the Almanack are taken from "The Life of Dwight L. Moody, by his son, W. R. Moody" (10s. 6d. Morgan & Scott), being selected from the hundred and more pictures and portraits that embellish that handsome volume.

Bible Flower Mission.—Mrs. W. W. Turton, 110, Cannon Street, E.C., writes: "As other flowers become more scarce, chrysanthemums are invaluable, and we trust that a good supply of these will find its way to the Mission. Text holders have sadly fallen off in number during the last few months—some of our most reliable writers having either passed away or been obliged to give up owing to infirmities. Wool is also much wanted for tying lavender bags, as well as for bouquets. Ornamental cards are always welcome.

The Congregational Union.

BY A MINISTER.

Evidences were abundant at the meetings last week at Newcastle-on-Tyne, that the charm and power of preaching have not vanished away. Half-an-hour before the time announced for the service on Monday night, the Brunswick Wesleyan Chapel had an enormous congregation, and at the time every available inch of space was filled with persons to hear Rev. J. H. Jowett, of Birmingham, who conducted the service in a quiet and devout way felt by every one. His text was "Rejoicing in hope," and his sermon on "The sunny optimism of Paul." He gathered his three chief points from a careful analysis of the Pauline Epistles. 1st. Paul's optimism was drawn from the redemptive work of our Saviour which has come from the fore-ordaining purpose of God. The brightness of the future shines forth from the eternal ages. 2nd. This optimism was supported by the assurance that everything was working for the spread of the Gospel. and for his own spiritual advantage. Faith works, suffering works, hindrances work. He was supported on every side. 3rd. Paul was sustained by the sense of the reality of future glory. His mind had comfort and strength in anticipating his entrance into the eternal glory. The preacher believed that we had dropped heaven out of our thought, much to the impoverishment of our life and weakening of our strength. If we are to be bright and radiant, abounding in hope, we must bring heaven down to earth. There was deep and evident sympathy with this view of our loss and of our obvious duty, and the whole service. which was quietly reverent throughout, was an excellent preparation for the engagements of the week.

THE SUBJECT OF TEMPERANCE

has an increasingly important place in the Union's meetings, and was vigorously advocated both at a meeting of the Congregational Total Abstinence Association and at a session of the Union. The resolution proposed by Rev. Alfred Rowland, and seconded by Rev. Wm. Pierce, was not strong enough for some. It was: "That the time has now come when all Christians should unite in order to promote any practical measures for the restriction of the liquor traffic." The purpose of the resolution to unite Christians against this overwhelming evil is good; but it means that churches will first of all have to be united in their own membership, no member being either a seller or a consumer of drink. This point, which is vital to the whole movement, was not touched upon, and the discussion went off into remoter and more general themes. However, the resolution is on record.

THE CHAIRMAN'S ADDRESS, which was excellent in tone, lucid in style, and firm in its grasp of the great principles which distinguished Independency in its most robust period, was a rapid survey of the public questions of the times as they influence Free Church life. He deplored the too many signs of decadence. He fearlessly avowed his opposition to the war, and, unless we are mistaken, there were numerous and strong indications that, unless the Government settles South Africa on a just basis to all parties concerned, they may count on vigorous criticism and stout opposition. One point touched upon by Mr. J. Carvell Williams will require more attention than it has received; he sorrowfully admitted that the meetings of the Union are "more distinguished for feats of oratory and pleasurable excitement than for serious and effective dealing with the necessities and the difficulties of these critical times." This semi-holiday aspect of the meetings—they mean very hard work for not a few—will some day disappear before a more earnest spirit breathed on the whole assembly. Touching the disestablishment of the English Church, a question which Mr. Williams has made peculiarly his own, and speaking in view of the coming century, he implored his younger brethren to "determine that, so far as in them lies, the new century shall, at a comparatively early period, witness the end, and the successful end, of a struggle which has in view, not the achievement of a political and sectarian triumph, but the emancipation and purification of a great Church, and the removal of a perennial source of disunion and of strife."

"The Problem of Congregational Churches in Large Towns" was a theme that absorbed the attention of a crowded audience, and called forth the expression of very varied views. Perhaps the most fruitful words fell from Rev. T. Hooper, who said that during the election he had addressed thousands of men at open-air meetings, and when the election was over he remembered, with much self-reproach, that he had never gone into those same streets to preach Christ. It will be found in the long-run that this preaching of Christ to the sinful and perishing will solve a great many difficulties. The Assembly passed a resolution appointing a committee "to consider the whole problem of the Congregational Churches in large towns, with power to take such immediate steps as are considered desirable and found to be practicable."

SOCIAL SETTLEMENTS,

as a branch of this great city problem, had a separate meeting which was favoured with the presence of Mr. Moody's son, to whom a most cordial welcome was given. Mrs. G. E. Morgan, who labours in connection with the Browning Hall Settlement, Walworth, described the needs and misery and temptations of Walworth, and pleaded for the poor of whom Christ said, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these, ye did it unto Me." Mr. Crighton spoke of the Canning Town Settlement and its need of support by the Union and individual Churches.

CHINA

was made the subject of the public meeting of the L.M.S., and was spoken about by Mrs. Bryson, of Tientsin; Rev. W. Hopkyn Rees, of Chi-Chou; Rev. James Sadler, of Amoy; and Rev. Jonathan Lees, of Tientsin; also by Revs. Wardlaw Thompson and Hardy Harwood. The speaking testified to the fidelity of the Chinese Christians, and to the wisdom with which the missionaries of the L.M.S. had behaved themselves. There was general sympathy with the view that the Powers ought to recognise the Chinese Emperor as the lawful ruler of the empire, and should discountenance any suggestion of partitioning the country. There was a strong feeling expressed in favour of continuing and extending mission work as soon as ever circumstances would permit. Some difference of opinion exists as to whether missionaries should stand upon treaty rights which are extremely hateful to the natives. Dr. Mackennal, while not able to ask missionaries to endure martyrdom, thinks that it might not be their duty always to appeal to their undoubted civil rights, and thereby perhaps prejudice the larger law of Jesus Christ. He believes that following the example of the Saviour is more than giving money or sympathy or prayer.

THE COLONIES

had the advantage of a sermon and a public meeting. The sermon was preached by Dr. Alexander Whyte, of Edinburgh, from our Lord's question: "When the Son of Man cometh, shall He find faith on the earth?" It was searching and powerful; some, perhaps many, thought that he taught the doctrine of a personal coming, but, on the other hand, that impression might easily be taken only from the urgency with which he spoke.

There were many services in adjacent towns and villages, and sectional meetings of almost every kind. Still, the remark was made, as it so often is, that there was need of a more practical kind of assembly; e.g., it is deeply to be regretted that a paper on "Converting Power in the Pulpit and the Church" was passed over without a word of remark, there being no time.

A Successful Life.

By Dr. MACLAREN.

As a finale to the series of gatherings which have marked the opening of the new Metropolitan Tabernacle, an open communion service was held on Thursday evening. The opportunity of hearing Dr. Alexander Maclaren was not to be neglected, for Manchester's noted preacher only too seldom visits the Metropolis. No one was, therefore, surprised to find an audience that filled the spacious building in every part. Dr. Maclaren conducted the whole of the service, which was notable for its deep and impressive solemnity.

The sermon was a telling and powerful definition and exposition of what constitutes

A SUCCESSFUL LIFE.

Taking as his text, "Be of good cheer; I have overcome the world" (John xvi. 33), the Doctor asked if it were victory to have failed in the effort to win men to goodness, to have spoken of gentleness which next to nobody cared to hear; if to give counsels which no man regarded, to have been misunderstood, rejected, hated, to have lived a life of poverty and loneliness, and to die in the first flush of early manhood, unlamented save by a handful of apostles and a few brave women—if that was victory, what would be defeat? Yet this calm utterance of triumph of our Lord is the summing-up of his whole life. Looking back, He sees it as one continuous victory; looking forward, He sees the cross, as already overcome, though yet to be endured, and in that

APPARENTLY CRUSHING DEFEAT

He recognised his crowning victory. If Jesus Christ was right, then most men are wrong. If his was a type of the victorious life, many of us need to revise our notions and revolutionize our practices.

This declaration of Christ suggests three questions:—What is a victorious life? Was there ever such a life? If there was, what does it matter to me? In answering the first question, the speaker defined the expression, "the world," as having two meanings—the whole mass of visible and sensible things, and what is spoken of as society, the aggregate of Godless men. This leads to the question, "What is it here for?" First, for the same purpose as the bars and poles in a gymnasium, to make muscle, to build character; and for the same purpose as a window in a house, through which we may look and see the light of the sun.

The world conquers us when we allow it to hinder us from doing our duty and living God-pleasing lives; when it fills our affections and constitutes our aim.

WE CONQUER THE WORLD

when nothing in it will turn our feet from the straight path; when all that is in it exercises our muscles, builds our character, and when, like Jacob's ladder, we climb by its gradual rounds, reaching at last the summit, and gazing into the face of the One above it, the face of our God. At no time has it been more essential to preach what is the true type of a successful life, and what is meant by a life that is a failure. There is many a rich man whom the hosannas of the Stock Exchange and Cornhill declare to be wonderfully successful, who from the only true point of view is a failure. Has he conquered the world, or has the world conquered him? Noble visions have passed away, and are smiled at now, and God and his angels are a great deal further off from the successful man than from the striving youth. If we will not let the world—either the mass of material things or the aggregate of society—or from seeing God and doing his will, then, however sad and solitary our life may otherwise be, we have conquered. All else is defeat.

HINDER US FROM HOLY LIVING,

Dealing with the second question, "Was there ever such a life?" Dr. Maclaren spoke of the life of Christ as the one of conflict and triumph. Never did one word pass from his lips to suggest even a momentary reverse in the conflict. His life was one continual straight line, ever directed to the cross, and seen through the gloom of the cross was the throne that was beyond. When Christ said, "I have overcome," no one dared to say it was presumption, except a few sceptics who wished to make a reputation by saying what nobody else had said. There was still the cross to be endured, although He had accepted it. We should learn the same lesson. We should accept and conquer our crosses, for the accepted sorrow is a pointless arrow. He who does not allow the world to detract one hairbreadth from the path of duty, has overcome.

The third question suggested by the text is, "If such a life has been lived,

WHAT DOES IT MATTER TO ME?"

In answer to this query, the Doctor emphasized the fact that Christ should be even more to us than an example and pattern, as the Power which enables us to overcome, making us lords of ourselves, of time, and of the world. "You will have to fight—thank God for it; you will be beaten as sure as you live, if you try to master the world without Jesus." If we open our hearts and lives to the influence of his triumphant Spirit, then He will give us a share in this conflict, in his conquest, and in his royal abode, according to his own wonderful promise, "He that overcometh, I will give to him to sit down with Me in my throne, as I also overcame, and sat down with my Father in his throne."

*Mr. Meyer's New Book.

THE reader of Mr. Meyer's latest book will be struck most of all by two things—the rich imagination which gives colour to the theme, and serves, in so many ways, to gather the scattered data into artistic completeness; and the sympathetic touch which imparts glow and warmth to the whole narrative.

Another thing prominent is the discursive vein which adds not only to the embellishment of the work, but also furnishes so much that is as fuel to the fire of devotion, as well as of general spiritual interest. Every truly great life is of value, not more as a record than as opening avenues of suggestion to be noted and described; and it is the ability to perceive these that marks out, perhaps more than anything else, the true biographer from the mere transcriber. Mr. Meyer has this faculty in an eminent degree.

Considering the high standard already achieved, we hesitate to say that the author's study of "John the Baptist" is the ablest production of his pen; nevertheless, we must confess to that feeling. The literary charm is certainly no less than before, and the profusion of metaphor is as ample as ever; but it would seem that the theme itself has exercised a peculiar spell on the writer, the result being that the fascination in the subject, acknowledged in the preface, is reflected in the pages that follow.

Special care is taken in the opening chapters to supply a setting to the character that is appropriate to its heroic stamp, and to bring into vividness the whole circumstances of the times of the Forerunner, both domestic and national. The result is a live narrative—a narrative that has atmosphere, scenery, movement, and, for lack of a better word, verisimilitude. It would take us beyond our limits to follow the treatment in detail. The study is a noble one, and the execution betrays extreme pains, poetic feeling, and just analysis—a worthy memento of a character thrilling in its grandeur as it is saintly in spirit and unselfish in soul. How much needed to-day is that very type, with its backbone of principle, unflinching fidelity, and immolation of self!

This biography is a case of "beaten oil" for the sanctuary, and, as what comes from the heart is likely to reach the heart, we are confident that Christian readers generally will find herein an unction which will both cheer and illuminate.

* John the Baptist. By F. B. Meyer, B.A. (2s. 6d. and 3s. 6d. Morgan & Scott.)

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, October 28. Isaiah lvi.

THE Spirit of Inspiration was constantly anticipating the time, in these old prophecies, when men should come from the east and west, and sit down in the kingdom of God, and when the barriers of rite and form should no longer debar the pious soul from that access to God, which was the portion of the Hebrew race. This chapter illustrates this. Nothing is said of the burdens which rabbis and priests imposed on proselytes from among the Gentiles. It is enough, apparently, that they should keep the Sabbath from profaning it, and should keep their hands from doing evil.

What an ideal is presented here of character and conduct! To keep God's Sabbath, in the perpetual stillness and rest of the heart! To choose always those things which will please Him! To hold fast by his covenant! To join ourselves to the Lord, as by one Spirit, to minister to Him, to love his Name, to be his servants! What more could we desire in the way of characterizing the ideal soul? These are traits which we cannot attain unto by the force of our own resolution, but we can surely tell God that we will and desire them, leaving it to Him to effect our ideal through the indwelling and operation of the Divine Spirit.

On God's side, the response to such a life is ready and ample. He will bring us to his holy mountain: "Ye are come unto Mount Zion, and unto the city of the living God." He will make us joyful in his house of prayer: "Thou hast put gladness in my heart." He will accept our burnt offerings and our sacrifices: "Let us offer up a sacrifice of praise to God continually." Oh, what blessedness lies in the thought that He will gather, not only the outcasts of Israel, but ourselves also! Contrast our Good Shepherd with the false ones in vv. 9-12!

MONDAY, October 29. Isaiah lvii.

What a terrible picture is drawn here of the idolatries and impurities to which the chosen people had fallen! The photographs of the scenes under the oaks, and of certain others in the valleys, where the body was debased on the one hand, and children slain on the other, are too terrible. It seems impossible that such things could have happened in Israel. But with the chosen people, idolatry ran its usual course, and as they exchanged the glory of the incorruptible God for the likeness of an image of corruptible man, of birds, and fourfooted beasts, and creeping things, God also gave them up to vile passions. They refused to have God in their knowledge, and God gave them up to a reprobate mind (Rom. i. 23-28).

But amongst the degenerate nation, there were some elect souls; and God is always careful against rooting up the tares, lest one stalk of wheat should perish. Amid the destruction that must visit the guilty land, those that put their trust im Him should not be overlooked (13, 14).

With what comfort the chapter closes! We may have been covetous and froward, and have incurred wrath and chastisement; but there is a blessed surprise in store. God will not always chide. Yield yourself to God, and let his healing hand pass over the gaping wounds of your soul.

TUESDAY, October 30. Isaiah lviii.

It is a terrible matter when religion is divorced from morality; when outwardly men fast and practise religious observances, but inwardly they find their own pleasure, and are deficient in thoughtful love for others. Let us carefully examine ourselves. Are we professing to be what we are not? Do we read the Scripture and attend the preaching of the Word, with no thought of applying the truth definitely to our own souls? Nothing so surely or swiftly injures the inward temper as that.

There are three beautiful paragraphs here, in each of which the attitude and behaviour of the holy soul is described, together with the blessing that shall inevitably succeed.

6-9 (Here I am). That one's life may be light, that one's influence may always be healing and healthgiving, that God's righteousness should precede and his glory follow, that God should be at hand to answer prayer—these are blessings so rare, that we may well strive to fulfil the conditions assigned.

9 (If thou . . .)—12. To be continually guided in small things as in great, to be satisfied and made strong, to be like a garden of flowers amid a wilderness, and to be a water spring to banish drought from others, to be the means of repairing the wastes in God's church—again these are blessings worth any sacrifice and act of obedience.

13—14. Here again is blessing. But the conditions are as blessed in the performance as the results. Our Sabbath-keeping is inward, and of the heart. We have by faith entered on that Sabbatism which remains unexhausted for the people of God. By faith, we have entered the Land of Promise. Only we must watch and pray against all that might infringe on the inward peace, and disturb it—all worry, all care, all sin. Let the peace of God rule in the heart, and let the Spirit of God produce the inward temper, which naturally fulfils these conditions of a holy and consecrated character.

WEDNESDAY, October 31. Isaiah lix.

Why is it that your life is so hapless and sad? It is not that God has some special animosity against you. He is neither capricious nor arbitrary; but because your iniquities have separated between Him and you. Of course there are other reasons, for, as in the case of the permitted death of Lazarus it was for the glory of God, so is it sometimes still. We are called to pass through special trials, that men may learn from us of the infinite grace of God. But before we take this comfort to our heart, we should very carefully examine ourselves in his presence, taking this category of sins as our guide, to see if there be any wicked way in us. Ponder the repeated laments of 11-15.

The prophet breaks into a magnificent description of God. He is described as looking round to see if there were no other source of help, and there being none, He girds Himself for the fray. He dons breast-plate and helmet, clothing and cloak, and comes to the rescue of his people; giving them deliverance by a Redeemer. This can be none other than the Lord Jesus Himself, who came to men, with a heart full of the most tender pity and yearning desire, and who comes still to those who desire above all things to turn from their transgressions. Hast thou been trodden under the heel of sin? Be of good cheer; Christ is a mighty warrior. On his armour, the dint of thine enemies' blows must fall in vain, and thou shalt shelter behind Him.

THURSDAY, November 1. Isaiah lx.

"Arise, shine!" The summons is addressed to the Holy City. The seer beholds the morning as its first flush appears in the Eastern sky, and bids Jerusalem arise to catch the earliest beams, that it may shine in transcendent brilliance and beauty, whilst darkness covers the earth and gross darkness the peoples. Oh, that the Church of God in these, the last days of this age, might hear that summons! She might be the suffering, the waiting, even the martyr church, but if only she were the holy church, what greater influence might be hers!

The prophet depicts the effect of the illumination of the Holy City. Nations come to her light, and kings to the brightness of her rising. It is not what we say, but what we are, that powerfully attracts men to God. It is a beautiful picture. From the far East come the camels laden with precious treasures; from the West, the ships laden with merchandize. The wastes of many years are regained by armies of strangers, whilst kings count it an honour to minister to the City of God. The night of sorrow is followed by exceeding joy. Anxiety and depression are dissipated by a flowing tide of prosperity. Violence and destruction are replaced by praise and salvation. These glowing words have yet to be literally realized in Jerusalem that now is; but they should be first spiritually realized in the Church.

Those closing words are true of such as have entered the blessed life. Their experience is always growing richer and deeper—for brass, gold; for iron, silver. But better than all, God is their everlasting Light.

FRIDAY, November 2. Isaiah lxi.

These opening words, quoted by our Lord at Nazareth, as applicable to Himself, have also a deep reference to ourselves. Too often we have essayed to do this blessed work of preaching the Gospel, and ministering to the sorrows of men, apart from the anointing of the Holy Spirit, which is so absolutely essential. If He waited for his anointing at the waters of baptism, before entering on his life work, much more should we.

Of course, these chapters primarily refer to the blessed condition of prosperity which is in reserve for Israel, waiting their restoration to the land of their fathers. But since we, though Gentiles after the flesh, are spiritually the seed of Abraham, the blessing of Abraham comes on the Gentiles also, as we receive the promise of the Spirit by faith. In other words, as we receive the Pentecostal gift, we enter on the spiritual counterpart of all these blessings, which are promised to the Jews. Let us believe that the Lord will perform this his word unto us.

The holy soul may appropriate the closing paragraph with thankful joy, as standing before God arrayed in the perfect righteousness of Jesus. The hands that were nailed to the Cross wove those garments of salvation; his perfect obedience unto death achieved that righteousness. We stand before God in the perfect beauty of Him whom He accounts as his Beloved. So much for our justification; then, for sanctification, the seeds of grace are sown in our hearts by the Holy Spirit, and are constantly flowering and fruiting in righteousness and praise. There is the work of Christ on us for our standing, and his work in us for our experience and walk. Ask the Lord God to cause all the fruit of the Holy Life to cover the dark soil of your soul.

SATURDAY, November 3. Isaiah lxii.

"He ever liveth to intercede"—such is the announcement of the Epistle to the Hebrews. He pleads for those who crucify Him by daily rejection and rebellion; for the Simon Peters who are passing through fiery trials; for the heathen, that the Father would give them to Him for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession. But, chiefly, He pleads for Israel—"For Zion's sake He does not hold his peace, and for Jerusalem's sake He does not rest, till . . ." Let us ask Him to admit us into blessed participation with Him in all this. The life of prayer is the highest life of all; and we may well ask the blessed Spirit to beget in us more intercessory prayer, that so we may live in closer touch with our interceding High Priest.

Notice the beautiful repetition of Christ's petitions in the life of his saints—or at least in his ideal for them. He says in the opening verse, "I will not hold my peace. . . . I will not rest." And in verses 6 and 7, we are reminded that God's watchmen do not hold their peace; and that the Lord's remembrancers take no rest, and give Him no rest, holding on with untiring patience, till he answers their prayers. It may be that you, my friend, are shut up in a sick chamber, or in lonely solitude, and have often sorrowed because life seemed to have so few opportunities of usefulness. But all this has been permitted, that you might give yourself to prayer. If all the windows are shuttered towards earth, you have one window left which looks towards the unseen and eternal.

The prayer is hardly offered before signs of the answer are announced. The highway is prepared for the advent of the people, but above all for that of the Deliverer. He comes, He comes! Make ready, O earth, to hail thy Lord! His reward is with Him and his recompense before Him? Then we shall be caught up to meet Him, and be for ever with the Lord.

Other Lands.

Evangelical Alliance Work on the Continent.

By JOHN GRITTON, D.D., Member of Council.

THE cultivation and exhibition of Christian love are sufficient justification of the existence and continuance of the Evangelical Alliance, and nothing is higher or more beautiful than Love, since "God is love." Many minds, however, are rather practical than given to sentiment, They are always asking "What is the Alliance doing?" Has it done anything in the past?. Is it still doing something? Who is practically the better for it? Has it wrought any deliverance in the earth? Has it broken chains, opened prison doors, rescued the persecuted? Has it clothed the naked and fed the hungry? Has it brought help to the helpless, or hope to the despairing? Itself rejoicing in Love, has it loved others into loving, and comforted the sorrowful among the sons of God?

I regard these questions as relevant and legitimate. The reply is distinct and full, far more full than can be adduced in this short paper. It is found in the annals of the Alliance, and in my own memory of events during my more than twenty years on the Council.

Dr. Rigg, ex-president of the Wesleyan Conference, testifies: "The Alliance has been modest. It has not been accustomed to disport itself in public places, but its opinion has been felt far and wide wherever religious liberty has been threatened."

Cavaliere Pons, Moderator lately of the Waldensian Synod, says: "We are the poor and abandoned ones for whom the Alliance has pleaded. I hope, now that my countrymen in Italy are free, we can join with you to write and intercede in favour of the persecuted in Russia and the Turkish Empire."

Brother Prokanoff, a Russian Stundist, says: "I am very glad to be able to express, in the name of all Russian Stundists, their hearty thanks for your continued efforts on their behalf."

These efforts have been many more, more costly, and more fruitful than can, for various reasons, be recounted. As to Armenia and its persecuted people, let Pastor K. Behesnilian speak: "When I was sent to evangelize my native country, I was imprisoned for two months, but through the intervention of the British Consul I was liberated. I am very thankful also to your Foreign Office. They have taken great interest in my welfare. The Evangelical Alliance has always TAKEN UP THE CAUSE OF THE OPPRESSED."

Let me say that in this case, as in so many others, it was the Alliance which moved both Consul and Foreign Office.

From Greece comes this testimony of Dr. Kalopothakes, of Athens: "The beneficent influence of the Evangelical Alliance extends wherever either nations, or churches, or individuals need the sympathy and help which come from the recognition of the blessed fellowship of believers, and wherever in less favoured lands people are suffering for the free exercise of conscience."

Pastor Correvon, of Frankfort, uses the following words in testimony: "If the Evangelical Alliance should do no more, this (the Week of Prayer), would be enough to assure it our eternal thankfulness."

Pastor Jellinghaus, of Potsdam, rejoices in declaring that at the Berlin Conference of 1857, "The leading principles of the Evangelical Alliance were introduced into Germany, and were accepted by men of high standing in the world of religion, science, and politics."

As to Italy, we have quoted Moderator Pons. Let us adduce also the words of Rev. Edward Clarke, of the Spezia Mission—"In my work in Italy, I have ever prized the sympathy and co-operation of the Evangelical Alliance.'

Another very capable witness is Pastor B. La Trobe, of Herrnhut, who, speaking of the work of the Moravian Church among the Diaspora of Europe, says: "A work like this meets with opposition, though, and this largely, if indirectly, thanks to the Evangelical Alliance, this is less so at the present than in the past."

No man in Europe is more worth listening to on our question than Edouard Naville, of Geneva. "Religious Liberty," he writes, "is a subject which, from the very first day, has occupied the Evangelical Alliance. We recollect the which have been made to promote this great principle. Let me remind you that a short time after the Conference at Geneva in 1861, the doors of Spanish prisons were opened to Matamoros and his friends, and we were able to welcome them in our midst."

Dr. C. A. Stoddard, of New York, speaking of Turkey in 1896, and of the persecuted missionaries and converts there, states: "They have presented their appeal to this great and venerable body, this Evangelical Alliance of Christians of all nationalities—an alliance which for the past fifty years has made its influence felt on behalf of religious liberty in every quarter of the globe—whose united prayers arise to the God of nations from universal Christendom at the beginning of each revolving year; whose efforts have been recognised by all Christian governments and religious organisations, and have been sanctioned again and again by the Divine blessing."

I now epitomize, in a few lines, magnificent special results which have followed the Nine Ecumenical Conferences of the Alliance. At the first Constituent Conference in 1846, Russia and Armenia came to the front, and measures followed for relief. The London Conference in 1851 was marked by great evangelistic activity in the metropolis, specially among the multitude of visitors to the Great Exhibition. The Paris Conference of 1855 powerfully influenced Louis Napoleon in the direction of securing religious liberty for his Protestant subjects. The Berlin Conference of 1857 was specially fruitful as to Sunday-school work in Germany. The Geneva Conference of 1861 gave birth to the movement that, followed up at Amsterdam in 1867—under the guidance of Alexandre Lombard, the banker—led to the formation of the International Federation of Lord's Day Societies. The Conference at Amsterdam in 1867 led to the revival of open-air preaching, and to in Court circles. At Basel, in 1879, a great impetus was given to the Week of Prayer, and open-air preaching was revived after decades of cessation. For that effort, so successful ultimately, I and two other brethren were arrested. Of the Copenhagen Conference in 1884, which, like Berlin, enjoyed the full light of royal countenance and help, a prominent Norwegian pastor wrote in 1896: "The blessing of this Conference will never be forgotten in the Lutheran Church." In this Conference the amazing organizing power of our late secretary, Mr. Arnold, reached its culminating point. The Florence Conference greatly advanced Italian evangelization, and secured for non-Roman Christians a status and dignity before undreamed of.

Time fails to elaborate. For fifty-four years our blessed Alliance has wrought good of many kinds in many lands. Italy, Portugal, Spain, Russia, Finland, Austria, Turkey, Armenia, Germany, Saxony, Egypt, Persia, Peru, Basutoland, have all called forth sympathy, prayer, and help. In each something has been done to make the lot of Christians less sorrowful and their burdens less heavy.

Our friends who demand practical results may rest assured that the great principle of brotherly love has brought forth worthy fruits of many kinds. Let us then go on our way, humbled, indeed, for imperfect service and inadequate results, but persevering in our noble work hopefully, prayerfully, and with patient love, until He come who is our Saviour, our Leader, and our exceeding great reward.

Persecution in Brittany.

THE Jesuits in France (who are the enemies of the French Government as they are of England) have for some time been plotting to destroy the work of Pasteur Lecoat in Brittany. Not content with slanderous reports in the Press, stating that Pasteur Lecoat is in the pay of the English Government, and is nothing better than an English spy, they have recently published an abominable caricature in the Paris daily paper, Le Pays, in which M. Lecoat is depicted as teaching some Breton boys to sing "God Save the Queen!"

The latest plot succeeded in almost making of Lecoat a second Dreyfus. A lady in Jersey, a friend of the Mission, sent the pasteur a present of some pigeons. There were thirteen when they left Jersey, fourteen when they arrived at St. Malo, and sixteen when they reached Pasteur Lecoat's house at Tremel—one of them being a carrier pigeon. Soon after the arrival of the pigeons, gendarmes appeared from Plestin, and a police officer with a warrant. The charge brought was that Lecoat was in secret correspondence with the British Government. The carrier pigeon was the evidence that could not be denied, and the punishment for having in his possession a carrier pigeon, without having notified the fact, is a year's imprisonment. Had the Jesuits been able to prove the least culpability of the charge they brought against him, the pasteur must have been sentenced to imprisonment for life.

The pasteur's influence in the country has great weight, and through, humanly speaking, the "special pleading" of a great friend of his at the preliminary trial, the case has ended favourably by an officer having been sent from St. Brieuc to kill fifteen of the pigeons, and to take the "carrier" to the military school at Brest. The enemy seems determined to stop the work in some way, and one way is to worry him out of his life if possible.

Meanwhile the work goes on with increased blessing. The industrial part promises to be a great success. Last year some property adjoining the Mission had to be purchased to keep the enemy off. It includes the Flax Mill, which it is proposed to work so as to be a financial help to the Gospel effort. Many are praying earnestly for the preservation of Pasteur Lecoat and his workers in the Breton Evangelical Mission; and efforts are being put forth to complete the purchase of the Flax Mill, and thus to develop the industrial side of the Mission.

Further information regarding the work may be had from the office of the Breton Evangelical Mission, 25, New Oxford Street, W.C.

Reform in Spain and Portugal.

REV. R. O. THOMPSON, M.A., rector of Ballintemple, co. Tipperary, accompanied by the secretary of the Spanish and Portuguese Church Aid Society, has just returned from a visit to the reformers who have grown in grace and in enthusiastic perseverance in well-doing during recent years. In Portugal public opinion permits the free exercise of liberty of conscience in the face of the prohibition of the Penal Code, and the full churches and schools testify to the vigorous life of the Bible-reading Christians.

In Spain a steady persecution is maintained against the Reformers, and the highest ecclesiastics personally take part in the campaign against the "tares of heresy." One member of the Salamanca congregation has been eight times illegally imprisoned for attempting to sell Bibles, and bogus charges are now being laid against him by a Romish priest. In the face of this spirit of intolerance, much courage and devotion are needed, and God has enabled the workers to rely on Him for strength and blessing.

Help, which is urgently needed to avoid retrenchment, will be gratefully received by Rev. H. E. Noyes, D.D., Hon. Finance Sec., or Rev. Thos. J. Pulvertaft, Secretary of the Society, Church House, Westminster, S.W.

North Africa Mission.

THE annual farewell meetings of missionaries in connection with the North Africa Mission took place on Tuesday of last week at Devonshire House, E.C.

In the afternoon Rev. James Stephens gave an address full of spiritual help and encouragement. In the evening Colonel Morton presided. In the course of a breezy and unconventional address, he gave some Indian reminiscences bearing upon the subject of Mohammedanism, and instanced some remarkable cases of CONVERSIONS TO CHRISTIANITY.

Speaking humanly the attack upon the false religion held by so many millions of people in North Africa is a forlorn hope, but, as Rev. Mark Guy Pearse has said, "No man can find out the resources of God until he tries to do the seemingly impossible."

Mr. Edward H. Glenny followed with a brief review of the present position. He referred to the interest and sympathy in the Mission expressed in communications received from various parts of the world, and went on to describe the gradual progress the work has made in spite of intense opposition. The Moslems are entrenched against the Gospel. They are well aware of every avenue through which efforts are made to reach them, and stedfastly resist. In spite of this, however, the various operations of the Mission have been blessed, large numbers of people have heard the Gospel, and the force of native workers which has been raised gradually increases. Mr. Glenny concluded with an earnest appeal for more labourers in this needy field.

Pithy descriptions of the work at some of the centres were given by subsequent speakers. At Casablanca, Morocco, the natives continue to seek the aid of the medical mission.

JEWS AND MOSLEMS ARE TREATED

in considerable numbers. Prior to entering the consulting room, they listen to a Bible reading and, if able to read, they are supplied with Gospels or tracts. Visitation is also conducted in the shops and cafés, where it is found that people readily gather round to listen to the evangelists. Magic lantern services and classes for women are also held. Medical work is likewise a feature of the work at Susa, and it is found that both men and women patients, in the respective meetings, receive the Gospel message with attention. Many terrible cases of disease are dealt with. In personal dealing with the people, and in evening meetings the truth has been proclaimed both in the towns and on itinerating tours through the many villages.

The missionaries returning are: To Morocco: Mr. and Mrs. H. E. Jones, Miss K. Aldridge, Miss I. de la Camp, Miss L. Greathead, Miss L. Sexton, and Miss M. Mellett. To Algeria: Miss K. Smith and Miss J. Cox. To Tunisia: Mr. and Mrs. H. E. Webb, Miss A. Cox, Miss N. Bagster, Miss M. Scott, Miss E. Turner, and Miss K. Johnston. To Egypt: Mr. and Mrs. W. Dickens, and Miss Van de Molen. The new workers going out are: Mr. A. Hope, Mr. S. Fraser, Miss F. Harnden, and Miss K. Philpott.

Dravidian Mission.

HAVING finished his course at Harley House, Mr. Arumugam returned to India last spring to commence work amongst the Pariahs. He writes to say that he has been already able to start three schools, and is about arranging a fourth. He has had great difficulties to contend with, as the high-caste people in the villages think that he is interfering with their rights.

Not only is this a great hindrance, but he finds the famine most serious in the district where he has commenced work, viz.: Vellore, North Arcot, Madras. He has practically been compelled to undertake the responsibility of eleven orphan children, whom he found destitute and almost dying from hunger.

The amount required for each school is £12 per annum, including the teacher, and he says that £3 per annum is sufficient for the maintenance of each child. The treasurer of the Mission is Mr. Thomas Radcliffe, Church Aston Manor, Newport, Shropshire.

The Indian Famine.

THE bare statement that nearly three millions of people are still in receipt of official relief, terrible as it is, conveys only an inadequate idea of the actual need. Great numbers are being cared for by the missionaries, who have undertaken responsibilities in which they have a claim to a large measure of support, especially in connection with the feeding, clothing, and training of orphan waifs. Thousands of adults, too, are in need of relief in the form of clothing, seed corn, and temporary support until the harvest.

REV. DENNIS OSBORNE'S MOVEMENTS.

The mission of Rev. Dennis Osborne in voicing the urgent needs of the suffering millions of our great Eastern dependency is arousing a large measure of public attention. During his recent visit to Scotland, Mr. Osborne addressed a gathering in the Christian Institute, Glasgow. The chair was taken by Lord Provost Chisholm, and Mr. Osborne, after reviewing the present position, said that it is with the approval of Lord Curzon—who is doing so much for the alleviation of distress—that he now appeals for a continuance of the sympathy and help of Christians in the home lands. Mr. Robert Scott paid a high tribute to the generous way in which this relief movement had been supported by manufacturers of food stuffs, and explained that contributions for this purpose, as well as for the supply of garments, much needed during the coming winter, should be forwarded to the office of The Christian.

NOTES FROM WORKERS.

Under date September 28, Rev. G. W. Blair writes from Godhra, Panch Mahals: — "We give doles of grain to about 1,300 people daily in ten villages. In Jhalod and four villages adjacent, we are giving two cooked meals daily to about 300 persons, a good many of whom are orphans. When the famine is over, I expect we will have a good many of these orphans on our hands, as Government has issued an order that no orphans are to be sent away from their own district to a greater distance than fifty miles. This order will almost compel us to keep all we have ourselves."

"My husband and I," writes Mrs. M. A. Haig, of Ahmednagur, "thank your readers most heartily for their continued welcome help in the work of succouring the famine-stricken, Those who have any fields are going back to them, and the calls on private charity are increasing. The number of children I am feeding has considerably risen; the orphans will be a permanent charge for some years to come, while of others the parents have fallen into such utter poverty that it will require a year or two for them to get rehabilitated. I hope, too, to be able to do a little more for the poor, but high caste Mohammedan women. There are so many with young children who are beyond the range of ordinary charity. Last week a little company of men, women, and children were baptized in the Mission Church here. They were poor ignorant people, judged by ordinary standards, but they knew that they were sinners, and needed a Saviour."

Mr. John Lampard writes from South Rampur, Rewa Kantha:—"For a great majority of poor Bheels the rains have come too late, a pretty general estimate giving a fourth as about the most that can survive the present year out of a total population of some 2,000,000. As one sees from day to day a few specimens of Bheels who have not suffered the ravages of famine, their erect gait, their agile figures, and the indispensable bow and arrows in hand, one cannot but profoundly regret the destruction of so large a proportion of this manly race. A considerable number of the residue of Bheels will owe its continued existence to the love and labour of Christian people.

Then again, some thousands of Bheel orphans will be brought up under Christian influence and instruction, which should result in a large accession to the ranks of the Church of Christ in India."

Rev. Arthur Outram (C.M.S.), who has returned to this country on furlough, consequent on the breakdown of himself and his esteemed wife, writes: "Will you kindly give me an opportunity of thanking your readers, who have so liberally helped us in saving life amongst the Bheels? Distress in a minor degree will continue for another year at least; and to meet this, clothing, seed grain, bullocks, agricultural implements, and cooking utensils have still to be provided, the people

HAVING SOLD EVERYTHING.

In meeting all these needs, as well as in actually feeding the starving, the generous help sent has been invaluable. As a permanent result of the famine we have on our hands at least 300 orphans to provide for; the yearly cost of each child for food, clothing, and education, comes to about £4. The most important, and, we trust, lasting result of the famine among the Bheels, is the breaking down of prejudice and the building up instead of friendship and trust. We therefore firmly believe that this terrible visitation will prove the means of bringing many who have truly known the pangs of hunger to feed on the True Bread that alone can satisfy the hungry soul."

Notes from Adelaide.

I HAVE just completed four Sundays' services in the Flinders Street Baptist Church, Adelaide, for so many years the scene of the labours of Dr. Silas Mead. About three years ago I was permitted to conduct a series of evangelistic meetings here with the valuable co-operation of Rev. J. G. Raws. It is gratifying to hear still of the numerous converts of that mission, and of their perseverance unto this day.

During my month's stay in this "queen of the Australian cities" (as the people of Adelaide call it), I have made the acquaintance of Mr. J. J. Virgo, the energetic and capable secretary of the Y.M.C.A., and have seen a little of the good work under his charge. I have twice attended the "Men's Own" meeting held on Sunday afternoon, once when Mr. J. H. Sinclair gave a wise, yet faithful, message, bearing upon certain phases of the social evil; and once to speak to the men myself upon "God's power to keep." The attendance is good, and indicates the hold that the Y.M.C.A. has upon the people. The Sunday night theatre services, which have been continued without interruption for years, are regarded by Mr. Virgo as one of the best features of the Association's work. Most of the members of his Workers' Band have been converted at these services.

During my stay here the city has been visited by some of the natives from Point Macleay, where a good work is being done among them. It is not generally known that there are about in this colony. Interest in work on their behalf has been greatly stirred by the interesting meetings recently held.

The representatives of Dr. Dowie, of Chicago, have made their appearance here, and have already captured a few members of the churches. It is strange that a man whose published utterances are so destitute of the spirit of Christ should find so many followers.

I am returning home to-day, just as the South Australian Christian Endeavour Convention is in full swing. A good meeting was held on Friday last, when I was permitted to urge upon the Endeavourers the principle of daily prayer and daily giving for missionary work. On Saturday afternoon the large Exhibition Building was packed for the meeting of Junior Endeavourers, and an almost equal attendance gathered at the Christian Citizens' Meeting. His Excellency the Governor, Lord Tennyson, presided, and his speech abounded in good things, wisely and earnestly spoken. His ideal of public life is a lofty one. The Christian's duty to the community and to God were dealt with by other speakers. The whole meeting was a witness to the vigour and strength and manliness of the true Christian life.

I return home by steamer to-night, and am looking forward to the Geelong Convention, which begins next week. Geo. Wainwright.

Chicago Bible Institute.

TWO former students have suffered martyrdom in China during the recent troubles, Miss Hattie J. Rice and Miss Josephine E. Desmond, both of whom went there under the China Inland Mission.

Ninety-four different volumes have been issued up to date in the Moody Colportage Library, their combined circulation being 3,754,899. They include six books in Swedish, four in Danish-Norwegian, three in German, and one has recently been added in Spanish to meet the call for Gospel literature in Spanish.

The Union Bible Classes, organized by D. L. Moody four years ago, and successfully carried on under the leadership of Mr. W. R. Newell, have commenced another season with great promise of usefulness. In addition to classes in the three sections of Chicago, Mr. Newell now teaches a class in St. Louis and another in Detroit every week. It is a noteworthy fact that upwards of 1,000 men and women are enrolled in each of these classes.

The Institute starts on its eleventh year with over 250 students, in both men and women as many as in any previous year. There are three departments of instruction—(1) Biblical, (2) Musical, to train men and women in Gospel singing, and (3) Practical, that is, clinical instruction in church, mission, visitation, and other phrases of actual work, by which the students are not only trained, but also tested as to their fitness for Christian service. This latter branch makes the Moody Institute unique, and has earned for it the name of "The West Point of Christian Work." The demand for trained workers far exceeds the available supply.

CONVENTION OF CHRISTIAN WORKERS.

The Convention of Christian Workers recently held under the auspices of the Institute, was one of the most representative gatherings of the kind held for several years. It was altogether for Bible study, but in addition to this, the programme exhibited a happy combination of prayer and praise, personal testimony, and reports of various forms of Christian enterprises.

The list of the speakers and singers included many of the best-known names in the country. The music was in charge of Professor D. B. Towner, of Chicago; Messrs. John H. Burke, of Oak Park, Ill.; and F. H. Jacobs, of Brooklyn. Rev. R. A. Torrey, Supt. of the Moody Bible Institute, and Pastor of the Moody Church, in which the meetings were held, was the presiding officer.

Mr. D. L. Moody's elder son and successor in the work, Mr. W. R. Moody, attended the Convention and spoke at several meetings. Mr. Moody's old friends in Chicago were touched to hear the son tell out the familiar truths from his father's platform.

The keynote of the Convention was that God would pour out a spirit of united prayer for a wave of blessing, such as would affect not only individuals and local communities, but also the country at large. Perhaps the most prominent result lay in the emphasis placed upon compassionate love as a motive power in Christian life and service.

Cairo Soldiers' Home.

THE Cairo Soldiers' Home and Gordon Hall will be ready for occupation early in October, and I am hoping to go out soon to help at the opening. The alterations are costing more than we anticipated, but the Home will be worth the expense, delay, and trouble, as we are assured we can at any time (if needful) build another storey.

The Home will be a great comfort to our young soldiers, as well as to our workers who have suffered much discomfort during the past three years. We have paid £2,230 to account, but £1,700 will still be required. Of this, Lord Wolseley has most kindly sent £100, and three old friends are promising £100 each if the remaining £1,300 is sent in, to enable us to open the Home free of debt or bond.

Will friends give thanks to our gracious Father and God for all He has done for us, since three years ago, on October 4, we sent, at his bidding, "a worker to Cairo with the Cameron Highlanders."—Yours in his service, ALICE TODD OSBORNE.

NARROW ESCAPES.

REV. ARCHIBALD GLOVER, in the course of a letter to his father, Rev. R. Glover, of Walton Rectory, Dorking, gives a vivid description of the escape of Mrs. Glover and family, Miss Gates, and himself, from Lu-an:—"A mock trial was gone through, and we were brought in guilty. When morning broke, we were ordered into our litters, and taken in a sort of sacrificial procession, to the beat of a gong at regular intervals, to a place outside the village. The road was lined on either side with spearmen, and nearly every male carried some implement or weapon. At a given signal they then fell upon our litters, and fought like wild beasts over our baggage. Before the mêlée I jumped down with Hedley, but dear Flora with Hope were literally buried under a heaving mass of human ferocity. I never believed she could possibly come out alive. To my amazement she presently came out, and little Hope with her, pale and dishevelled, but perfectly calm and uninjured. Miss Gates, too, was miraculously kept.

AMID FIENDISH NOISE

and fighting, the spoiling of our goods went on till all was disposed of. The people then went off, leaving us, to our surprise, alone and untouched.

"We were presently surrounded by a following of evil men from Han-tien, and a crowd from a village we were nearing, all of whom were armed with agricultural implements. For several hours we sat by the roadside, near a little food shop, hemmed in by these people, who freely discussed our death, sharpening their instruments on stones before our eyes. At last the long suspense was ended by their suddenly seizing us, and with cruel violence tearing the clothes from our bodies. Flora and Miss Gates were stripped of their upper garments; the dear children had nothing left to them except their combinations, while I myself was stripped naked, everything save my socks and a flannel binder being taken. Again, to our surprise, they went no further, no attempt was made to take our lives, though I do not doubt that they longed to do so. P'ao-ri gave me a pair of old pants, and someone in the crowd of filthy rags, and in these I went till I got to Kao-p'ing, where the rags were exchanged for an old gown of an official.

THREW ME A BEGGAR'S COAT

"We were then told to move on. It was now night, with a bright moon. On we walked until we came upon four men, sitting by the way, armed with mattocks, and waiting for us. They fell savagely on all except me (my beggar's rags were not worth taking), and snatched their remaining upper garments. Flora and Miss Gates were thus stripped to the waist. I remonstrated with the men, and they sullenly threw the women's garments back. They went off to fetch more men, and as soon as they were out of sight we fled along the torrent bed till we came to a graveyard, where we lay down under the shadow of the yews and slept till midnight. Then we tramped to the Uang-fang hills, and here we crowded together and were soon asleep, despite the bitter cold. The next day was Sunday. The sun soon became hot, and from the heat on that mountain height. Our thirst became intense, and the heat at last unbearable. At last we reached a river, thick with yellow mud, but to us as sweet as the purest well-water.

"We lay down to rest under trees in a cemetery near by. Soon a mandarin's procession came out, and passed by the spot where we were lying. They turned to see who we were, and in a few minutes a cart was at our side, with an official and two Yamen runners, who told us at once to enter it, as they had been sent by the Lu-an mandarin to find us and take us to Kao-p'ing, from whence we were to be sent on to Hankow.

"We arrived here (Hankow) Monday night, August 13. To-day, August 18, dear Flora was prematurely taken ill. It is another miracle of Divine love and power that, after such extraordinary hardships and buffetings, neither mother nor child seems to have suffered physical injury."

AN UNPRECEDENTED CRISIS.

At this time, when we are all gathered together from the four quarters of this great Empire, the above heading is not inappropriate. An unprecedented crisis, indeed, it is! And why? Because this, the largest mission field in the world numerically, is now left destitute of its many hundreds of missionaries. Yes, over 1,000 servants of Christ have had to quit their stations and flee to this great port! Never in the history of any foreign mission field has there been such a crisis! Look at the latest map of China, and you will see where foreigners are stationed, but what it means to leave all those far-distant centres, those mission stations which had become our homes, those many dear natives around us—that you cannot understand, but you can only sympathize with us in all we have had to go through.

Think of this great "land of Sinim" then, and of the many little churches all over the land, without the pastors. You have all been anxiously waiting for tidings of us, and are by now assured, we trust, of our safety in this place. Recent letters from home tell us of your continued anxiety on our behalf, but now we are glad and relieved to know you are aware of our whereabouts. Here we are, together with the many hundreds of God's people all assembled here, or where to go! All the interior is cleared now of his witnesses, there being only a few workers at the chief river and sea ports. Just think what all this means again—Shanghai full of those who desire China's best and highest welfare, all having been ordered out by our respective Governments!

NOT KNOWING WHAT TO DO

What are we to do? What expenses have all these long, long dangerous journeys entailed! And now what heavy expenses are we all incurring by living in this place, which is always very dear, now more than ever so! The great problem is, how shall all these extra heavy expenses be met? And another great question is, for how long are we to be kept here? One thing is certain—we shall not be allowed to return up West, or to Central or North China, till there is a satisfactory peace arranged. I emphasize satisfactory, for unless such a peace is settled by the Powers, life and property in China

WILL BE SIMPLY WORTHLESS!

My heading to this short summary of events uses the word "unprecedented," because never has the Christian Church had to deal with such a crisis. I emphatically affirm that it is the bounden duty of the home churches to do all that in them lies to support the Missionary Societies in China, now taxed with all these extra heavy expenses. And my reasons for this affirmation are (1) The members or agents of these societies have been obliged to leave their work and stations, through the call of the home Governments. (2) We are in the interior on sufferance only away from ports, and are thus in honour bound to obey our Governments. (3) Under such circumstances, therefore, are we here living at these high rates, doing exactly the opposite to what we all fain would do. (That is quite intelligible to you all, for what we all would love to do is, return to our respective stations and work far away up country.) This is not the Lord's will, though, for us at present; so we must abide his time, and continue to wait upon Him for guidance, asking that this deep trial may be blest to each and all of us, and that we may all learn the lessons our Heavenly Father would teach us.

Pray for us in this sin-stricken place of Shanghai. Oh! to see souls saved here! It seems to many of us the wisest thing would be to go home for the present, till the country is quiet again; then to return, refreshed, for a longer period of service. God bless you all as well as us. (MRS.) W. HOPE GILL.

Church Union in Scotland.

By Rev. T. ADAMSON, D.D., Glasgow.

IT is now morally certain that two great ecclesiastical bodies—the Free Church and the United Presbyterian Church—will unite in Edinburgh on the 31st of this month; with this view their supreme courts have been called to meet on the 30th.

It may be interesting, in view of this, to give such information about it as will enable readers—especially those on the south of the Border—to understand an event which, it is needless to say, will be the most interesting and important which has occurred for many years in the ecclesiastical annals of Scotland.

THE PARTIES.

The Free Church of Scotland and the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland are branches which have separated from the Established Church of the land. All the three churches are Presbyterian, and hold the same standards; and they all claim to hold the original position of the Scotch Church of the Reformation; but the two which are now under consideration were driven out from the third; they left, but unwillingly, because they held that the Church had really altered her position, and was upheld by the civil authorities.

The United Presbyterians, though they form the smaller body, are of earlier date than the Free Church. Or rather, the sections which united to form the United Presbyterian Church are earlier; for the United Presbyterian Church itself dates from 1847, and the Free Church from 1843. The United Presbyterian Church is composed mainly of "the Secession" and "the Relief." The former arose in 1740, when the Erskines—Ralph and Ebenezer, relatives of the Earls of Mar—were, with some other ministers, compelled to leave the Established Church because of the forcible settlement of ministers under lay patronage. The latter rose in 1752, mainly under the influence of Doddridge, as a reaction against the deadness of spirit and laxity of doctrine then prevalent in the State Church.

The Free Church arose in "the Disruption" of 1843, when more than 400 ministers, having vainly pleaded for ten years in the Assembly and with the State for the recognition of the Spiritual Headship of Christ over his Church (i.e., for his right to dictate to it in all spiritual affairs), left the Established Church and formed a Church for themselves. Patronage, a violation of this principle, was the prominent cause of their leaving.

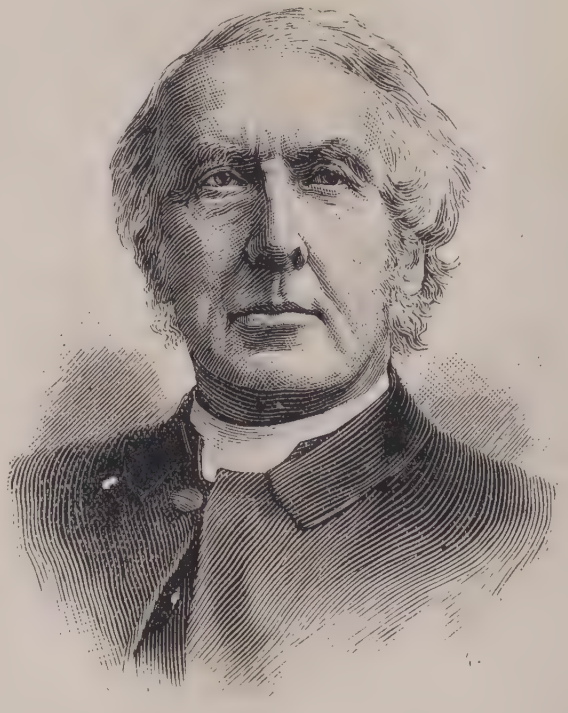
At once a complete organization of churches and manses, of schools and colleges, sprang up over the land; a new Church stood alongside of the Established, and challenged its claim to be the National Church. It was led by such men as the famous Dr. Chalmers, the statesman-like Dr. Cunningham, and the wise Murray Dunlop, M.P.; and had missionaries like Drs. Duff and Thomas Smith, of Calcutta; Wilson, of Bombay; and Murray Mitchell, of Poona.

STORY OF THE NEGOTIATIONS.

After twenty years of separate existence, the two churches entered on union negotiations, which lasted for ten years (1863-73), but failed to effect their purpose. The Union party was led by Dr. Candlish, of Edinburgh, by Dr. Buchanan, of Glasgow, and by Dr. Robt. Rainy, who, in the course of the controversy which arose, marked himself out as the leader of the next generation. The opposition was led by Dr. Begg, of Edinburgh, and Dr. Kennedy, of Dingwall. A disruption was threatened, and the Established Church did all it could to gain the dissenters. By an Act, which Lord Advocate Gordon introduced into Parliament in 1874, patronage was abolished. The measure failed, however, through the loyalty of the minority in the Free Church, who saw in it a gift of the State and not of Christ, something which allowed the people in each case only a few months to make their choice, and allowed persons to vote who were not in the membership of the congregation. Still union proceeded, for the Reformed Presbyterians—descendants of the persecuted Covenanters—joined the Free Church in 1876. About six years ago a movement began in Dundee among the laymen to have the project of union revived. It was carried through the local Presbytery to the General Assembly; and a united committee of the two Churches has been working at it since then, considering the means to be adopted for, and the methods to be followed after, the union.

OPPOSITION TO THE MOVEMENT.

There is still some opposition to the movement, although it has been carried in the supreme court of both Churches by overwhelming numbers. That is mainly in the Highlands, and it arises thus. The sections composing the United Presbyterian Church left the Established Church because they considered, as the Free Church also did, that it had not been faithful to its hereditary position. But there grew up in what is now the United Presbyterian Church a theoretical voluntaryism, which had not been at first contemplated. Now it is true that this has never been embodied in that Church's standard, and is no part of her creed.



REV. R. RAINY, D.D.

From Photograph by Messrs. Elliott & Fry, 55, Baker Street, London, W.

A person in her ministry may, if he choose, hold views quite the opposite. But, as a fact, the position is held by the mass, if not all, of her ministers and most of her members, and has been repeatedly affirmed as its mind by the Synod, which is their chief court. Now the Free Church, in its claim of right, asserted the power of appealing to the State for its old privileges and possessions when expedient. Many in the Free Church have, however, ceased to hope for that time; and others—from the experiences of the past half-century—have adopted more or less fully the idea of the expediency of separation between Church and State, and of the inexpediency of endowments. Those who object to the union adhere to "the Establishment principle" as it is called, or rather to that application of the Headship of Christ over the peoples, which they think should make States uphold and even endow his Church. They refuse to leave this an open question. Instead of discussing it here, let the words of Dr. Chalmers suffice. He once said, "My friends will bear me witness that I am the very last person who would stand on the rigid assertion of the mere theory of establishments for the purpose of keeping up division or schism in the Church. So far from that, it appears to me that the distinct refusal of the State and kingdoms of this world to recognise the only principle on which we can consent to have the Church established leaves to us a very large degree of practical liberty and a large measure of practical discretion as to the terms on which we should stand with other Churches. Is the division and schism of the Christian Church to be kept up by a question as to the duty of another party over whom we have no control?"

REV. DR. RAINY.

The leader in the movement towards the "United Free Church of Scotland" is, of course, Dr. Rainy, the Principal of the New College, Edinburgh. He may be called the "grand old man" of the Scotch Ecclesiastical world, for he certainly is its controlling personality. Indeed, he resembles the late Mr. Gladstone very much in his style, though he rests his power more on the matter than on the oratory of his speeches. For he has much of the balanced faculty of judgment and wide range of view, as well as the faculty of seeing all round a subject and appreciating its modifications or connections, which distinguished that great political leader. He has also the same strength of will and power of imposing his personality on a movement; so that it may be safely said that but for him this project would, if it had not died a natural death, at least not have been heard of for years to come.

He is now nearly seventy-five years of age, but is rather over the middle height, broad and vigorous. His father was a professor of medicine in Glasgow University. He was appointed minister of Huntly in 1850, and of the Free High Church in Edinburgh in 1854. He became Professor of Church History in the New College of that city in 1862—a post he still holds in connection with the Principalship of the institution, to which he was appointed in 1874. Without doubt he is the outstanding figure in the Churches of Scotland at present. Men may differ from his views; many do. But none can deny, and I do not know of anyone who attempts to deny, either his great ability and splendid learning, or his thorough conscientiousness and his unfailing courtesy, even to those who differ from him.

It is proposed that each of the contracting Churches shall bring its position unchanged into the Union, and that the question of Church establishments shall be left open.

AIMS AND PLANS.

The Free Church aimed from the beginning to become a National Church, for that was her claim. She desired to provide ordinances for all parts, even the poorest of the country. In order to effect that, Dr. Chalmers devised what is called the Sustentation Fund, according to which money received from all the congregations of the Church is, under certain rules, divided equally, and all its ministers receive an equal dividend of about £170 exclusive of a house, the church which contributes thousands receiving the same sum as the poorest congregation.

The United Presbyterian Church began with the idea of supplementing the existing ordinances where desired, and not of competing with them. Accordingly it has an Augmentation Fund, which tries to bring up the salaries of the ministers as far as possible. The intention is, therefore, that in the United Church these two schemes should remain side by side.

The Free Church Assembly and the United Presbyterian Synod will meet separately in their own halls on Tuesday, October 30, and, after transacting the necessary business, will proceed by procession on Wednesday, October 31, to the Waverley Market, which is being specially fitted up for the enormous crowd expected on the occasion. Then the union will be formally consummated, and we hope to be able to give full account of the proceedings immediately it has taken place.

Mrs. Jennie Fuller.

A LIFE FOR GOD.

OUTWARDLY a storm-tossed life, endurance of hardship, privation, domestic affliction, and hard pioneer labour. Inwardly peace, love, and joy in the Holy Ghost. The results, a beautiful spiritual influence reaching out to all with whom she came into contact; a heart full of practical, sanctified common-sense; an abandonment to the claims of others that made her always at leisure to share their perplexities and joys; one who was constantly sought after by Indian Christians and welcomed into every Protestant Missionary circle in Western India—such was Mrs. Jennie Fuller, whom God called from work to reward on June 21, 1900.

The great Indian Famine of 1899-1900 will long be remembered for the number of valued missionary lives which have been sacrificed by its intense strain upon nerve-power and bodily endurance, and by the cholera accompanying the famine. Of those who have received their home-call in this manner, none will be more widely missed or more deeply regretted than the subject of this sketch.

Mrs. Fuller, formerly Miss Jennie Frow, went to India in 1877 as a faith missionary. Her childhood's home was in Southern Ohio, U.S.A. Her conversion to God in early life was definite and thorough. In 1873 she became a student in Oberlin College, and came under the powerful spiritual influence of Charles G. Finney, then its president. To him the trend of her life was largely due. She became possessed of one great desire, to spend her life for Christ in the manner best fitted to advance his kingdom, and thus a missionary career opened out before her.

Miss Frow could doubtless have obtained entrance to the Mission field through some regularly organized missionary society had she applied for it, but she chose to deal with God alone in regard to her appointment. Rev. Albert Norton had previously graduated from Oberlin, and had opened a pioneer faith work in the Ellichpur district in Central India, where no missions had been heretofore. Miss Frow felt led to join Mr. and Mrs. Norton for work in this hard and neglected field, and share with them the hardships of a pioneer life. She arrived in Bombay on January 4, 1877, with no pledge of support from any human source. It was a truth deeply ingrained on her heart that anything she might say would have no effect unless her life corresponded with her teaching; hence from the first her missionary life was characterized by self-sacrifice and self-denial.

The year 1877 was one of famine in South India. Mr. C. B. Ward was gathering in orphans by the hundred in the Hyderabad country, south of Sholapur. One of the Ellichpur workers had occasion to go to Bombay, and Miss Frow commissioned him to get six of these girls. With much trouble they were persuaded to go, and with difficulty were taken back the long journey by road and rail to Ellichpur. These became Miss Frow's first family of orphan girls to be trained for Christ. She found them very wild and unruly, and so depraved that the work was most discouraging. But by-and-by a change came. One of the most naughty girls came to Miss Frow and expressed sorrow for her conduct, and in a short time all were converted, truly changed in heart and life. A few weeks after their conversion, Miss Frow received a letter from a Christian man, a blacksmith, in Ohio, telling her that on a certain day he had spent the whole evening in prayer for these girls, and that he had been led to mark the day and write to her that God had given him the assurance of their salvation. On referring to the date sent, Miss Frow found it to be the very day when her heart was gladdened by signs of penitence in the children.

Three of the survivors of these six girls are useful Christian workers at the present day. All have taken the keenest interest in helping to save other children from famine in these later years. Shantibai cared for the starving in Mrs. Bruere's orphanage at Poona. Imambai, who never left Mrs. Fuller, is a valued helper at the Alliance orphanage at Khamgaon; and Ashabai is the wife of a useful man engaged at the M.E. Mission at Narsinghpur. Thus the blacksmith's prayer continues to bear fruit to the glory of God.

In the three years spent in the Ellichpur district Miss Frow learned to know the people and gained a colloquial knowledge of Marathi and Hindustani, together with many valuable experiences in caring for native children. This, the first period of her missionary career, was a period of personal training in the school of trial and faith.

After a short rest in America she returned to India in 1881 as the wife of Rev. M. B. Fuller, a former fellow-student in Oberlin

THE LATE MRS. FULLER.

College. Akola, a large district in Berar, was chosen as their field of work. They settled in the town of Akola, which is about a day's journey nearer Bombay than Ellichpur.

As the years passed, there did not seem to be as much progress or so great results as faith had led the devoted workers to expect. During these years Mr. and Mrs. Fuller had a little family growing up around them. The best of Mrs. Fuller's life was always given to God and his service, but next to that came her children. But griefs, as well as joys, came with the children. Two little graves in the Akola cemetery marked these years, and when in 1890 the mother's frail health indicated the imperative need of a change of climate, she sailed for America with the two who were left to her; and a few months after their arrival in the homeland another little daughter came into the home. Mr. Fuller joined his family in America somewhat later.

About this time the Christian Alliance of New York, under the leadership of Rev. A. B. Simpson, began to create a strong missionary spirit among those who were attracted to its teaching. The watchword of the Alliance was the fourfold Gospel as indicated by the following motto, "Jesus as Saviour, Sanctifier, Healer, and Coming King." Mr. and Mrs. Fuller came into contact with this movement while in America, and were enlisted to lead out a new band of missionaries to India. Mrs. Fuller arrived in India on September 3, 1892, with her three children, and the first instalment of the missionary force, consisting of five ladies and a married couple (Mr. and Mrs. Ramsey).

In accepting the position of superintendents of the Alliance Mission in India, Mr. and Mrs. Fuller changed the method, though not the principle of their life of faith. By the experience of the previous years they had proved that God could provide a table in the wilderness for those called to depend entirely on Him, and the basis arranged for the support of the Alliance misssionaries commended itself to their experience and judgment.

In the course of the following twelve months many new workers had joined our friends. Then the visions of past years began to become realities. Stations were opened in populous parts of Berar, for which workers had long been prayed for. Then Mr. Fuller prospected in Gujerat, and this opened up a largely unmissioned district, and one which proved most interesting and fruitful as the birthplace of souls.

In all the continuous planning and labour that this work entailed, Mrs. Fuller took her full share. If she was found resting in the hot season, it was usually in a small house at Igatpuri, with a colony of young missionaries round her, whom she was coaching in the language.

In the summer of 1894, some necessity for consultation with the Home Board having arisen, Mrs. Fuller made a short visit to America, returning in the autumn with reinforcements for the Mission. Shortly afterwards the headquarters of the Mission were removed from Akola to Bombay, and that city henceforth became Mrs. Fuller's home. Here her life was, if possible, busier than ever: a large house filled with missionaries coming and going, beside several always in residence, who were engaged in work in the city; frequent journeys back and forth to the country stations of the Mission; constantly in request for meetings all over the city, both in English and the vernacular; Indian Christians flocking to her for advice and help—it was little wonder that she sometimes sighed for a little quiet home life. In January, 1897, our sister was much impressed with a visit she paid with her husband to the Syrian Christians in Travancore. Rev. J. Gelson Gregson was conducting evangelistic services among this interesting people, and he asked Mr. and Mrs. Fuller to join him. It was a difficult journey, and the accommodation most primitive, but our friends felt well repaid for making the effort. Mrs. Fuller's own service was to have been confined to the women; but having once spoken in the open-air to a mixed audience, it was found afterwards that the men crowded the verandahs of the church while she was speaking to the women inside.

During her extended missionary experience, the wrongs suffered by Indian women had burnt into her soul. Her friendship with Pandita Ramabai had given her a further peep behind the curtain that hides so much of this suffering from the outer world. She conceived the idea of writing a series of papers on this subject, to be published in the Bombay Guardian, and set herself to the task with zest. She took the utmost pains to verify every fact she stated. She must have the word of two or three witnesses for everything. The result was one of the most valuable works yet published, covering the entire subject indicated by the title, "The Wrongs of Indian Womanhood." In pursuit of the truth on this subject, Mrs. Fuller interviewed Hindus, Mohammedans, and Parsees, consulted libraries, hunted up ancient and modern authorities, and took journeys to distant places. This book has since been published in New York.

When, in the autumn of 1899, famine set in with severity in India, all the stations of the Alliance Mission in Berar, Gujerat, and Khandeish were affected. Mr. and Mrs. Fuller made a survey of the districts, and prepared to do what they could to meet the need, constantly going to and fro in the famine districts, advising, directing and organizing relief, supplementing breakdowns in different stations, and providing for the efficient and faithful distribution of funds entrusted to their care.

In February a sore bereavement befel them in their Bombay home. Miss Kate Park, who had been a valued helper for five years, and whose work lay chiefly among the Jews in Bombay, was taken with small-pox, and died after a short illness. In March cholera broke out in the mission house at Khamgaon. Mrs. Fuller responded to the call for help, though sadly run down and in need of rest at the time. She was herself and thought to be dying, but rallied. She was taken to Bombay, and every loving care bestowed on her, but lung and heart complications, followed by dropsy, supervened, and she lingered only to suffer. For many years Mrs. Fuller had known the Lord as her Healer, but during this illness she said she was unable "to touch God for healing." For a month before she died she was unable to lie down; she became very weary and longed for rest, though she desired to live to see her beloved son and daughter again. But on June 21 the home-call came, and the tired body was at rest.

Grief at her loss was sincere and widespread. Every Protestant mission in Bombay was represented at her funeral. European and Indian Christian young men shared the privilege of carrying her body to its last resting place in the lovely Sewree Cemetery, luxuriant with the verdure of the tropics.

Among the tributes to her memory from all classes in India, two may be specially mentioned. The Y.M.C.A. Monthly, of Bombay, says: "It is not given to many women to exercise a strong hold over young men; but when the announcement was made that Mrs. Fuller would speak at a Young Men's meeting, not only was no incongruity felt, but a good meeting was confidently anticipated. Her transparent reality and earnestness constrained the attention; attracted by the transparent ease and fluency of her diction, impressed with the reasonableness of her thoughts, disarmed by the loving tenderness with which she set forth stern, unbending truths, young men could not but acknowledge her right to a hearing. Bombay has lost one of its best speakers to young men, the Christian Church one of the noblest of its workers."

The other is from a Brahmin Pandit, not a Christian, who worked with Mrs. Fuller in translation work, and in tuition of Alliance missionaries in Marathi. He says: "She was one of the few persons who could reach the hearts of the people of this country, and consider themselves as one of them. . . . Wherever she went, either among the educated or the uneducated classes of the people, she was liked by all. The one quality that made her so was the deep and real interest she showed and had for the people. Her heart was full of love for them."

These extracts give the clue as to why Mrs. Fuller was, as the Bombay Guardian said, "the best-known woman missionary in Western India and the best loved."

The Conversion of Brownlow North.

[A series of deeply interesting articles, entitled "Notable Conversions," are appearing month by month in the United Presbyterian Magazine. A recent number contained the story of Brownlow North, from the pen of Rev. James Harvey, M.A., Edinburgh. We make brief extracts.]

WITH all the strength of a determined and forceful nature, Brownlow North lived far into his prime a life of open and unblushing wickedness. The form of godliness was cast off; the outward customs of religion were despised; and he lived "without God and without hope in the world." In this dark period of his life, it is pleasant to remember that there still lingered in his character some hopeful features that relieved the gloom of his wickedness. Though a hardened unbeliever, he could not endure gross blasphemy; and, while his vicious course of conduct had alienated many of his friends, he still cherished a warm love to his mother, who had never ceased to pray and hope, like Augustine's mother, for her son's conversion.

Towards the close of his forty-fifth year, while he was still serving sin "with both hands earnestly," the call of God came to him in his own house at Dallas, with an urgency that could not be resisted, and the great change took place which

REVOLUTIONIZED HIS WHOLE LIFE.

With circumstantial minuteness he thus described it to the students of Edinburgh University some years afterwards:—"It pleased God in the month of November, 1854, one night when I was sitting playing at cards, to make me concerned about my soul. The instrument used was a sensation of sudden illness, which led me to think I was going to die. I said to my son, 'I am a dead man; take me upstairs.' As soon as this was done, I threw myself down on the bed. My first thought then was, now what will my forty-four years of following the devices of my own heart profit me? In a few minutes I shall be in hell, and what good will all these things do me for which I have sold my soul? At that moment I felt constrained to pray, but it was only the prayer of the coward, a cry for mercy. I was not sorry for what I had done, but I was afraid of the punishment of my sin. And yet still there was something trying to prevent me putting myself on my knees to call for mercy, and that was the presence of the maid-servant in the room lighting my fire. Though I did not believe at that time that I had ten minutes to live, and knew that there was no possible hope for me but in the mercy of God, and that if I did not seek that mercy I could not expect to have it, yet such was the nature of my heart, and of my spirit within me, that it was a balance with me, a thing to turn this way or that, I could not tell how, whether I should wait till that woman left the room, or whether I should fall on my knees and cry for mercy in her presence. By the grace of God I did put myself on my knees before that girl, and I believe it was with me. I believe that if I had at that time resisted the Holy Ghost—of course I cannot say, for who shall limit the Holy Ghost?—but my belief is that it would have been once too often. By God's grace I was not prevented. I did pray, and though I am not what I should be, yet I am this day what I am, which at least is not what I was."

The consciousness of his conversion was so clear and vivid in North's mind that there was no hesitation in avowing its reality, and declaring at once to his friends and companions what God had done for his soul. The change came with all the shock and tumult of a revolution, but for many months peace was unknown. The new King was enthroned in the heart, but rebellious passions had to be conquered, and much territory had still to be possessed. So deep and radical, however, was the change, that at once old habits associated with his evil life were broken off, and old companions were informed of his conversion. But the deeper habits and companions of his mind and heart could not be cast out all at once. For months there raged within a fierce conflict with doubts and fears, the accusations of conscience, and the stinging pangs of remorse. At last came to him as he began to realize that God was near to him, and that Jesus Christ, against whom he had sinned, was his Saviour and Lord, and that salvation was not of works, but of faith; and then, like a little child, he yielded himself to the authority of Christ and his Word, giving up, once for all, his own reasonings and his own righteousness. "God helping me," he said, "I will stand or fall by the Lord Jesus Christ. I will put my trust in his truth, and in his teaching, as I find it in the written Word of God; and doing that, so sure as the Lord Jesus Christ is the Truth, I must be forgiven and saved."

The late Madame Meuricoffre.

MADAME TELL MEURICOFFRE, of Naples, was an earnest Christian worker. Not only was she the life and soul of the work of the Sailors' Rest, but she was interested in a variety of agencies for good, local and general in their operations. She will be greatly missed from the Executive Committee of the International Abolitionist Federation—a striking personality, and genial, gracious spirit. Her life was one of great and varied interest, her husband and she having taken part in all the great events and changes of Italy for the last forty years, from the death of the old King "Bomba" and the pathetic incident of the release of the political prisoners from the dungeons of St. Elmo.

Mme. Meuricoffre was called upon to take the management of the great hospital in Naples in which were received the wounded troops of Garibaldi after the revolution, and she accompanied the beloved General through the wards when he visited each separate soldier. Later, when the terrible visitation of cholera occurred in Naples, and when all the classes who could afford to do so fled from the stricken city, she and her husband, happening to be in England, hurried back without pause in their journey. Mme. Meuricoffre fearlessly and daily visited the cholera hospitals, comforting the sick and dying. She to visit them, when he so bravely undertook that mission to Naples in spite of the doctor's warnings. Mme. Meuricoffre remarking to him on the cheer and benefit his noble act had conferred, he replied with characteristic humility, "I am but the servant of my people."

On the occasion of the great Ischia earthquake Mme. Meuricoffre received into her house eighty orphan children whose parents had perished, caring for them with maternal love, and gradually finding homes for them among the peasants in the country. Few have more fully realized the character of those upon whom the blessing is pronounced: "I was naked, and ye clothed Me; I was sick, and ye visited Me."

Mrs. Josephine Butler, sister of the deceased lady, writes: "Her faith was simple and unquestioning—like that of a child, the right kind of faith. When she prayed with me sometimes, I was struck by the loving and confident nature of her conversation with the Saviour, the tenderness of her pleadings for those she loved, and the tone of assurance that He whom she was addressing, who is Love, would more than fulfil her requests. Her face, as we rose from our knees, would be beaming with smiles through her tears. Though well on in years, she was young in heart to the last, and so ready in sympathy, and so sweetly gracious in manner that, as one of her near relatives says of her departure, 'it seems as if the sun had set suddenly before its time.' One of my sons writes: 'In her presence one felt as if near a fountain of perennial, never-failing sympathy, and generous, warm, human kindness.'"

*The Torpedo.

"I was not a burden on any man."—2 Cor. xi. 9 (R.V.)

TOM was quite right when, after reading about them, he mentally resolved that he would on no account wade in the pools and marshes of Brazil, should he ever visit tropical America. For the electric eel that abounds there must be a very unpleasant neighbour, measuring 5ft. or 6ft. in length, and furnished at its tail with a natural battery that will convey an electric shock sufficient to numb or even kill the largest animal. What a rapid dispersal of bathers there would be at any of our seaside resorts, if a ray-fish made its appearance among them! For it has also an apparatus on either side of its head where it stores electric force, which it can suddenly discharge so as quite to stun and stupefy.

The Latin name for these electric fishes is torpedo—the fish that makes its victim stiff or torpid. I do not need to tell you that the name is now given to a little submarine vessel or engine charged with an explosive agent, and fired either by concussion or electricity with terribly destructive results.

But you may not know that torpedo is a Bible-word; and it is the use which the magnanimous apostle makes of it which will teach us, if we are willing to learn it, a splendid lesson of independence. It was, perhaps, from his friend and companion in travel, the beloved physician Luke, that St. Paul became acquainted with the habits of the electric fishes which were known to the ancients. Anyhow, he uses the Greek equivalent for the name torpedo when he has occasion to tell the Corinthians that he was not indebted to any one for his maintenance. He supported himself by weaving and selling tent-cloth that he might preach the Gospel of God for nothing; and when his goods did not sell, he just went without his dinner. For he was determined not to be a benumbing burden on any one. He would not play the part of a torpedo.

When we wish to speak in this forcible way, we employ the name of another creature that stands lowest in the scale of life, but whose fibrous, porous skeleton you find very useful, I hope, in your morning bath. As St. Paul cited the habit of the electric eel to illustrate the kind of life which he did not practise, we should say with the same object, "I did not sponge on any of you."

Now I have to tell you that you know hardly anything of this holy apostle and his rare qualities of mind and heart, if you have not come to admire, honour and love him, and put him high up among your noblest heroes. I want you betimes to learn his splendid lesson of independence. It is a fine motto for home and school and the wide world. Do not play the torpedo. Do not sponge. Bear your own burden. Paddle your own canoe. Learn to labour and wait.

When Adam delved and Eve span,
Who was then the gentleman?

Why should Tom make a house-fag of his sister? Why should my fine lady of fourteen years come late down to breakfast, expecting mother to have attended to everything? It's a mean thing to sponge on another boy's pocket-money; and if you leave your brother to do your sums or translation as well as his own, you just torpedo him.

What was the secret of Paul's independence? How had he become such a master in the art of contentment? Because he had gone into partnership with Another, whose resources were quite inexhaustible. So he could say, "I can do all things in Christ, who strengtheneth me." Learn his open secret of self-sufficiency. It means God-sufficiency. What Bishop Westcott said to his clergy may be repeated to boys and girls who also "minister before the Lord:" "The losing of self in the supreme thought of God is the secret of our power as Christians." All the heroes of faith who subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, stopped the mouths of lions, quenched the power of fire, and turned to flight armies of aliens were inspired and possessed by this conviction that, without God, they were mere cyphers, but that "one with God is a majority." Hence they were all men of prayer, who could not and would not go on the Master's errands alone.

It is told of Robert Bruce, a famous preacher in Edinburgh in the time of James VI., that on a Sabbath morning before service, he tarried so long in his vestry that one was sent to call him. The messenger returned to say that it was very doubtful whether the minister would make his appearance in the congregation at all that day. For as he waited at the closed door of the vestry, he discovered that there was someone inside whom the minister was addressing very earnestly, and saying over and over again that he could not and would not go forth unless he came with him; but the other answered not a word. You know who this silent One was. And the minister must have got what he wanted, for he did come forth to the waiting people, and was that day, according to the old chronicler, "singularly assisted."

I commend to you in your own life and work the attitude and spirit of the Scottish Reformer. You will not be a burden on any one, and you will bear the burden of others, if you lay yourselves as a burden of love on the heart of Christ, and hold with St. Paul ever more certainly that "our sufficiency is of God."

Christian Endeavour Topic.

SUNDAY, OCT. 28.

"Do Not Worry." (Matt. vi. 25-34.)

WHY do you worry? If God has given you that wonderful thing life, it is clear that He will not withhold what is needed for its fuelling and maintenance; else He would stultify Himself.

Besides, He feeds and clothes the birds and flowers, although they can do nothing to rear crops and manufacture raiment. You and I are dearer to Him than these creatures of his world. We are his sons and daughters. Will a king care for the livery of his footmen, and leave his children to rags? Besides the very faculty we have for sowing and reaping, and gathering into barns, proves that He intends to work with us to these self-same ends.

Moreover, did worry ever do anyone any good? Did it ever alter the morrow, or take an ounce from the load of our care? Did it ever make us stronger, wiser, more patient? No, but it gave us sleepless nights, and so diminished our working force. It robbed us of strength, and courage, and nerve-power. It added the burden of to-morrow to the burden of to-day, without fetching into to-day the strength and help which will be surely present when to-morrow dawns. So useless is worry, that we may as well treat it as we would treat a temptation: we may as well shut the door violently against its entrance; we should ask the Peace of God to come in to garrison our heart with its emotions, and our mind with its power of forecast.

Of course, we must exercise wise and prudent foresight; but we shall best prepare against to-morrow by doing, as well as we know how, the work of to-day. Do your duty, leave the results with God.

The Lord adds another injunction, obedience to which will be most easily emancipate us from care: Seek ye first the Kingdom. As though He had said; "Get away from this constant thought about yourself, and be lost in an absorbing passion for others."

When Wilberforce was devoting himself with vast energy to the liberation of the slaves, a lady said to him, "I am afraid, Mr. Wilberforce, you are so busy with those slaves, that you are neglecting your own soul." "True, madam," was his quick reply, "I had quite forgotten that I had one." Had he been an irreligious and careless man, of course such an answer would have been irreverent and profane; but in that great Christian philanthropist, whose life was consumed by compassion and service for others, it was a wise and good retort.

John Bright also discovered the same secret. At the inauguration of the Cobden Memorial, he said, "I was in despair, for all that was left of my young wife, except the memory of a sainted life and of a too brief happiness, was lying still and cold in the chamber above us. Mr. Cobden called on me as his friend, and addressed me, as you might suppose, in words of condolence. After a time he looked up and said, 'There are thousands of homes in England at this moment where wives, mothers, and children are dying of hunger. Now, when the first paroxysm of grief is passed, I would advise you to come with me, and we will never rest till the Corn Law is repealed.' I accepted his invitation." Bright escaped from the pressure of his anxiety and sorrow by flinging himself into the great campaign for the relief of others. And you will find that in proportion as you look after God's interests, He will look after yours, and that He cares for them who care first for his kingdom and glory. F. B. M.

A BOER C.E. SOCIETY.

A remarkable C.E. work has sprung up among the Boer prisoners in Deadwood Camp on St. Helena. It commenced with fourteen active members and about thirty-five associates. The first consecration meeting was a memorable time. They took 2 Cor. viii. 5 for their text: "They first gave their ownselves to the Lord," and the following points were dwelt on one by one:—Giving the life to Christ; Christ's acceptance of the gift; his cleansing, filling, keeping, using. During the meeting the crowd around had increased, but it was amidst dead silence that the active members one by one renewed their vows in prayer or by Scripture words. Finally 1,500 young men and old walked up to the camp singing:—

Jesus is good to me, Jesus is good to me,
So good, so good, Jesus is good to my soul.

So God began a great work amongst them. Meetings were held every day, when inquirers were asked to remain. Of course privacy and secrecy were out of the question, everything must be open and above board; but even under such conditions men were not ashamed to be seen kneeling, with the words on their lips, "We will accept Christ." In three weeks the Society grew from fourteen to forty active members. Prayer is asked that this Society may be greatly used of God.

International S.S. Lesson.

The Unjust Steward (Luke xvi. 1-13).
Golden Text.—"Ye cannot serve God and Mammon" (13).

Introduction.

THE prodigal son "wasted his substance with riotous living"; The steward "wasted his master's goods" (1).

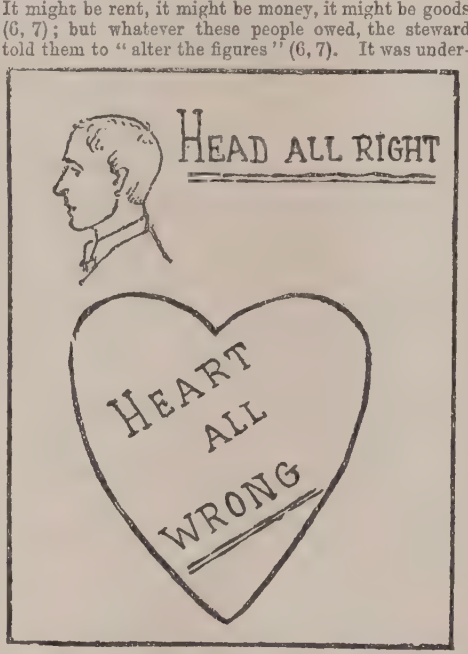
The rich man represents God, the Giver of all good things; the steward represents one entrusted with God's good gifts, to be used for him, not wasted.

The Steward.

(1, 2) He had control over the master's land, property, and goods; but this man was unworthy of his position, and his master, hearing about his idleness and dishonesty, calls him to give an account, for he must no longer hold that position. (8.) Why did the rich man praise him? For his forethought—his head was right (see Plan for Blackboard); he looked forward to the future, and prepared for it; and we learn a very important lesson, viz.: God wants us to think of the future, and use our brains, too, for life here and hereafter.

His Character.

He was unfaithful, wasteful (1), lazy, indolent (3), dishonest (4); he would get into favour with his neighbours by doing a mean action towards his master (5). It might be rent, it might be money, it might be goods (6, 7); but whatever these people owed, the steward told them to "alter the figures" (6, 7). It was under-



Key to Blackboard Plan.—The steward's head was all right. It was bright and keen enough; but his heart was all wrong; and God cannot use even an intelligent brain for his glory, unless the heart has been first given to Him (Jer. xvii. 9, 10).

hand, deceitful work. He was ashamed to beg (3), but not ashamed to cheat. If he had told the truth he could have said, "I know how to waste, but not how to work."

Lesson of Faithfulness.

(10) Faithfulness in little things is the test of being faithful in great things.

Christ had so many things to teach the people. One day it is "humility," another "forgiveness," &c., and to-day it is "be faithful" to God. Get the right heart and serve Him, the right Master, the one to whom you belong, for has He not bought you with a price? (1 Cor. vi. 20; Rom. vi. 16). Remember, we shall all have to give an account of our work (Eccles. xii. 14; Rom. xiv. 12; 1 Cor. iv. 2).

A School for Gospel Singers.

THE increasing demand upon Mr. Sankey for his own services, or those of others whom he could recommend as leaders of sacred song in evangelistic and other departments of Christian work, has led him to comply with the many urgent requests which he has been receiving for some years past, to establish a "School for Gospel Singers," where persons may be trained for labour in this important department of the Lord's work.

We are glad Mr. Sankey has decided to establish such a school. There is no longer any question as to the importance of the ministry of song being so conducted as to make a mighty power, under the blessing of God, for the evangelization of the people. No one is better qualified to take the initiative in this matter than the life-long co-labourer of Mr. Moody.

Mr. Sankey's Movements.

FURTHER particulars of Mr. Ira D. Sankey's visit to Berwick-on-Tweed show that the town was deeply stirred. Mr. Sankey was in splendid voice, and entertained the afternoon audience with an account of his experiences in Egypt and Palestine, and singing several hymns, new and old. In the evening he related the story of his and gave the history of several of his solos. The large audiences were deeply interested, and it was with much feeling that, at Mr. Sankey's request, they joined in the chorus, "We shall meet beyond the river."

Proceeding northwards, Mr. Sankey visited North Berwick on October 16, at the invitation of Mrs. W. G. Blaikie, and a very large gathering heard the Service of Sacred Song and Story with great interest. Lord Overtoun presided.

For the following day two meetings had been arranged in Edinburgh, but the attendances were so large that four of the most spacious buildings in the city were crowded to overflowing to hear the well-known Gospel singer.

The first meeting, called for 3 p.m., was held in the Free Assembly Hall, but an hour before the time of meeting it was and the Free High Church, opened as an overflow, was filled within a few minutes. No place can possibly be more sacred with recollections of past days than the Free Assembly Hall, and the sight of the meeting there, with the solemn stillness which fell over the audience as Mr. Sankey sang "I am far frae my hame," and "There were ninety and nine that safely lay," which was first sang by Mr. Sankey in this very place, will never be forgotten. Professor A. R. Simpson, M.D.; Rev. Dr. J. H. Wilson, and others took part, and a great many old friends could be seen in all parts of the hall.

At night, upwards of an hour before time of meeting, Free St. George's Church was crowded; and the Synod Hall, the largest hall in the city, opened for an overflow without any notice but a verbal message at the church door, was crowded at once, and here the audience waited patiently for two hours till Mr. Sankey could get along after his meeting in the church. Rev. Dr. Whyte presided at Free St. George's, and Rev. Dr. Cunningham at the Synod Hall. At both services Mr. Sankey both spoke and sang, and on all sides the earnest hope was expressed that he should come to the city for other services. During the day Mr. Sankey spoke and sang to and great numbers were unable to secure admission to any of the services.

Mr. Sankey received an enthusiastic welcome in Dundee. On Thursday night the Kinnaird Hall was crowded to excess, there being upwards of 2,000 present, while many hundreds were unable to obtain admission. There was a large attendance of ministers. Mr. Sankey sang with all his wonted tenderness, solemnity, and impressiveness, interspersing his solos with the narration of incidents, in which some of the songs originated, and also of events in his long and happy association with Mr. Moody. In particular, the hymn "Eternity," associated as it is in its origin with the heroic death of Robert Annan, of Dundee, made a profound impression. As many were unable to be present on Thursday night, a meeting, largely attended, was held on the following day at noon, in St. Clement's Church. Mr. Sankey's mission of song carries with it an interest and a charm all its own.

Mr. Sankey's engagements are: Oct. 25, Albert Hall, Stirling; Oct. 26, at 3 p.m.; Oct. 27, at 7 p.m.; and Oct. 28, at 7 p.m., St. Andrew's Hall, Glasgow; Nov. 6 and 7, Belfast.

See preceding column.

A Sale of Work on behalf of the Society for Irish Church Missions is to be held in Kensington Town Hall on Tuesday and Wednesday next, October 30 and 31. Rev. Canon McCormick is to open the sale on Tuesday at 3 p.m., and Mr. F. Victor Buxton on Wednesday at the same hour.

"Soldiers' Hotels" in London

MISS KATE HANSON, Hon. Supt. of Miss Daniell's Soldiers' Home at Aldershot, writes expressing a fear lest the appeal by Lady Hope in our last issue, for funds to erect a "hotel" in London for our returning soldiers, may be taken to imply that no such institution already exists. We imagine there is room for another, and therefore without disparaging Lady Hope's scheme we gladly give the following facts, feeling sure that our readers will not neglect old and tried institutions while aiding those that are new. Miss Hanson says:—"Such an 'hotel' for soldiers exists in Buckingham Gate, S.W., close to the Wellington Barracks, and within easy reach of Waterloo and Victoria Stations, and is well advertised throughout the Army. It was built by the late Miss Daniell in 1890, costing £7,209; and within the last few months £4,000 more has been paid for the freehold of the site; while for the second time the sleeping accommodation was increased at the cost of above £800.

"We now have fifty cubicles or single beds, three married quarters, an excellent refreshment bar, where the best refreshments can always be procured at the lowest prices, a coffee-room, reading-room, game and smoking-room, baggage-room, &c.

"The fact that during the first six months of this year the business receipts verged upon £1,000, shows the use made of the refreshment bar and beds. These have been occupied by men of practically every regiment and corps in the British Army, by Colonial and Indian troops, marines, bluejackets, &c., and by multitudes of men on their discharge.

"I might add that just lately another soldiers' 'hotel' has been opened within a few hundred yards of this very central situation."

Home of Industry.

A REAL "old time" workers' meeting took place on Wednesday evening last. The social hour soon passed in listening to the children's songs, and talking with missionaries from many climes, as well as those who are "pegging away" at home.

Many young men were absent, but why? They were busily engaged in their own Christian missions, some of them gathering the young and rising generation. One such I met with this week, the son of a honoured evangelist now in heaven. He has built a Mission Hall to hold 900 from his own means, and in a year they are crowded out, and a gallery is being added to hold another 500.

In the second hour of our meeting Mr. R. C. Morgan gave an address, and the third hour was profitably occupied by a C.I.M. missionary from Honan. A.McP.

Cambridge Notes.

[BY OUR CAMBRIDGE CORRESPONDENT.]

ANOTHER academic year has commenced, and about 800 freshmen have come up to Cambridge to start the most important period of their lives.

As usual the Inter-Collegiate Christian Union arranged a sermon for freshmen. This year it was preached by Rev. F. S. Webster. A very large congregation was present.

The University sermon on the same Sunday (October 14) was addressed mainly to freshmen. Dr. H. A. James, headmaster of Rugby School, was the preacher. His subject was "The Evils of Desultoriness."

The University Church Missionary Union held its first meeting of the season last Friday, when Rev. H. S. Phillips gave an address. The chair was taken by Rev. T. W. Drury in the absence of Professor Handley Moule.

Ridley Hall is very full this term. All the rooms in the college are occupied, and some students have, of necessity, to be in lodgings.

Rev. P. R. Allnutt has resigned the living of Holy Sepulchre, and Rev. W. P. Cromie, the senior curate of Barnwell, has been appointed to the important living of All Souls, Harlesden.

A series of monthly evangelistic services has been started at Zion Baptist Chapel. They are held on the first Sunday evening of each month.

About Books.

THE HASTINGS BIBLE DICTIONARY.*

STUDENTS have welcomed with much satisfaction the third volume of the Bible Dictionary, edited by Dr. James Hastings. The substantial sections of the work already issued afforded a good idea of what might be expected; and those who have looked for comprehensiveness of treatment and up-to-date precision on points of detail have not been disappointed. The plan of the work, as we have already intimated, is inclusive rather than exclusive; the aim is not so much to advocate special views, new or old, as to present facts and general conclusions. In many instances, as one speedily detects, contributors go beyond this, and advance theories. Sometimes the leaning is latitudinarian, and the result, dull and unprofitable; in other cases it is reserved and cautious, commanding high admiration.

The authors of articles in this volume make a goodly list. Among explorers and writers on Biblical archæology are: Dr. F. J. Bliss, Col. Conder, Drs. Selah Merrill and W. Flinders Petrie, Mr. T. G. Pinches, Dr. George Post, Professor W. M. Ramsay, Professor Sayce, and Sir Charles Warren. The best-known scholars in England and Scotland are well represented; while in the realm of theology considerable help is given by American and Continental writers. To sample the work is impossible. It must suffice to say that it is what it professes to be; and it is right to add that, while it is not specially conservative in standpoint, it is by no means generally the reverse.

Many of the articles in these volumes are as valuable as treatises, and in contents quite as substantial. Perhaps the most important piece of work in this division is Paul the Apostle by Professor G. G. Findlay. It comprises sixty-nine columns, admirably arranged, and as readable as a biography. Dr. A. Plummer writes on the Lord's Prayer and the Lord's Supper; Professor E. L. Curtis on the Old Testament; and Dr. J. A. McClymont on the New; the Old Testament Canon being discussed by Rev. F. H. Woods, and that of the New by Professor V. H. Stanton, each to the length of twenty-five columns. Among other notable and weighty contributions are: Mystery, by Principal A. Stewart; Music, by Rev. J. Millar; the Language of the Old Testament, by Professor Margoliouth, and that of the New by Professor J. H. Thayer; Palestine, by Colonel Conder; Medicine, by Professor Macalister; Marriage, by Professor W. P. Paterson; Mary, by Professor J. B. Mayor.

The various books of Holy Scripture are dealt with in detail, and the words that are distinctively associated with our English Bible are explained with an abundance of illustration by Dr. Hastings. The secondary (small type) sections of some of the articles are of great value; while the concluding paragraphs, giving particulars of the literature of the many subjects dealt with, cannot but prove of service to such as would follow up indications and prosecute research on their own account.

Rev. R. A. Torrey has compiled a little book which will prove of great service to Sunday school teachers. It is entitled The Gist of the Lessons, and gives a concise exposition of the International Sunday School Lessons for 1901. It is pocket size, admirably printed, and strongly bound. (1s. net. Nisbet & Co.)

We are glad to find that the "Grace Pettman" Penny Stories (published by Mr. Bateman, successor to Horner & Son) are well maintaining their moral tone, while at the same time being full of interest to the reader. There is a wide field of usefulness open to these Stories. Many who despise a tract may be reached by them. The latest are—A Flight for Freedom, and The End of a Feud (second edition). They are "bright, sound, healthy."

Canon Christopher writes a very instructive introduction to a volume of deeply interesting addresses by Rev. C. J. Casher, B.D., entitled Forgotten Heroes. (2s. net. C. J. Thynne.) The heroes are: Celio Secundo Curioni, the Italian Reformer of the sixteenth century; Aonio Paleario, the Christian scholar who suffered martyrdom at Rome in 1570; the Spanish Martyrs of the sixteenth Century; the Reformed Church in France during the eighteenth century; and the Waldensian Church of Northern Italy. About the work of these leaders and communities we all need to be put in remembrance. Mr. Casher rehearses noble stories in a sympathetic and impressive manner. His book should be in every Protestant library.

Welsh Notes.

THE annual Conference of the English Presbyterian Church of Wales was held on October 16, 17, 18, at Llandudno. The meetings were under the presidency of Alderman John Jones-Griffiths, of Penygraig, Glamorganshire, and were attended by a large number of delegates from all parts of the Principality. The programme of the Conference included devotional meetings as well as others for the discussion of theological and social rights. Amongst the most important of the proposals brought before the assembly was one for the founding of a Young People's Guild. The scheme was referred to the churches for consideration, and will be finally disposed of in the next Conference. The Conference sermons were preached by Revs. R. J. Rees, B.A., of Clifton Street Chapel, Cardiff, and W. Watson, M.A., Liverpool. Owing to the inability of Rev. John Thomas, of Liverpool, to accept the post of president for next year's Conference, the honour devolved upon Mr. J. R. Davies, of Menai Bridge.

Reference has been made in these columns to the agitation proceeding amongst Calvinistic Methodists for the abandonment of the old system of the itinerary and the adoption of a more stationary ministry. The advantages accruing from such a change would be many—amongst them being the obviating of the expense entailed by the old system. It is estimated that no less a sum than £8,000 is yearly spent by Calvinistic ministers in travelling distances of varying length to fulfil preaching engagements. With a stationary ministry a large proportion of this sum would be saved and would probably mean a welcome addition to the salaries of ministers—salaries which, in too many cases, hardly constitute a "living wage."

The National Thrift Society has commenced a six months' campaign in Wales. The work will be carried on in the important industrial centres. "Thrift Chats" are to be held amongst working men and women at the works where they are employed, and the literature of the Society distributed gratuitously. In connection with the movement there is a Ladies' Thrift League, the object of which is to distribute information upon domestic economy, sanitation, food reform, and the avoidance of waste.

On Tuesday last week, Dr. Fairbairn, Principal of Mansfield College, visited Bangor, and delivered an address to ministers and theological students. The address dealt with the importanee of hard study in order to proper equipment for the ministry. While this was emphasized it was pointed out that the all-essential was to learn Christ. The address was lofty in tone, and set a high standard for those whose lives were dedicated to the ministry.

Irish Notes.

BRANCHES of the Catholic Truth Society have been established in every parish of the united diocese of Waterford and Lismore, and it is now proposed that the Society shall issue for the use of the Irish-speaking population books of devotion and biography in the Irish tongue. It has been publicly suggested that the Bible should be one of the books so issued. There are, however, very few that can speak Irish now, and fewer still that can read it, and therefore, except as a curiosity, or as an act of superstition, it is not likely the books alluded to will have a very wide circulation.

The Local Government Board has refused to accede to the request of the Belfast Board of Guardians to appoint a Methodist chaplain for the Belfast Workhouse on the ground that they have only power to appoint Presbyterian, Episcopalian, and Roman Catholic chaplains. There are not usually very many Methodists in Belfast Workhouse, but it is thought that these have just as good a claim to be looked after by a minister of their own Church as have the members of the other Churches mentioned. The matter is exciting some attention, and can hardly be allowed to rest where it is.

Under the auspices of the Methodist Women's Temperance Union, Mrs. Palmer, of Iowa, U.S.A., has been addressing large meetings at Athy, Sligo, Dublin, and Belfast. Mrs. Palmer took part in the American Whisky War in 1874, and is an able and earnest speaker.

The annual council meeting of the Presbyterian Guild was held in Belfast last week under the presidency of Mr. Samuel McBride, and was largely attended. The number of societies connected with the Guild is much the same as last year, but there are several organizations connected with Presbyterianism that have not identified themselves with the Guild. It was said that the primary want of the Guild was a suitable building in which to assemble, and such as Presbyterian young men have in Dublin and Derry. Papers were read, or addresses delivered, by Revs. R. J. Porter, A. Gilchrist, and Mr. Henry Craig. The tone of the meeting was excellent, and the Guild is evidently fulfilling an important purpose.

The Churches.

Church of England.

On account of ill-health, Prebendary Whittington has resigned the office of rural dean of the East City deanery, in which he succeeded Dr. Povah early this year. The Bishop of London has appointed Prebendary Wace, rector of St. Michael, Cornhill, to be rural dean in his place.

The Bishop of London continues to make good progress. By his doctor's advice, he will not make any engagements to preach or to speak at any public meeting before the date fixed for his December ordination. Meanwhile he is able to carry on all his correspondence as usual, and to attend to the administrative business of the diocese.

The Bishop of Wakefield, speaking at the Missionary Exhibition at Leeds, said we are approaching a very great crisis in the history of missions—a crisis forced upon us by events in China. There is no doubt as to what the answer of every Christian must be to the question this crisis would suggest. Missions must go on. Methods may be improved—not by criticism, but by study.

Congregational.

The amalgamation of the Oxford Road and Union Churches at Putney was completed at a largely attended combined Church meeting. After the new roll had been read, Rev. A. Norman Rowland was unanimously elected minister of the united Church.

Rev. Thomas Grear has recently intimated to his congregation that he has declined a cordial invitation to another church, having decided to remain at Bishopsgate Chapel, E.C., where he celebrates the sixteenth anniversary of his settlement on October 28.

The work at the temporary church, which was opened last May at Viewland Road, Plumstead, continues to make rapid progress. Crowded congregations are the rule, and a much larger building is necessary. A large Sunday school and Band of Hope are already established.

Resignations.—Rev. T. Hafield, Edgworth, Bolton; Rev, A. A. Savage, Ingatestone.

Calls (accepted).—Mr. B. S. Franks, for the past three years assistant lecturer at Mansfield College, Oxford, to Prenton Road Church, Birkenhead; Rev. H. Dudley, West Marsh, Grimsby, to Kirkheaton, Huddersfield; Rev. Arthur Jarvis, of Haverhill, to Winchmore Hill, N.; Rev. H. B. Oddy, to Southminster.

Baptist.

A new church at Ballsall-heath, near Birmingham, has been opened. It has cost £5,000, half of which is in hand, and will accommodate 650 persons. Mr. W. Hougham performed the opening ceremony, Rev. J. G. Greenhough, M.A., preached the inaugural sermon, and Revs. S. Nield (pastor) and Dr. Carter also took part.

A cordial welcome has been given to Rev. Edward H. Brown (brother of Pastor Archibald G. Brown) on his entering upon the pastorate of Oaklands Chapel, Surbiton. Rev. E. W. Tarbox (association secretary), who has been called in to take official charge of the church as pastor pro tem. about a year ago, described what had been done during that time in paying off arrears, renovating the chapel and vestry, and consolidating the work, and warmly welcomed Mr. Brown back to the home counties.

At the services in connection with the fourth anniversary of Rev. D. H. Moore's settlement at Vernon Chapel, King's Cross Road, W.C., the Sunday morning service was conducted by Rev. C. B. Sawday, and in the evening by the pastor. On Monday afternoon a sermon was preached to a large congregation by Dr. A. T. Pierson. At the public meeting in the evening Mr. William Olney took the chair, and encouraging addresses were given to a large assembly by Revs. B. J. Gibbon, and others.

The second anniversary of Rev. G. D. Hooper's settlement at West Cliff, Tabernacle, Bournemouth, has been celebrated. Services were held on October 18. A sermon was preached by Rev. David Davies, of Brighton, in the afternoon, and several friends addressed the evening meeting. The sum of £276 was raised altogether towards the building fund, the debt now standing at about £1,450. It was reported that eighty-eight members have been added to the Church during Mr. Hooper's pastorate.

Resignations.—Rev. W. Burton, Minehead; Rev. J. H. Brooksbank, Workington; Rev. George Hider, Great Sampford.

Calls (accepted).—Rev. C. S. Hull, Tilehouse Street, Hitchin, to Arthur Street, Camberwell, S.E.; Mr. E. Jenkins, Pastors' College, to Chipping Norton; Rev. Charles Rignal, King Street Church, Oldham, to Grange Road Church, Birkenhead; Rev. G. Deighton, Ellington, Hunts, to the new chapel at Seaford, Sussex.

Methodist.

Twentieth Century Fund meetings continue to be held at important centres. Rev. Hugh Price Hughes has addressed large gatherings at Bolton and Nottingham. At both places considerable advances were made in the amounts promised.

The annual council of the Wesleyan London Mission Band Union has been held. Rev. W. D. Walters presided over a large gathering of representatives. The secretary reported that twelve months since there were only seven bands connected with the Union, and now there are twenty-nine. The special gatherings held on holidays have been spiritually fruitful.

Some of the recent District Foreign Missionary meetings of the Wesleyan body have been of an inspiring character. At Brunswick Chapel, Leeds, the building was crowded. The Student Volunteer Missionary Union lent large diagrams for exhibition round the gallery. A screen was suspended over the pulpit, and pictures were thrown upon it from a lime-light lantern. Dr. Thomas Allen, in a powerful address which gave great delight, traced the growth of missionary enterprise.

The Northern Counties' Wesleyan Sunday School Conference, held in Manchester, was largely attended, and many prominent ministers and Sunday school workers took part. In the course of an address of welcome, Rev. Dr. Randles said they had a common instrument—the Word of God, and a common source of strength—the Spirit of God. It would not be of great use to talk to their scholars about Christ unless they also talked much to Christ about their scholars. There are many disappointments, but the work is worth them all.

Presbyterian.

Rev. J. B. and Mrs. Meharry intended to leave New York by the ss. Lucania on the 20th inst., and should reach London on the 27th or 29th. A meeting of welcome is to be held by the Crouch Hill congregation on the 31st, and Mr. Meharry resumes his ministry on Sunday, November 4.

The annual festival of the Association of North London Choirs, of which Mr. Robert Wales is president, will be held on November 20 in St. John's Wood Church. Dr. John Watson is expected to preside, and addresses will be given by Dr. Gibson and Rev. James Christie.

Society of Friends.

The anniversary meeting of Severn Street and Priory First-day adult schools, Birmingham, has been held in the Town Hall. Upon the platform were W. A. Albright, Elsie M. Cadbury, John Hoyland, Henry Lloyd Wilson, Samuel Price, Wilfrid F. Southall, Walter Priestman, with many other friends and teachers. Walter Priestman emphasized the need of more aggressive action against evil.

In order to consider the subject of the education and Christian nurture of children, the monthly meeting of Darlington arranged a conference, which was recently held. The attendance was good, and the meeting was animated and interesting, there being many speakers. Papers were read by Jonathan B. Hodgkin on the duties of parents to train their children in the service of Christ, and by E. B. Backhouse on Christian nurture as a duty of the Church. Other Friends spoke on the need for Christian influence and example in the home life, and of prayerful training in spiritual things.

Fallen Asleep.

On August 15, at Victoria Nyanza, British East Africa, Rev. MARTIN JOHN HALL, C.M.S. Missionary, aged thirty-six.—Rev. G. F. C. HAMILTON, son of the Archdeacon of Northumberland, aged thirty.—Rev. SAMUEL PLANT, Prebendary of Lichfield, and for fifty-one years vicar of Weston-on-Trent, near Stafford, aged seventy-nine.—Mr. WILLIAM DAVISON, for many years an office-bearer in the Presbyterian Church, Morpeth.—The Hon. MRS. ELIOT, wife of the Dean of Windsor, and a Maid of Honour to the Queen.—Rev. JOHN MEDICRAFT, of Bursiem, an esteemed minister of the Methodist New Connexion.—At Caledon, co. Tyrone, Rev. Canon ARMSTRONG, for several years rector of the parish.—On Oct. 22, at Richmond, Miss CHARLOTTE HANBURY, whose decease closes an active life, full of self-denying toil in many departments of Christian work. She was especially known of late years in connection with efforts on behalf of native prisoners in Morocco.

The Y.W.C.A. in Ireland.

THE sixteenth annual Conference of the Y.W.C.A. was held in the Friends' Meeting House, Eustace Street, Dublin, on October 18 and 19. The early devotional meetings were presided over by Mrs. S. H. Smith, president; and Miss Bradshaw, who gave helpful addresses on studies in St. John's Gospel, and struck the keynote of the Conference by three thoughts: (1) Having learned his will, do it. (2) Having heard his voice, repeat it. (3) Having seen his face, reflect it.

Addresses on "Prayer Unions" and on "Fruit Bearing" were given by Lady Coote, and the needs of the World's Y.W.C.A. were pressed by the Hon. Mrs. Waller. Secretaries are required for Cairo, Gibraltar, and ten other foreign stations. We hope some offers of service or inquiries will be the outcome of her appeal.

Miss Scarborough taught a happy lesson on "How to Prepare for Bible Classes," while different aspects of Y.W.C.A. work were briefly treated by Miss Gregg (Limerick), Mrs. Fitz John Irwin, Miss Bush, Miss C. Maud Battersby, and others.

October 19 was our Missionary Day, and a large number of missionaries were present. Miss Codrington, the survivor of the Kuching massacre, urged China's claims. Miss Millet spoke eloquently on North Africa. Miss Watkin, Miss Darley, Miss Connor (Persia), and others joined in singing our familiar hymns in foreign tongues. All agreed that the interest awakened by the gathering was intense.

About eighty Y.W.C.A. workers met at the "Secretaries' Tea," a pleasant social feature of the Conference.

Hebrew Christian Prayer Union.

THIS organization held its third special Mission to the Jews during the Feast of Tabernacles in the Commercial Street Baptist Chapel. Jewish workers, representing the various missions and members of the Union, took part in this effort to influence the unreached ones. This new branching-out opened at the beginning of last June at the Feast of Weeks. Another effort was made among the Zionists, and then on the Day of Atonement. Each effort proved a blessing, not only to the work, gathering numbers of Jews under the sound of the Gospel, and stirring some into a spirit of inquiry, but also to the workers, who came together in unity to serve the Lord. Hebrew Christians desiring to unite in this work may communicate with the hon. sec., Henry Barnett, 94, Malmesbury Road, Bow, London, E.

SOCIETY FOR RELIEF OF PERSECUTED JEWS.

(Syrian Colonisation Fund.)

EMPLOYS SIXTY-EIGHT JEWS in various industries at Abraham's Vineyard, Jerusalem, and gives food, drinking-water, and clothes to sick and feeble who cannot work. Distress is very severe among the many hundreds who cannot get employment. Without proper food or water supply, and living in most wretched abodes, many of them underground, they suffer acutely from summer heat. Many come to the Vineyard and implore to be given work by which to live. We have room for more, if funds are provided for wages.

THE VICTORIA HOSPITAL for Sick Children

Patron:
H.R.H. THE PRINCESS LOUISE.
President:
THE RIGHT HON. THE EARL CADOGAN, K.G.

Is in immediate need of funds if its good work is to be continued, and the SUFFERINGS OF THE CHILDREN relieved. The Committee have been compelled to borrow £2000 to carry on the work during the year, and sufficient funds are not now coming in to meet the ordinary expenses.

THIRTY-ONE THOUSAND

Little Sufferers have occupied beds in the wards. Over ONE MILLION have received relief in the Outpatients' Dept. Nearly 600 are sent annually to the Convalescent Home at Broadstairs.

£8000 ANNUALLY

is required to maintain this charity.

£25,000

Is wanted for the necessary extension and improvements to provide sufficient accommodation for the needs of the 160,000 Children living in the S.W. District. No effort is spared in seeking to alleviate the Poor, Sick, Suffering Children. Subscriptions and Donations will be gratefully acknowledged by H. G. EVERED, Secretary, Victoria Hospital for Children, Queen's Road, Chelsea, S.W.

THE MISSIONS TO SEAMEN.

Vice-Patrons—
CAPTAIN H.R.H. THE DUKE OF YORK, R.N., K.G., and the FOUR ARCHBISHOPS.

Increased funds are urgently needed to meet the expenditure involved by the recent extensions of the operations of The Missions to Seamen to several ports abroad, where formerly the crews of British ships were destitute of religious ministrations.

Some 18,000 Merchant Seamen in the Transports to South Africa, "the Army Service Corps of the Sea," demand special spiritual care, for which a special £1,500 is required; besides £43,000 for the ordinary annual expenditure on religious ministrations to Seamen, Fishermen and Bargemen, at home and abroad.

The Society maintains 196 Chaplains, Readers, Boatmen, &c., working amongst the shipping and fishing vessels in 73 seaports in every part of the world.

Seventy Mission Steamers, Sailing Vessels, and Boats, and 94 Seamen's Churches and Institutes, are in daily use, winter and summer.

Expenditure in 1899—£42,514 15s. 2d.

Annual Subscriptions, Donations, Offertories, Drawing-Room Meeting Collections, &c., are earnestly asked for to maintain the existing sailor work, and to extend it to other ports. They should be sent to—

Evangelistic.

London Tent Campaign.

NOW that this work has almost closed, it is meet and right that praise and thanks be returned to God for the wonderful times of blessing that have been given throughout the past summer. Words fail to express the gracious power with which God has blessed the message to the souls of men; in all directions hundreds of men and women are testifying to the power of the Gospel in saving them. In many instances Churches are receiving some of the converts. The spirit of hearing has been great. In many instances whole families saved. In all, twenty-nine missions have been held. Thousands of names have been taken of professed converts. It is estimated that about a 1,250,000 people have heard the Gospel. Large numbers of children, too, have sought the Saviour.

Among the seekers at Wimbledon tent were some striking cases. Drunkards, atheists, and backsliders were brought in. At Clapham Road tent 201 names were taken, and all these were carefully followed up. At Church End, Willesden, the tent was well attended. Nearly eighty persons were brought to decision. Shepherd's Bush was the scene of a great reviving, and 300 or 400 people were dealt with or entered the inquiry room. G.

York Theatre Winter Mission.

The services in connection with this mission have commenced. At the first meeting the building was speedily filled in every part, and many were unable to obtain admission. Mr. Bob Johnson, after singing some of his original musical compositions, gave a sketch of his life as a negro minstrel. Mr. Johnson also told the story of his conversion, and of his subsequent experiences as an evangelist on Epsom racecourse.

Mr. Henry Thorne at Hornsey.

The Congregational Church at Crouch End, N., under the pastoral care of Rev. A. Rowland, has a large mission station at Blenheim Road. The friends working this station arranged a ten-days' mission, and obtained the services of Mr. Henry Thorne. The missioner, in addition to evangelistic addresses to the general public, gave Bible readings, and spoke at the mothers' meetings, and to the young people in the Sunday school. All the services were impressive. John Marsden.

Rev. J. McNeill in Londonderry.

Meetings in Londonderry, conducted by Rev. John McNeill, are proving very fruitful. At the first meeting, the evangelist spoke in the Union Hall, dwelling on Psa. xxiii. 3, 4. The latter verse called forth some telling illustrations, and the audience was at times deeply moved. In the evening, in First Derry Church, Mr. McNeill preached from Gal. v. 14. It was a solemn meeting, and eternal things were very clear to the eye of faith. The church was crowded.

Mr. W. R. Lane at Newbury.

The recent mission at Newbury, conducted by Mr. W. R. Lane, under the auspices of the local Free Church Council, attracted large numbers to hear the Gospel. The meetings grew in solemnity as the week went by. There was no sensationalism, but a stillness that could be felt, a solemn appeal for decision and surrender. There were quiet talks in which perplexity changed to insight, and hesitation passed into decision, and the joy of the new hope shone through struggling tears. On the closing night the names of sixty-one were taken as having received a blessing during the mission. An open-air mission was also carried on each night, together with an organized visitation, and the holding of Bible Readings. C.

Mr. Josiah Nix at Burslem

A ten days' mission at Burslem, conducted by Mr. Josiah Nix, came to a conclusion on Monday, October 8. From the first evening the congregations steadily grew. On the early closing day an "At Home" was held for the assistants in the shops of the town; over eighty were present, and seventy of the company signed the temperance pledge. Thursday night was also election night, and between the evening service and the declaration of the poll, Mr. Nix held a lantern service in the chapel yard. Sunday was a great day at all the services, and the concluding meeting on Monday evening will be long remembered. During the mission more than 500 persons took the temperance pledge, and over 400 entered the inquiry room.

Mission to London Blind.

Under the auspices of the Indigent Blind Visiting Society, a mission for the London Blind and their guides has been organized on a large scale. The blind of London form a proportion of one per thousand of the general population; and therefore, are a very numerous community. Many of these are Christian men and women in the true sense of the word. The mission is intended to encourage and help such, but more particularly to reach with the Gospel those who, though so sadly afflicted, do not know the joy and peace which comes through faith in the Lord Jesus Christ.

The meetings will be held at various centres, and will be conducted by ministers of several denominations. Names and addresses of blind persons resident in London will be thankfully received by W. Mead, superintendent of the Indigent Blind Visiting Society, 95, Gurney Road, Stratford, E.

Requests for Prayer.

Scott's Emulsion Cured this Little Boy,

But he should have taken this remedy much sooner than he did.

ARTHUR WILLIAM LACEY.
(From a Photograph.)

7a, Franche Court Road, Earlsfield,
London, S.W., April 27th, 1900.

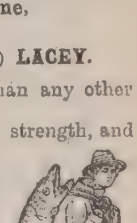
Dear Sirs,—I am very pleased to be able to tell you of the happy results of my experience with Scott's Emulsion for my little son who had a serious attack of pneumonia about two years ago. This was followed by measles and whooping cough, and we were told that we should not be able to rear him. After a time he commenced to improve, but was never the same child as before his illness. About every three or four weeks he became so hot that anyone would have thought he had scarlet fever. His temperature varied considerably: it has reached 104½°, and in less than half-an-hour it has gone down to 90°. He would then be languid and pale and quite lose his appetite for weeks, and then he would again pick up a bit for a time, but never made any particular progress. We tried everything we could for him, but nothing did him good for any length of time. At last, as a last resort, I gave him Scott's Emulsion, and to your splendid remedy I feel I owe my boy's life From the commencement of this treatment he began to improve, and to-day he is a strong and healthy boy with a splendid appetite, and eats everything I give him. The bloom of health is on his cheeks, and he goes to school with the other children. I cannot tell you how grateful I am or all that Scott's Emulsion has done for my child, and send you this letter as a slight acknowledgment. In gratitude, believe me,

Very sincerely yours,
(Signed) (Mrs.) LACEY.

It is a great mistake for anybody to think that because Scott's Emulsion contains cod-liver oil it should only be used as a last resort. When cod-liver oil had to be taken in its ordinary form its taste and the difficulty many had in digesting it seemed rather to put it in the light of a "last-resort" remedy. In Scott's Emulsion, however, the taste of cod-liver oil is completely disguised, and its perfectly emulsified form makes it of no tax whatever upon the stomach. Scott's Emulsion has therefore given to cod-liver oil its greatest value by placing it within the reach of everybody—young and old alike.

In addition to cod-liver oil, Scott's Emulsion contains the hypophosphites of lime and soda, and glycerine, which add greatly to its value as a medicinal agent. Children love the taste of Scott's Emulsion and adults take it readily. In serious diseases, like consumption and scrofula, Scott's Emulsion can be taken continuously for a long period, without in any way impairing digestion. This remedy is better adapted to the needs of a wasting or emaciated system than any other preparation offered to the public.

Children gain appetite, flesh, and strength, and are transformed into perfect pictures of health by Scott's Emulsion, when no other remedy or no other form of cod-liver oil will do them any good. Scott's Emulsion differs from all other forms of cod-liver oil, being made from a special formula and by a special process. You cannot form any adequate idea of the possibilities of cod-liver oil until you have tried the genuine Scott's Emulsion, which may be distinguished by our trade mark, which is on the wrapper of every genuine bottle.



TRADE MARK

A sample of Scott's Emulsion will be sent to any address in Great Britain upon receipt of threepence to cover postage, and mentioning the name of this paper. Applications for samples should be sent to Scott and Bowne, Limited, 95, Great Saffron Hill, London, E.C.

Obituary.

MR. LIVESEY CARROTT.

The death of Mr. Livesey Carrott, organist of St. Mary's, Bayswater, at the early age of thirty-seven, removes not only a talented musician and composer but an ardent church worker. He was a whole-hearted evangelist, never so happy as when teaching a Bible-class or giving a Gospel address. Mr. Carrott believed most thoroughly in congregational worship, and endeavoured to make the service of praise as hearty as possible; both at St. James', Holloway, and at St. Matthew's, Bayswater, he was eminently successful in this direction. The C.M.S. often requisitioned his services, both at Exeter Hall and at the Albert Hall, and he has also compiled several services of song upon missionary subjects. He frequently trained the choir for the Y.W.C.A. It will be remembered that he presided at the organ on the occasion of Mr. Sankey's recent reception at Exeter Hall. The cause of death was the rupture of a blood-vessel on the brain, the result of overwork.

REV. CHAS. GARRETT.

People of all denominations will mourn the loss by death of the veteran Methodist, Rev. Charles Garrett. Few personalities in the religious world commanded more regard than he, who throughout a prolonged career was never weary in well-doing. In the course of his ministerial career he travelled many circuits of the kingdom. In 1882 the Conference marked the high esteem in which they held Mr. Garrett, by electing him to the presidential chair. For some years he was chairman of the Liverpool district, and it was, of course, in the great city on the Mersey that he formed and carried on for so long and with such sustained vigour the remarkable mission with which his name has become so intimately associated. Many religious undertakings owe much to his energy, kindliness of heart, and devotion to the interests of the Kingdom, and his work had earned deserved encomiums from all sections of the community. Mr. Garrett, was nearly seventy-seven years of age. We hope to give a portrait and sketch of this esteemed minister in an early issue.

Personalia.

Mr. George Robert Cairns, the well-known evangelist, sails on Saturday by ss. Tunisian for Montreal.

Our London readers will be interested to know that Rev. W. Hay Aitken commences an evangelistic mission at St. John's, Hoxton, on Sunday, November 4.

Rev. Ernest Bulstrode Pryce, B.A., late of St. Paul's, St. Heliers, Jersey, has been appointed one of the association secretaries of the Religious Tract Society, to work in the north of England.

Mr. S. E. Burrow has resigned his position as Secretary of the Theatrical Mission, and will be free to enter upon other and more directly evangelistic work with the New Year. His address is, Trevone, Merton Hall Road, Wimbledon.

We regret to hear that it is necessary for Surg.-Gen. Partridge to undergo another operation, for cancer of the jaw. It is the only hope of getting rid of the disease even for a time. Our esteemed friend writes:—"I am so thankful for the way I have been enabled to rejoice in the Lord up to the present time. He will never leave me nor forsake me. I should like to ask the prayers of your readers for continuance of perfect submission and joy in the Lord, whatever may be his will concerning me."

Rev. Thomas Connellan is at present in this country preaching and lecturing in various large towns in Lancashire and the Midlands. On Sunday, October 14, he preached in two churches in Bolton to crowded congregations. On Monday night he lectured in the Temperance Hall on "Why I left the Roman Church," and although the evening was very inclement there about 3,000 people present. When in Bolton some years since Canon Wood (himself a 'vert from the Church of England) libelled Mr. Connellan in the local papers, but when threatened with a writ, apologised and paid the costs. There were many Roman Catholics present on the night of the 15th, but they were most interested listeners. Two converts from Mr. Connellan's previous meetings are well known and esteemed in Bolton. Mr. Connellan will be about three weeks in England.

New and Recent Books,

For Preachers, Teachers, Evangelists, Bible Students, Christian Workers, and others.

In view of the coming winter, the question, "What shall we read?" assumes greater importance than in the long summer days when out-door activities engross a large share of time and attention. A few words, therefore, about some recently published books will not be out of place.

Notwithstanding the counter influence of South African affairs, India has bulked largely in the public eye, on account of the lamentable famine which has devastated so large a part of that great country; a work* dealing with one of the most remarkable women in India to-day is therefore peculiarly appropriate, and should be read by all interested in the religious and social welfare of that vast empire. Pandita Ramabai's work among the 23,000,000 of Hindu widows has long been familiar to readers of The Christian, but in this volume we have, for the first time, a concise yet detailed account of her life-story, which is of thrilling interest. The illustrations, of which there are over thirty, add much to the interest of the book.

The presence of Mr. Sankey in this country has revived many memories of the late Mr. D. L. Moody, and carried the thoughts of our readers, in all parts of the United Kingdom, back to the days when this "Saint and Hero," as Rev. Mark Guy Pearse calls him, was in our midst. There have been published both here and in America several unauthorized biographies, giving only a slight and imperfect view of the great evangelist, as they have been written, or compiled, without any access to the private family records which naturally were at the disposal of Mr. W. R. Moody in writing the "Official Authorized Life."† Over 100 illustrations, many of them copyright portraits, enrich this volume, and make it, as one reviewer said, "The standard life of the greatest evangelist of the nineteenth century." It is a work which should find a place on the bookshelves of every Christian and teacher in the kingdom. An excellent suggestion is made in the review, from which we have just quoted, viz., that there may be those who could present copies to S.S. Teachers and other Christian workers as a stimulus to their zeal. We know of cases where this has been done, and one minister who was presented with a copy by his Christian Endeavour Society, wrote, "A more suitable work could not have been given me."

Mr. Moody wrote many books which have been of untold benefit to Christian workers in all lands. Sixteen of these volumes are published as the "D. L. Moody" Library, and form a handsome presentation set. Smaller "Libraries" can also be had.‡

Another helpful writer is Rev. F. B. Meyer, who is so well known to our readers that an introduction is superfluous. But we may call attention to his latest Scripture biography, "John the Baptist," which forms a companion volume to his previous works on Abraham, Israel, Joseph, Moses, Joshua, David, Elijah, Jeremiah, and Paul.

The most recent volume of Mr. Meyer's Expository Series is "The Prophet of Hope."* It was published at the close of his year of office as President of the British C.E. Societies, and was appropriately dedicated to the Christian Endeavourers. There is a dual aspect to all these works, which is well emphasized by a writer in the Primitive Methodist, who says, "The expositions of Mr. Meyer invariably have two elements of value, one of them an advantage to the preacher who needs help in his studies of the Word, and the other to the pious person who reads them for devotional purposes."

Mr. Meyer's works can also be had in "Libraries," viz., Biographical, Expository, and Devotional. The "Complete F. B. Meyer" Library consists of twenty-two volumes enclosed in a handsome oak cabinet. There are four styles ranging from 37s. 6d. nett to 52s. 6d. nett. These are admirably suited for presentation.

With the near approach of Christmas, our thoughts naturally turn to the question of gift-books; eminently suitable for this purpose is "A Losing Game, and Other Readings,"† which forms the annual volume of The Herald of Mercy and The Revival. We have referred before to the late Mr. Spurgeon's dictum regarding a previous volume of this series, that "it ought to be given away by thousands." So many Christian friends year by year purchase this Annual for distribution in Soldiers' and Sailors' Homes, Hospitals, Workhouses, Factories, &c., that we repeat Mr. Spurgeon's suggestion for the benefit of new readers who may wish to act upon it.

An Evangelistic Hymn Book for one halfpenny is a wonderful production, even in these days of cheap printing. This one‡ has been prepared to supply a need which was not sufficiently met by hymnsheets or leaflets. Here we have a book compiled from "Sacred Songs and Solos," and containing 157 hymns and choruses which have proved their efficiency in Gospel effort. It can be supplied in quantities of 100 for 3s. (postage, 5d. extra), and for brief missions or for open-air meetings it cannot be surpassed. An evangelist writes, that it is "Just what is wanted."

Since the days, now more than a quarter of a century ago, when Mr. Sankey first began in this country to sing "Sacred Songs and Solos," their popularity has continuously grown, and to-day they are known and sung all over the world. On the battlefield in South Africa, and by the trenches where they bury the dead, these Hymns have been heard, making Boer and Briton kin; and the story has already been told in The Christian of Lord Roberts' expression of pleasure when he found they were using "Moody and Sankey's Hymnbook" in the tents of the Soldiers' Christian Association. There are over forty editions of the "750" book, ranging from 1d. (Words only) to 25s. for the Handsome Quarto Edition for use at the Organ or Piano. Including the New Hymns and Solos, the Christian Choir, and the various combined books, there are upwards of 150 different sizes and styles of binding. Full list of prices, with specimens of type, etc., can be obtained post free from Messrs. Morgan and Scott, Office of The Christian, 12, Paternoster Buildings, E.C.

* Pandita Ramabai. The Story of her Life and Work. By Helen S. Dyer. Crown 4to. Cloth boards, 3s. 6d.; Bevelled boards, gilt edges, 4s. 6d. (Morgan & Scott, and of all Booksellers.)

† The Official Authorized Life of Dwight L. Moody, by his son, W. R. Moody. A first-hand Memoir of Mr. Moody, embracing much information which is exclusively in the possession of the family. 592 pages, Super Royal 8vo. Cloth boards, 10s. 6d.; Bevelled boards, gilt edges, 12s. 6d.

‡ Works by the late D. L. Moody. Full particulars of these in Libraries, or in separate form, can be obtained of the Publishers, Morgan & Scott, Office of The Christian.

Notes & Comments

IN reply to a donor, we beg to say that the full amounts entrusted to us are remitted, without deduction of any kind, to the Missions or Societies designated by the donors.

Owing to the demand of the Evangelical Alliance Conference upon our space this week, we are compelled to hold over a number of matters of current and general interest.

The election of Borough Councillors for London, to-day (Thursday), will in a peculiar sense be "for better or worse." The future social condition of the five millions of inhabitants of the metropolis will all depend upon the character of the men they choose. "Men with axes to grind must be kept out"—this in a sentence describes the duty of the citizen-electors in view of the scandals of the past. And some of the "axes" are pretty foul and rusty, too.

Many of the candidates are publicans; others are agents for property devoted to immoral uses, to say nothing of representatives of sundry other forms of vested interests. A solemn obligation rests upon every Christian and right-minded elector to take pains to ascertain the kind of men for whom he is asked to vote, and to vote for men whose hands are clean, regardless of creed or party.

The address delivered recently by Rev. William Crosbie, of Nottingham, at the Dublin Christian Convention, has been published in pamphlet form, with the title A Call to United Prayer. True to their title, the pages convey a message which has never been untimely, but is especially opportune now that we are entering the new century. To Christians individually, and churches and societies, Mr. Crosbie addresses loving arguments; and praying people who have realized in some measure the blessedness of united intercession would do well to assist in circulating his heart-stirring appeal. (2d. Dublin: Hodges, Figgis, & Co.; London: Hodder & Stoughton.)

Christian subjects of the Queen will weep with her in her present sorrow. It was on the day of the reception to the City Imperial Volunteers that Her Majesty received from Lord Roberts the intelligence that her beloved grandson, Prince Christian Victor of Schleswig-Holstein, had succumbed to the attack of malarial and enteric fever from which he had been suffering since October 10. In communicating the intelligence, the Queen says how deeply she mourns the loss of so dear a grandson and an officer of great promise. She suffers doubly in the grief of his afflicted parents and family, who were so devoted to him. The Prince, who was in his thirty-fourth year, was universally loved and respected.

The late Charles Garrett, whose death we chronicled last week, was a man of great natural ability and shrewdness, but his unique power over men was not intellectual so much as moral. He was a great soul-winner, and it was the man's heart on fire with the love of Christ that spake to the people. Behind his words there was the man yearning for the salvation of his hearers.

The secret of such a man should be treasured by all who are seeking to win souls. The nearest way to a man's will is through his heart, rather than through his intellect. The latter must be considered, and the preached word should never outrage the mind; but it still remains true as Pascal said, "The heart has its reasons of which the reason knows nothing." Logic is a grand weapon, but love is the grandest weapon of all in the Christian's armoury.

Her Majesty the Queen has graciously signified her acceptance of a copy of Mrs. H. S. Dyer's volume, "Pandita Ramabai—the Story of her Life and Work."

The Secretary of State for India has received a telegram from the Viceroy on the subject of the famine, where it is stated that the total number of persons in receipt of relief is now 1,422,000. In the Punjab relief has been discontinued. The Secretary of State has also received the following telegram from the Governor of Bombay:

Following are figures for week ending October 20: Famine-stricken districts: 107 cases of cholera, of which 76 were fatal. Total number of deaths among number on relief works and gratuitous relief, 1,312, or 2 3-5 per mille. Moderate rain doing appreciable good has fallen in Karnatak; elsewhere good fall of rain urgently wanted.

Speaking in the Viceregal Council on the 19th ultimo, Lord Curzon expressed his fears that 500,000 deaths in British India might be attributed to famine conditions, and the loss to the crops might be set down as £50,000,000, although the scale of alms-giving had been unprecedented. The Governor General paid a very high tribute to the noble efforts of the missionary agencies, the numerous cases of native chivalry, and the devotion on the part of Englishmen who died at their posts without a murmur.

Unfortunately, however, we cannot close our eyes to the many shortcomings, the greatest of which doubtless was that of the failure of Home Administration to grant prompt and commensurate funds, instead of ignobly leaving the matter so much to private benevolence, without which indeed Lord Curzon would have had a very much more painful story to tell.

The organ of "The Trade," as its devotees delight to call it, is exultant at the results of the late General Election. In the current issue of the Licensing World there are two articles, in both of which the return of a Conservative Government is hailed as a victory for the liquor traffic.

We rejoice in this result, both as patriots and traders—two words which are really synonymous. So long as Lord Salisbury continues to be Prime Minister the trade is practically safe. (They) may, therefore, look forward to another peaceable possession of their means of livelihood.

Elsewhere, in the same paper, the election result is declared to be "The nation's verdict" on behalf of the trade. What a perversion of facts! The nation was not approached on the subject. The sole issue put before the country was khaki.

A number of excellent suggestions were made at the meeting held at the United Service Institution for the purpose of counteracting inebriety among women. The Charity Organization Society was the prime mover in the affair, and Dr. W. J. Collins, Chairman of the Inebriates Act Committee of the London County Council, presided. All the measures proposed would, however, require a great deal of legislation before they could be put into force. Dr. Heywood Smith was particularly drastic in his suggestion for bringing pressure to bear upon the Government to bring in a short bill to cancel all grocers' licences. The remaining measures contemplated were almost equally hard and fast, and would no doubt affect "the liberty of the subject." But ought not the well-being of the community (which incidently benefits the individual also) to be considered first?

It appears from a recently-issued Parliamentary paper that, whereas only two male habitual drunkards were convicted during 1899 under the Inebriates Act, ninety females were, eighty-eight of the latter having been received into Homes. The figures seem but small in comparison with the amount of drunkenness which is seen upon every hand, and perhaps the remarkable discrepancy between the numbers of the male and female offenders may fairly be attributed to the action of the magistrates, who are accustomed to deal leniently with the far too familiar male drunkard, and fail to put the Inebriates Act into operation so far as he is concerned.

The utterance of the Bishop of Liverpool at the recent Diocesan Conference can leave no doubt in the minds of the clergy as to his attitude and action in regard to the present crisis in the Establishment. Proclaiming his adherence to Evangelical principles, which were his "by inheritance and education, by conviction and experience," he recognized that the Church of England had given a wise liberty of thought as to some mysterious truths, but the limit of his toleration was bounded by the Lambeth judgment, and the Archbishops' decision respecting lights, incense, and reservation.

Where they were ignored and disobeyed, I can neither preach, confirm, license any assistant clergy, nor lend countenance or support, direct or indirect. A lawlessness which set up a Church authority of its own, which on the one side refused to obey in spiritual matters a secular court because it was secular, and on the other side a spiritual court because it was not constituted according to its own liking, or because its decisions did not coincide with the laws of a "Catholic Church," which it was most difficult to define, and still more difficult to discover, not only brought about confusion, but lowered throughout the community that respect for the majesty of law and authority without which no Church and no Commonwealth could possibly hold good. A lawless Church would soon lead to a lawless State, and the swift Nemesis of lawlessness was ruin.

Canon Newbolt, preaching at St. Paul's recently, stated as his opinion that the English people are fast coming to disbelieve in three things which formerly they had firm faith in, "Sunday, the Bible, and hearing sermons." As regards the first, there is only too much ground for the statement. As to the last, where Christ is preached in sincerity and truth, there people still will flock to hear the message of salvation; but they will not listen to Christless platitudes which, as Spurgeon once said, "would not convert a fly."

The demand for the Word of God never was greater, and a daily contemporary recently gave nearly a column of evidence to show how hugely the circulation continues to increase of that Book "on which so much of that which is best and highest in the national and individual life has been reared." As a matter of fact, not only has the British and Foreign Bible Society to report a huge increase in their sales, but the Oxford and Cambridge Presses and the American Bible Societies have the same condition of things to announce, their output this year having been unprecedented. Whether it is proportionately read is another matter.

Dr. Westcott, who is always erudite and scholarly, paid a noteworthy tribute in his Durham Cathedral Charge to that great Evangelical Revival, which spread through England last century at the period when the popular ideals of faith and worship had sunk to the lowest possible ebb. He said:

But forces were silently at work which revealed themselves in the Evangelical Revival within and outside the Church. Theology was brought from the schools into the market-place. Men learned to turn to God, not as an abstraction, but as a living and speaking Lord. The Gospel was vindicated by personal experience. But to the last the movement was essentially individualistic and subjective. It kindled in unnumbered hearts a fresh sense of responsibility and an ardent love of souls. It disciplined hosts of saintly men and women. It gave voice to confession, prayer, praise, thanksgiving in passionate hymns. It did something to purify social habits and to awaken the national conscience.

Had the Bishop stopped here it would doubtless have been better; for no serious student of that great life-giving movement can agree with him that the great defect of the revival was its want of sympathy with the past, and its failure to realize the thought of a Catholic society, so that it was necessary for the Oxford Movement to endeavour to supply what was wanting. On the contrary, it was because preachers and hearers alike went back far enough into the past to come into personal touch with Jesus that the Revival swept like a huge wave over these islands, carrying the peace and rest of salvation to myriads of weary souls. It was not necessary to go beyond Christ; to have stopped at Mediævalism, as the Tractarian Movement did, would have been to check and to strangle the spreading life.

Dealing with the question of the present position of affairs in the Establishment, the Monthly Review says:

The cry for spiritual autonomy is a just and a righteous cry, and it will no doubt be satisfied, but not in the form the Mediævalists expect. The whole body of the laity, both men and women, will have a full share in Church government to the complete suppression of every remnant of sacerdotal pretension . . . and the divinely predicted priesthood of the laity, which is the only priesthood spoken of in the New Testament, will rejoice in its power and strength.

Referring to the proposed amendment of Convocation, the Church Review, however, speaks openly in favour of the power of the priest:—"In the Catholic Church it is for the clergy to teach and for the people to obey," and urges that the admission of the laity would be "revolutionary."

The figures recently published by Mr. Howard Evans referring to the decline in Sunday schools have been since tested by the authorities of the Sunday School Union, and have been found substantially correct. This constitutes a pressing problem for all who are concerned with the training of the young, and especially for Nonconformists, who oppose the Episcopalian plea for denominational teaching in the day schools. We cannot help thinking that the imperative responsibility devolving on the Churches, to see that every child is, so far as possible, trained in the knowledge of God, and in the essentials of Bible truth, is not adequately faced by Free Churchmen. Unless they retain their hold upon the young, they will soon cease to have a place in the national life, or to weave into it the principles of Evangelical truth on which this people has fed for generations, and which are the very pulse of its higher and better life.

The suppression of street betting is one of the most difficult problems of municipal government, as was clearly proved in the discussion of the subject at the autumn general meeting of the Association of Municipal Corporations at the Westminster Palace Hotel. Some of the representatives wanted a reform of the law to the extent of giving power to the police to take into custody, without warrant, persons using a street for the purpose of betting. Others thought this too drastic and perilous a measure; but all agreed that the law, as at present, is quite inadequate. The town clerk of Nelson, however, said that by enforcing the full penalties they had succeeded in stopping street betting in that town. It is clear that the next best thing to a reform in the law is the proper and vigorous application of it as it stands; and it would be well for all interested in the suppression of this growing evil to study which can be done, and how best to do it, according to existing regulations.

Much of the alleged antagonism between science and religion is due to what Sir David Brewster has defined as "the abuse of conjecture." The scientist has gone far beyond the domain of positive science, and the preacher outside that which has been revealed. In his Cambridge address, Mr. Balfour expressed an opinion that in the next century there will be no such conflict between the results of physical science and man's spiritual aspirations; but we fear peace would be dearly purchased if it were obtained only by the dominance of materialism. Mr. Balfour, with his "Philosophic Doubt," takes his stand upon physics, and, fascinating as his disquisitions may be, he yet lacks something which would enable him to put vital warmth into them. The poor labourer who receives the message of salvation from a street preacher has a deeper knowledge of that which infinitely transcends man and his surroundings.

Another annual manifesto by leading Agnostics forcibly recalls our Lord's words: "If the light that is in you be darkness, how great is that darkness." Each of the dozen writers who contribute articles find no place for God in the world. "The world is a soulless world looked down upon by a Godless heaven." Matter and force account for everything, and "there is no room for speculation about a designer or a controller." Biological science, it is alleged, has dispensed with all need for a Lord God. We note again and again that the late Professor Huxley's name is quoted with approval, and one might imagine that he had belonged to the materialistic party. It would have been more honest, we think, had those who shelter themselves under his name quoted the suggestive words spoken by him before the Cambridge Young Men's Christian Association in 1870, when he said (we transcribe from his own "Lay Sermons"):—

But when the materialists stray beyond the borders of their path, and begin to talk about there being nothing else in the universe but matter and force and necessary laws, and all the rest of their "grenadiers," I decline to follow them.

It is, however, when the writers try to account for the human moral faculty, that we see how terribly they have perverted the light of facts into the dense darkness of unscientific speculation. The presence of the moral sense in men has always been the bete noire of Materialists. The grandest thinkers of all ages have recognized the moral sense as being alone derived from God, author of all morality. There can be no other explanation of the fact, for this alone entirely meets the whole case. The last Agnostic manifesto, however, sees in morality nothing but the outcome of given quantities, sorts, and states of nerve. . . . "If our neighbour's moral nerve is inadequate—is, in fact abnormal—he ceases to be our neighbour. . . . He finds his proper neighbours in the criminal or abnormal class."

We have always contended that the natural result of materialism is not only to divorce men from God, but also to divorce them from each other. Now we have their own admission of the fact.

The fact that a Nonconformist alderman, who was a few weeks ago unanimously nominated for the mayoralty of Eastbourne, has been obliged to withdraw his name before the election because he stated his intention (1) to give a teetotal inaugural banquet, and (2) to make his first official attendance at public worship after his election at a Congregational church, does not redound to the dignity or honour of the corporation of that town. It is disgraceful that a man who has served his fellow citizens for many years should be debarred from an honourable reward because he happens to be a conscientious teetotaler and a Dissenter and insists on being faithful to his convictions. Probably, at a time when the drink interest is so dominant in political and municipal life, the first-mentioned reason is the greater of the two objections. Bigotry and intolerance are not dead, but only sleeping, and this is a painful evidence of the fact.

A recent French writer, in the course of a most luminous contribution upon the subject of the preparation for the Messiah in history, sums up the whole matter in the following terse manner:—

So all the ages speak to us of the Messiah. One sublime philosophy of history. Summed up for us in three words: All for Christ. Christ for man. Man for God.

Studied in the light of this admirable summary, human history is seen to be a unity within which God is ever working. If men would only examine the story of their past from this true point of view, they would be compelled to adore the manifold wisdom of God, and consequently they would be delivered from the abyss of speculation and error into which so many are always falling.

Very dreadful sidelights are thrown in the medical papers occasionally upon the practice of vivisection. The British Medical Journal recently had something to say in regard to the functions of the brain, and the connection between those of the cerebellum and the organs of sight, and went on to remark:

This seems clear from the fact that dogs, first rendered blind and then deprived of their cerebellum were unable to maintain their equilibrium sixty-three days after . . . while dogs with visual power intact recovered their equilibrium nine or ten days after the removal of the cerebellum.

Comment upon such cruelty as that pointed to is unnecessary, and we fear it would be a hopeless task to reach the hearts of the unfeeling persons who can conduct such experiments upon God's creatures.

The Evangelical Alliance.

THE Evangelical Alliance celebrated last week its fifty-fourth anniversary by a Conference at Liverpool. The reception on Wednesday evening drew together from 1,500 to 2,000 representatives of the Evangelicals of that important city, under the presidency of Bishop Chavasse, the worthy successor of the (world-famous faithful Evangelical, Bishop Ryle. His lordship's address was distinctly Protestant and Evangelical, and all the speakers who followed were heartily in sympathy with it.

The attendance, from the wet weather and other causes, was not so large on the other days as it might have been, but the earnest and devout character of the early prayer meetings gave a tone, an influence, a power, to the whole conference.

The Evangelical Alliance has done excellent service during the fifty-four years of its existence, both at home and abroad. It has steadfastly upheld the Gospel of Christ, which is the power of God unto salvation to everyone that believeth, unaffected by Ritualism on the one hand, and Rationalism on the other. And it has in an earnest but conciliatory way pleaded for religious liberty for persecuted and oppressed brethren in other lands.

The trend of late years towards Romanism in the Established Church, and towards a Unitarian scepticism in the Unestablished Churches, has drawn away the support of many from the Evangelical Alliance, who, from their traditions and associations, might have been expected to be its warm supporters.

If ever such an organization was needed it is needed now, and, if needed, it should be earnestly sustained by all who love the Gospel.

But it may be asked, wherein lies the great need of such an Alliance? We reply that union is strength, and while anti-Evangelical and anti-Protestant societies, like the E.C.U., are actively propagandist, it behoves those who uphold the truth of the Gospel to unite in prayer and effort for Christian liberty from sacramental superstition and sacerdotal tyranny. The tendency to substitute humanitarianism for Godliness, to explain away the evil influence and even the existence of the old serpent, the Devil, and Satan, to tone down the sinfulness and the penalty of sin, and consequently to depreciate the precious blood of Christ, and its expiatory and propitiatory efficacy, form another claim of the Alliance upon all Evangelical Christians, to go out as Jonathan went out to David "in the wood, and strengthened his hands in God."

Old-Age Pensions.

ONE of the great problems that will have to be faced by the nation in the immediate future is that of Old-Age Pensions. Schemes of a partial and ameliorative kind have been from time to time proposed, but there is a steadily rising opinion among all classes that this question can only be settled on a national scale, and by a universal effort.

It is a standing disgrace that well-nigh a third of the population of this wealthy country should be in such a condition of poverty after sixty-five, that they are in receipt or in need of in-door or out-door relief. Partly, this is due, of course, to improvidence, but, making due deductions for the results of thriftlessness and drink, a large proportion have come to that state through causes beyond their own control. The great thrift organizations deal with a considerable percentage of the population, but in the nature of the case they leave large numbers outside their benefits, and are confined almost entirely to the wage-earning sex.

The scheme devised by Mr. Chas. Booth, the great authority on the social statistics of London, is the only one that meets the situation on a sufficiently large scale. It provides for a pension of 5s. a week to every citizen above sixty-five, without distinction of class, it being optional, of course, whether it be claimed or not. The time has surely come when it is highly desirable that the religious public should take their share in its settlement. Already there are many clergymen, ministers, and thoughtful church members who have pledged their advocacy and influence on behalf of the principle embodied in the scheme. Prominent among these is the Archbishop of Canterbury, whose early training has given an abundant knowledge of and sympathy with the

CONDITIONS AND BURDENS OF THE POOR.

There are, of course, many difficulties to be faced in attempting to grapple with a problem of so large and complicated a nature. The question of cost is the most obvious. It will impose upon the nation an additional burden of taxation amounting to about £13,000,000 a year at the lowest. It will take a long time to persuade the electors as well as the financiers of the country to venture on such an outlay.

Another question is whether it is possible or wise to provide pensions to all as a civil right, without distinguishing between the undeserving and the worthy. As the Archbishop said, however, in a speech on the subject, the difficulty of distinguishing between the deserving and others is too great for anyone to hope to solve it; it must be for all or none, if the scheme is to be started at all. At any rate, this is one of the questions on which all should concentrate sympathetic attention just now, in the hope that sooner or later a solution may be found to a crying evil.

The Coming Revival.

(Isa. xxxiii. 13-24; xlix. 22-26.)

By THOMAS HOGBEN.

ABOVE all else we need a PREPARED HEART and a PREPARED BIBLE. The new century Christians must be intercessors and Bible teachers. The revival effort to be made at the beginning of 1901 must be born of prayer, and sustained by the Word of the living God. The needed petition to-day is, "Lord, teach us to pray," for Christ only can teach us the effectual fervent prayer, the prayer on fire with love which encircles the promises of God with the arms of faith. To learn this lesson means power with God and power with man. In answer to such prayer, the people will feel the convicting grace of the Holy Spirit, and then shall the prey be taken from the mighty.

It means very definite personal prayer when each gets from God the names of the people whom He would have them take as a charge from Him to watch and pray for daily upon the one by one principle.

So THE NEEDED WORK to-day is diligent study of the Bible as to foundation truths. Inquirers that have been convicted of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment by the coming of the Holy Ghost in answer to the prayer of faith (John xvi. 8-11) must be helped by the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God—not man's wisdom, not man's words, but the Word of the Lord.

To this twofold work every Christian is called, and all who will carefully apply themselves to learn and to practise on these lines will become apt teachers; for all who live near to the King hear the Word at his mouth, and are able to introduce all who seek Him to the Lord Jesus Christ. No Christian can afford to be unused in this glorious effort. God wants all!

When the Holy Ghost works in his mighty convicting grace, sinners of every type become seekers, and Divine wisdom is needed in helping such at every point, and the Word of the Gospel is the power of God.

While every Christian is called to this work, none must dare to do it negligently. Dealing with an inquirer is at once the most momentous and blessed work entrusted to man. In some sense the helper stands in the stead of Christ, beseeching men to be reconciled to God. Let it be clearly settled that one has no right to speak other than the Word of God. It is not ours to declare that the seeker is forgiven, but clearly to point out the way of pardon through Jesus Christ, and to wait for the Spirit of God to assure the seeker of salvation. It is our duty to find out the real spiritual condition of the seeker—to diagnose the case so that the message that is needed to lead on step by step into light and liberty may be given. In the Bible there are texts that meet the needs of all classes, and what each seeker needs to know is what the Lord says about his or her case.

This wisdom is not confined to the few; the Lord gives it to all who seek, not in a miraculous way, but as the outcome of careful, prayerful study of the Word of God. Let all who would be equipped for this joyful service secure a new Bible, and search out the different classes of sinners there spoken of, and all that is said of them, and mark in some distinctive way each text, so as to have your Bible ready to depend upon as well as your memory.

Take one subject as an example, the awful sin of backsliding. Often in missions to-day it is said that these are in the majority. As a rule I think it is found that for the most part such as are called backsliders have never had an intelligent and clear sense of sins forgiven; or if they have received pardon they have not gone forward into the abundant life which Jesus Christ gives.

On the other hand, it will be a revelation to many who search the Scriptures to learn what backsliding really means. It is deeper, wider, and far away more dreadful than it is generally understood to be, and in getting to know what it means to others, many will find that its blight is upon their own lives.

BACKSLIDING CONSISTS IN

Loss of first love (Rev. ii. 4).
Indolence in pursuit of the truth (2 Peter iii. 14-17).
Shrinking from a life of faith (Heb. x. 38).
Turning away from the simplicity of the Gospel (Gal. iii. 1; v. 4-8).
Turning away from the truth (2 Tim. iv. 1-4).
Turning away from God (1 Kings xi. 9, 10).
Turning to crooked ways (Psa. cxxv. 5).
Missing the mark through vain talking (1 Tim. i. 6).

BACKSLIDING IS CAUSED BY

Pride (Prov. xvi. 18).
Love of money (1 Tim. vi. 10).
Deceit (Jer. viii. 5; 1 Tim. vi. 20, 21).

BACKSLIDING IS A MISERABLE STATE.

Wholly corrupt (Isa. i. 4-8).
Deaf and stubborn (Jer. vii. 24).
Separation from God (Jer. ii. 19; John vi. 66, 67; Gal. v. 4).
Self centred (Prov. xiv. 14).

BACKSLIDING BRINGS TERRIBLE PUNISHMENT.

God forsaken (Num. xiv. 43; Isa. lix. 2).
Rebellion (Psa. lxxviii. 56-64).
Blind (Isa. lix. 10).
Prey to evil (Isa. lix. 15).
Destroyed (Jer. xv. 6).
Not fit for the Kingdom (Luke ix. 62).

WARNED AGAINST.

Psa. lxxxv. 8; Hosea xi. 7; 1 Cor. x. 12.

SIN OF MAKING OTHERS BACKSLIDERS.

Prov. xxviii. 10; Matt. xviii. 6.

BACKSLIDERS' CASE NOT HOPELESS.

Psa. xxxvii. 24.
God calls them back (2 Chron. xxx. 6; Isa. xxxi. 6).
Duty of Christians to bring them back (Gal. vi. 1; Jas. v. 19, 20).
Pardon promised (2 Chron. vii. 14; Jer. xxxi. 20; xxxvi. 3; Hosea xiv. 4).

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, November 4. Isaiah lxiii.

THERE had been hostility between Israel and Edom from the day when Edom forbade the wearied hosts to cross her border, and so save a long detour. Sometimes, under the Kings of Judah, Edom was temporarily subdued, but she soon regained her freedom, and when Babylon had subjugated the holy city, the voice of Edom was heard urging that its walls should be razed to their foundations (Psa. cxxxvii. 7).

But how great the change pictured here. The prophet is standing on the southern frontier of Palestine, where the low hills of Judah merge into the desert, and beholds a mighty conqueror coming from the direction of Edom, his garments wet, not with his own blood, but with the blood of Israel's foes. It was as though he had been treading the wine-press of the wrath of God, and none had survived the hour of his indignation. What a vision this was for all after-time, that that mighty warrior stood as a sentry between the whole force of Edom and the Land of Promise! Thus, too, Christ waits to surround us by his guardian care, and to intercept our foes.

It is a marvellously sweet refrain, which breaks in at the seventh verse. It is like a strain of heavenly music. His great goodness! His mercies! The multitude of his loving-kindnesses! How deeply touched He has been with thine afflictions! How often the Angel of his Presence has saved thee! How tenderly He has borne and carried thee, when heart and flesh failed! But how often thou hast turned and grieved Him. Let us turn to Him that his Spirit may cause us rest, as the cattle do when they make for the valley from the glare of the sultry noon.

MONDAY, November 5. Isaiah lxiv.

Yes! God will work for those that wait for Him! They may wait, as did the sisters of Bethany, till hope has expired; or as the praying band in the house of Mary, till the day of execution is about to dawn; but they cannot wait in vain. God will work for him that waits. Be still and see the salvation of God.

But how bitter is the record of our sins. We are as the unclean leper. The best days we ever spent needed divine forgiveness; our prayers and tears need cleansing. The holiest resolutions we form fade as autumn leaves; and the first gust of temptation carries us away. Perhaps our most grievous failure is in the direction of our prayers, that there is little earnestness and eagerness about them, that we do not stir ourselves up to take hold, as Jacob did after the angel had touched the sinew of his strength.

There is but one remedy. We must abandon ourselves to the hand of God, and become as clay under his touch. It is for us to be willing, it is for Him to deliver us from our sins, and fashion us after his own will. Our best plea is our unutterable need, our bitter sorrow, the desolation of our Zion. Your sins may have brought you very low, but they will touch his heart more than the most eloquent petitions. He cannot refrain Himself for these things, and he will not hold his peace. Oh, when will men learn that as the cry of a tiny child is imperative to a mother's ear, so is the appeal of our misery to the Divine mercy!

TUESDAY, November 6. Isaiah lxv.

The hypocrisy of the chosen people was very exasperating. They professed to be holier than others, whilst indulging in all the sins of the surrounding heathen. There was no possibility, however, of deceiving God. All was written before Him, and all would be measured back into their own bosom. It is a terrible thing to remember the inevitable penalty which attaches to all hypocrisy and sin. Men may be forgiven, and the love of God may bring good out of evil, but they must face the inevitable fact that sin involves evil, not only to themselves, but also to others.

Those who believe in Jesus are the chosen seed. This is made abundantly clear in the Epistles to the Romans (xi) and Galatians (iii). God will make a separation on their behalf. When Sodom falls, Lot will be sent out of the overthrow. Oh, to be God's heir, and especially to be an inheritor of His mountains—the mountains of his righteousness, of his purity, of holy fellowship with Himself! The children of God have their provision secured to them amid the famine that rests on all other homes; they eat, they drink, they rejoice, they sing for joy of heart, they are called by another name.

Now, behold the new heavens and the new earth! The present dispensation has passed away, the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled. Jerusalem is restored, and sings aloud for joy. Long years of life are granted again to man. There is security of tenure in property and possessions, because no evil is in the world. God is near to those who love and pray to Him. The malign hatred which sin brought between the various races of the animal kingdom is at an end. Peace, blessed peace, has come to earth again, never again to abdicate her throne.

WEDNESDAY, November 7. Isaiah lxvi.

The opening words of this chapter were quoted on a memorable occasion by the martyr Stephen, when he foreshadowed the passing away of the Jewish ritual, and the substitution of the spiritual worship of God. The Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands, but finds his abode with those who are of a contrite and humble spirit. Mere ritual is nothing to Him. It is all one with God whether a man kills a lamb in the temple for sacrifice, or breaks a dog's neck in his field. If the heart of religion has died out of the priest or the worshipper, the most sacred duties become acts of sin; whilst the poor peasant, who kills a mad dog for the sake of his village, and at the risk of his life, fulfils a sacred duty.

The closing paragraphs of the book are delightful. We are called to rejoice with the Holy City, whose peace comes as a river, and the glory of the nations as a flowing stream. She shall not fear her foes; they shall be given over to the worm and flame of the valley of Hinnom. Her children shall become the greatest missionaries the world has ever seen (19), and the result of their testimony, in the power of the Holy Spirit, will be a great turning of men to God, so that they shall be as an offering, brought in a clean vessel to God's house. For all this the world is still waiting.

Let us cull some lessons for ourselves—that a nation may be born in a day, by the mighty power of the Holy Spirit; that when God brings to the birth of desire, He will cause to bring forth, in blessed effect and result; that He comforts, as a mother does; that He makes his hand known towards his servants. There is no fear for them, when God is all in all.

THURSDAY, November 8. Jeremiah i.

This is a peculiarly precious chapter to the writer, who can never forget that morning, years ago, when he had just left school, and was obliged to choose his life-course. How anxiously he had waited for direction, and asked that he might make no mistake! He was kneeling in his bedroom before the open Bible, and somehow, as though an angel-hand had turned the page, this chapter, which he did not remember to have seen before, opened before him, with verses 4-10 specially illuminated. How little he realized all that they would mean, as unfolded by the providence of God; and perhaps there are still depths in them of stars which only the larger telescope of growing years shall discover. Only let the weakest child of God take courage. When He summons us on a mission, He makes Himself responsible for all it may involve.

God does not delay needlessly. The white blossoms of the almond anticipate the spring, so He is often swifter than our anticipations; but when He does bid us wait, when He delays his interposition, we may possess ourselves in patience, knowing that the light from the distant star of blessing is speeding towards us.

Jeremiah was naturally a very timid man, as we shall see. He cried out that it was a woe to have been born a man of strife. But God had made him a defenced city and a brazen wall, and had promised that none should prevail against him; and if he had always dared to act in the faith of these assurances and predictions—according to God's promise, and according to his faith in that promise, so it would have been to him. Timid soul, reckon more absolutely on the words with which this chapter closes, and which shall be proved absolutely true in your experience. "Always with you, to the end of the age."

FRIDAY, November 9. Jeremiah ii.

God remembers! As a wife treasures the memory of those first happy years of married life, which lie on the other side of some bitter misunderstanding, so does God remember the happy bygone years, when we were holiness to the Lord, and went after Him even into the wilderness. Why have we gone away from Him? Is it that we have found Him guilty of infidelity or fickleness? No, indeed; we have had no sign of that in his dealings with us. Is it that He has laid us under no obligations in his past dealings with us? No, indeed; He brought us up out of Egypt into a plentiful land. Why then have we dealt with our God as no heathen people ever dealt with theirs? Ask thine heart!

The prophet here paints a picture full of vivid colouring. He conducts us up into the hills, and shows us the busy hewers of rock cisterns, that shall hold water through days of drought. There is no need for them to do so. In the valley, and near their own dwellings, arises a fountain of delicious living water. But they deliberately pass it by, in favour of their cisterns, which are cracked and broken in spite of all their care, and allow the brackish rain-water to leak away. What a true delineation is here of the children of men! They forsake God, and in their theatres, ball-rooms, business speculations, are ever endeavouring to replace Him, only to discover to their cost that it is an evil thing and a bitter. Their gods cannot save them in their hour of calamity.

How tenderly God pleads with his backsliding children, condescending to entreat with them—"Have I been as a wilderness? Can a bride forget her ornaments?"—taking pains to convince of sin, that there may be contrition, penitence, and return. Ah, what a God is ours! Do not be fearful or backward of returning to Him as you are.

SATURDAY, November 10. Jeremiah iii.

God will do what man shrinks from. The husband does not take back the faithless wife, but God takes back the soul which has wandered from Him. There had been no limit to Israel's sins—"Where hast thou not been lien with?" Yet their immortal Lover would not retain his anger. Oh, what hope this gives for us. If God returned in love to his people, when they returned unto Him; if He would not refuse them when they came back from their long and bitter backslidings, may we not cherish the certain faith, that He will receive us graciously and love us freely? The one condition is that we should acknowledge our iniquity, that we have transgressed against the Lord (13).

God is always leading us forward to new and deeper appreciation of his truth. In early days the Ark of the Covenant played a very important part in the education of Israel. It was the symbol of the Covenant. Its presence in the midst of Israel was the sign of the presence of Jehovah. But here we are told of a time when it should no more be brought to mind, because God's people would have passed out of the kindergarten class into the great world of reality. When the substance comes, the shadow departs. When we have Jesus, the Surety of the New Covenant, what need have we any more of the ark of Shittim wood? (16).

See what their long sufferings did for Israel. Beneath the gracious discipline of God's Spirit they were cleansed of the stubbornness of their hearts (17). And even better, they became the subjects of a genuine penitence. Their voice was heard in deep confession. Such confessions are good for the soul; let us not stint them, that we may be forgiven and restored, and that the blood of Jesus may cleanse us.

Evangelical Alliance Conference.

THERE is reason to anticipate that, in answer to much prayer, the principle of spiritual unity (in contrast to mere outward uniformity) will become increasingly influential through the fifty-fourth annual Conference of the Evangelical Alliance held last week in St. George's Hall, Liverpool. On the preceding Sunday, sermons were preached in most of the churches of the city, dealing with the principles embodied in the basis of the Alliance. From Monday to Wednesday inclusive, special preliminary afternoon prayer-meetings were held; and the succeeding days' proceedings were commended to the Divine blessing by friends who came together for half an hour before each morning session.

While the friends were assembling for the reception on Wednesday evening, Dr. A. L. Peace, the city organist, played a selection of music. There was a very large gathering of delegates, members, and friends when Dr. Chavasse, Bishop of Liverpool, took the chair for a meeting devoted to

ADDRESSES OF WELCOME.

Among others upon the platform were Bishop Royston; Canons Woodward, Hobson, Tyrer, Bycroft, and Harrison; Revs. H. Probyn and F. Linstead Downham (the latter being joint hon. sec. of the Conference); Messrs. Samuel Smith, M.P., E. W. Cropper, and L. P. Stubbs.

The hymn, "Praise ye Jehovah! Praise the Lord Most Holy!" was sung; and all present stood up to join in "The Lord's Prayer." Mr. T. F. Agnew read Heb. x. 12-25; and Rev. C. Musgrave Brown led in further prayer. The general secretary of the Alliance, Mr. E. P. Field, read letters or telegrams, expressing regret for inability to be present, from Lord Polwarth (President), prevented by illness from attending; Lord Kinnard, the Bishop of Exeter, Professor Handley Moule (Cambridge), Prebendary Webb-Peploe, Revs. F. W. Macdonald, Dr. M'Gaw, Archibald G. Brown, F. B. Meyer, and other gentlemen. The following telegram, signed by the Moderator, was also read, "The Commission of the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland, send their cordial greetings to their Evangelical Alliance brethren now met in Conference, and pray that God's blessing may rest upon all their deliberations."

THREE RESOLUTIONS

were then read to the meeting by Mr. Field. The first of these expressed, on behalf of the Council and members of the Alliance, their deep sense of the loss which the whole community has experienced through the death of Rev. Chas. Garrett, and lovingly sympathised in the grief which must be felt on account of that loss by every member of the Wesleyan body.

The second resolution was designed to draw the attention of the Municipal Council of Liverpool, and the people of that city, to the injury which will be done to the bodies and souls of men if the Lord's Day is not honoured. It was earnestly hoped that the public and all in authority will unite in discountenancing Sunday concerts and other amusements, sale of newspapers, running of excursions, and the increase of street-car and railway traffic.

By the third resolution, the Council and members of the Alliance expressed deep interest in and sympathy with the approaching union between the Free Church and the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland; praying that the home and foreign work of these churches may, through that union, be still more abundantly fruitful; and rejoicing in the belief that this and other federations of believers are, in great measure, Divine seals of approval upon the extensive influence and operations of the Alliance during the last half century.

THE BISHOP OF LIVERPOOL

said: "I thank the Council of the Evangelical Alliance for the great honour they have done the Church of England by asking me to take this chair. I thank them for their great catholicity in asking me, a comparative stranger in Liverpool and not a member of the Alliance, to attend this meeting. There are three reasons for my presence. First, I come to show, in some slight way, my gratitude to the Nonconformists of Liverpool for the exceedingly brotherly and kind letters of welcome which they sent me when I came among them three months ago. Those letters touched my heart and strengthened me in my work. Secondly, I am here because I long and pray for the union of all God's people, by whatever name they may be called. I am a Churchman by birth, education, conviction, and experience. I love the Church with a passionate love; but I have learned that Christ is greater than the churches, and that our common Christianity is greater than our Christian differences. We sing in our churches the great hymns of Nonconformist hymn-writers, as the Nonconformists sing in their churches the hymns of great Church hymn-writers. We read in private and in our theological colleges many of the great works of Nonconformist divines. The works of Dr. Dale, of Birmingham, are widely read among theological students in the University of Oxford. I, for one, glory in the fact that, when the translation of the English Bible was revised in recent years, Nonconformists and Churchmen sat side by side. And so, as I watch the drawing together of the Presbyterian Churches in Scotland—now, I trust, becoming an accomplished fact—as I watch the great branches of the Methodist body gradually drawing together and about to become one, I thank God, with all my heart, because I see in this the

to our blessed Lord's great prayer, 'That they all may be one; as Thou, Father, art in Me, and I in Thee.' And I believe that the Evangelical Alliance does help, in some degree, to draw many Christians closer to one another. I am here to-night, because I love Christian religious liberty; and this Society, I know, has in times gone by brought the powerful influence of the British Government to bear upon cases of persecution of Protestants in foreign lands. I think that a Society which has the courage and the wisdom to act as this Evangelical Alliance has done in times gone by well deserves the prayers and the sympathy of those who may, on some points, not see their way to join it. In coming to Liverpool I can only repeat what I have taught my men at Wycliffe Hall for years past—namely, to love Nonconformists, never to speak an ill word of them; to remember how much, as a Church and as a nation, we owe to them; to work side by side with them, as two wings in the army of Jesus Christ. And thus working side by side, if not, perhaps, hand in hand, by the grace of God we shall win England from her sin, from her unbelief, and from her indifference, to our Lord and Master Jesus Christ.

Further words of welcome, on behalf of the Church of England, were spoken by Archdeacon Taylor, to representatives of the Alliance who had come from a distance to attend the meetings of the Conference. He said that he had been more than fifty years in Liverpool and its neighbourhood; and he rejoiced in being a very old member of an Alliance which embraces and all denominations. He was never more happy in his life than when he stood upon the platform of that society.

Then followed brief addresses of welcome from representatives of various denominations in Liverpool. These were delivered by Rev. T. J. Choate (Wesleyan), Rev. J. P. Langham (Primitive Methodist), Rev. Stanley Rogers (Congregational), Rev. Robert Lewis (Baptist), Rev. Griffith Ellis (for the Welsh Churches generally), and Rev. A. Bannerman Barkway (Presbyterian). All these speakers joined their personal congratulations with those of the congregations they represented, to Dr. Chavasse upon his appointment as Bishop of Liverpool.

On behalf of the assembly, Mr. John Paton, chairman and treasurer of the Evangelical Alliance, heartily thanked the Bishop of Liverpool for his great kindness in presiding. In referring to the respect and enthusiasm which Nonconformists as well as Churchmen had expressed towards Dr. Chavasse, the speaker said that he would venture to tender the congratulations of the Alliance upon the Bishop's elevation to the charge of this great diocese. The Council heard of that appointment with profound thankfulness, and trusted that his lordship's labours would be greatly blessed. Mr. Paton said he was also desired by the Council to convey their thanks to the secretaries, to the local committee, and to kind friends in Liverpool, for valued help and generous hospitality.

IN RESPONSE TO THE WELCOME, addresses were given by Rev. Professor Margoliouth, of Oxford, who spoke of Alliance instrumentality in protecting Christians in various parts of the world from persecution; Rev. James Cumming Brown, of Edinburgh, who made special reference to the spread of Evangelical truth in China; Rev. Stuart Gardiner, who traced the great religious revival which took place in Ireland some years ago to the influence of the late Bishop Ryle's tracts; Rev. H. B. Macartney, of Australia; and M. Nestorius Marcus, of Persia.

The resolutions were subsequently put to the meeting by the Bishop of Liverpool, and were unanimously adopted.

THURSDAY'S MEETINGS.

At the morning session, Mr. Thos. A. Leigh presided. He referred to the fact that the Alliance had its birth in Liverpool; and it is now about twenty years since the last Conference of the Evangelical Alliance was held in that city. Nature displays endless variety with perfect harmony; and, in the Church of the living God, there are diversities of gifts, of administrations, and of operations, but there are the same Spirit, the same Lord, and the same God, who worketh all in all. Therefore we seek not uniformity of Christian worship, but that union of heart and spirit which was so manifest in the early Church. The secret of the great success which attended Messrs. Moody and Sankey's efforts, especially during their first visit to this country, was that all the Lord's people were brought together on a common platform; and the fruits of that great revival abide to-day in the numerous beneficent institutions of Liverpool. He was convinced that, with increased recognition of our oneness in Christ, we may expect a great outpouring of the Spirit of God, and far greater results in Christian work.

CRITICISM OF HOLY WRIT.

An instructive paper on the Criticism of Holy Scripture was read by Rev. Professor Margoliouth, of Oxford. In the course of his treatment of this large subject, the Professor said:—

Textual criticism is the science whereby we endeavour to obtain knowledge of the changes which books have undergone in the course of their transmission to posterity. It is sometimes divided into the Lower and Higher Criticism; the latter deals with the alterations which have taken place in the form of books, the former with those which words and sentences have sustained. Since books, before the invention of printing, were transmitted either orally or by scribes, textual criticism is part of the great science of human nature. Its first law is not unlike the first law of motion; it is that a transmitter will transmit correctly unless something prevents. Where transmission is oral, the causes which prevent accurate performance are so numerous and powerful that that first law is of little value. But where writing has come in, it is quite different.

It follows that the alleged results of the Criticism must be well weighed before being received. There are cases in which the result obtained after consideration will be diametrically opposite to that which superficial observation has conveyed. We all know of the hypothesis associated with the name of Wellhausen—that the Tabernacle was a fiction, the purpose whereof was to provide a representative of the Temple. The whole story, so he thought, must have been invented some time between the days of Ezekiel and those of Ezra. We open the first book of Samuel, and find the Tabernacle of the Congregation brought into connection with the sons of Eli; this is evidence of its existence at the earliest period of the continuous history of Israel. That passage, therefore, seems to ruin at the start; but then we are told that the LXX. version omits the clause in 1 Sam. ii. 22. Clearly then, we are told, it formed no part of the original narrative, and must have been inserted after 300 B.C.

This argument is at first sight alarming; when looked in the face it is found that either the clause must have been omitted by the translator, or inserted by the editor of the Hebrew. These are the two possibilities. Things may be due to accident or design; but whereas the omission of a clause may have been due to either, the addition of one must have been due to design only; that also is evident. We have then to consider whether any one would have had an interest in omitting it or inserting it. A glance at the comments of the Rabbis settles that question. The verse mentions women who ministered at the door of the Tabernacle of the Congregation. So it is rightly rendered in the Revised Version; and there is an allusion to those women in Exodus. But the idea of women ministers at the Tabernacle was so odious, that all the translators with one consent began to mistranslate. The women who fasted at the door of the Tabernacle, said the LXX. of Exodus; the women who prayed there, said another ancient version; the women who gathered there to offer certain oblations, said the Rabbis.

From those intentional mistranslations we infer with certainty that when the LXX. translation of Exodus was made, the notion of ministering women (who perhaps reminded the Jews of pagan priestesses) was regarded as offensive. Hence it is certain that a fresh reference to them would not have been voluntarily introduced. But in the passage of Exodus no great harm is done by mistranslating. In the passage of 1. Samuel, however, there is this harm, that the crime with which Eli's sons were charged, which, according to would not, in antiquity, have been considered henious, became by those translations one of such terrible gravity that Eli's treatment of it was altogether inadequate; indeed, it became one of the most terrible that could have been committed. Hence the Rabbis had again to mistranslate, or to say the words were to be taken figuratively; the crime of Eli's sons was, they thought, compared to the worst of all crimes.

What appears from those controversies is that about 300 B.C. a translator would have had a strong interest in omitting the clause, whereas an editor would have had none in inserting it; whence we conclude that the text, owing to the scandal which it occasioned, was deliberately omitted.

Therefore the evidence which, before it was sifted, appeared to favour Wellhausen's hypothesis, in a striking way, when a few questions have been asked, turns out to hit it exceedingly hard. What we learn from it is that a certain fact connected with the Tabernacle of the Congregation gave grave offence at the commencement of the third century B.C., and that offence was more likely to have been a fragment of genuine history than a deliberate invention.

We see, then, that in that case we can move with confidence, because we happen to be acquainted with the controversies connected with the beginning and end of the clause. In a case referred to, we believe the LXX. against the Hebrew text, because there too we are dealing with a dated controversy, and know what interests were involved. But on becoming acquainted with the forces in operation and able to estimate their working, we know which of our witnesses to believe. It follows that the description of given by a Dutch scholar of the last century, as a man who was hard-headed, cross-grained, and in a perpetual state of suspicion, had a great deal of truth in it. Cross-examine your witnesses and re-examine them; very often after those processes have been carried through, their evidence will have materially altered its character.

In the case dealt with, the controversy which led to the omission by the LXX. of a verse of Samuel; and the tremendous consequence of discredit being cast on the historical character of the book of Exodus, could be traced with tolerable ease. But in other cases it is not always so easy to trace them, and unless we free our mind altogether from prejudice, we may lose the clues altogether.

I have seen it stated in Introductions to the Bible, by scholars of different schools, that no one would ever explain why, in the list of Israelitish heroes in the book of Ecclesiasticus, Daniel's name was omitted, and that that omission absolutely discredited the book which bore his name. But Ezra was also omitted. Why then did not the same argument discredit the book of Ezra? For Ezra was a more important person than Daniel. The reason was that there was an interest in discrediting Daniel, and none in discrediting Ezra; but if we once start the plan of letting an argument hold when we like the result, and disallowing it when we dislike the result, we shall make no scientific progress. What we know is that those names must have been intentionally omitted; for Nehemiah's name which is mentioned must have suggested that of Ezra, and the writer calls special attention to the verse of Ezekiel, in which Job and Daniel are mentioned side by side. What then was the author's reason for omitting them from the book of Ecclesiasticus?

A reason which would have covered both cases was clearly more satisfactory than a reason which would only have accounted for one. What then had in common? This—that each of them had written a considerable portion of his book in Aramaic. Nehemiah insisted on the Jews adhering to their sacred language. The fact of both Daniel and Ezra having violated that principle (inasmuch as part of each of their books is in Aramaic) seems sufficient to account for their omission. But the important point—that the author had his eye on a verse in which Daniel was mentioned—was concealed by a mistranslation, and preserved to us by a witness who, till recently, was ordinarily unheard. It would seem, therefore, as though the materials for settling those difficulties are ordinarily preserved somewhere, if we would only take the trouble to search them out, and free our minds from prejudice when we used them. A scholar who is likely to be remembered when others are forgotten—Paul de Lagarde—spent his life in editing texts for future ages to utilize. And, indeed, it is surprising in what remote corners the keys to some of those difficulties are to be found. The example of the Assyrian inscriptions and the Sabæan inscriptions make it appear as though scepticism in each age was to be met by the style of reasoning which it could best understand; and as though the materials for answers were lying dormant somewhere or other till the time for their utilization should have come.

Proceeding beyond the text of Scripture to more difficult questions of analysis and structure, seems premature. All the forces at work on the text from his time downwards ought to be localized and estimated till such a proceeding is in season. But that is what the criticism which is so popular in our age attempts; and the question is whether it has at present for success in science means not winning adherents, but producing results which are sound and durable.

The difficulties which attend the process in the cases of the historical and prophetical books respectively are different, but they are very serious in both. In order to criticize any human work, we have to place ourselves in the position of the author, and if we happen to be in possession of a fair number of his secrets, we can understand the action that resulted. Most of us are either equal or superior intellectually to the old scribes and copyists, whence we are able to understand their conduct. In the case of minds greatly superior to our own, we can often admire the work which they have produced, without being able to understand it fully; and where we are in presence of a mind which, without being decidedly superior to our own, is nevertheless very differently constituted, we can, perhaps, by lengthy study, familiarize ourselves with its ways sufficiently to comprehend it.

But criticism of the works of the prophets seems to resemble the judgment of works in a language which we do not understand. Several of them assure us most earnestly that the source of their utterances was abnormal; they distinguish it emphatically from knowledge produced in ordinary ways. The phrases whereby they describe their function, and whereby their contemporaries describe it, were such as to distinguish it from that of the ordinary teacher and preacher. We cannot disallow that claim without proving far more than those critics who are not prepared to give Scripture up entirely would desire; and indeed to proceed to as false prophets would seem to involve us in difficulties, as it leaves their efficiency and final success altogether unexplained. The amateur witch in Theocritus thought that by burning husks of corn she could move the gates of hell; yet it was clear that whether they could be moved or not, husks of corn could not have done it. But if we once allow the claim of the prophets to be bearers of supernatural messages communicated in no ordinary way, then our power of judging those messages, assigning them dates and occasions, and discussing their authorship, becomes exceedingly limited; they begin to resemble those natural processes which we can only know truly by their efficiency, without being able to separate the steps by which they are produced, or measure the forces that are employed in their production. That the Jews should have preserved their identity from the time of the first exile till now, when all the surrounding nations have lost theirs, and, in spite of their general unpopularity, should have succeeded in forcing their religion on mankind, is an effect so astounding that it requires an extraordinary cause. But if once the extraordinary character of the cause be admitted, then the doctrine that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump appears to have become applicable. The rules which would be perfectly safe if tried on the text of Thucydides, might be quite false when tried on that of Isaiah.

The early date of writing would seem to have been satisfactorily settled by Professor Sayce and others; and we do not require the evidence of the Tel el-Amarna tablets to prove it. The à priori evidence that was afforded by the etymological orthography of Hebrew was absolutely convincing. To understand

we have to remember that a book was circulated orally, and that the writing of it was meant to render it permanent, but was something of an accident. Long after the use of paper had made books easily accessible, it was the custom in Eastern countries for one who wished to study a book to go and hear it from the author or from his authorized representative. Where, as was sometimes the case, the author was blind, it would be hard to say whether any actual writing was employed or not. Hence the idea which the criticism of the Pentateuch ordinarily suggested, of a student with three or more books before him compiling a fourth out of them, was one which it was difficult to defend from the charge of anachronism. But if we once think of the redactor as compiling a book out of certain works which he had by heart, and traditions which he had learned from his seniors, the impossibility of distinguishing different sources with any degree of probability must be felt.

That the results which figure as criticism are unlikely to stand the test of time is indicated by their extreme complexity. We may possibly believe in three sources of the Pentateuch; but that a dozen could be detected is too improbable. We may possibly believe in two Isaiahs; a hypothesis which requires ten has something wrong about it. The fact that the mere pursuit of a certain system logically leads to results which are evidently unsatisfactory and unreasonable, seems to show that the Bible possesses which Isaiah was told belongs to the race who owned it—a power due to the possession of an element which, being indestructible, can regain whatever it loses.

When M. Renan, in the middle of this century, wrote his general history of the Semitic languages, he suggested that the analysis of the books of the Old Testament had been done so thoroughly by Gesenius and Ewald that nothing remained to be done. That view would nowhere be adopted now. Of the work of the former little that was not mechanical survives; of the work of the latter practically nothing remains. The name of Wellhausen suggests radical opinions; but there are works by men of note expressing views compared with which his are conservative. In those subjects we have not, as in Assyriology, continuous progress, but rather a succession of starts de novo, to be superseded by others without being embodied in them. Hence we may look forward to a reaction, in which scholarship, wearied with those fresh starts, discovers that the fundamental fallacy has been neglect of the unique element which gives Scripture its value.

THE UNION OF BELIEVERS.

In the afternoon, Mr. John Paton presided, and, in opening the proceedings, said that the Alliance had been cheered and helped more than he could express by the welcome which they had received from the people of Liverpool. Outsiders regarded that city as the metropolis of the Empire, with its great merchant-princes, many of them noble-spirited, generous-hearted Christian men, with its trade and commerce extending all over the worle; but when they came nearer to the city, they found that it had a large and devoted body of loving Christian people of various denominations, who came together in the spirit of the Evangelical Alliance to manifest their oneness in Christ. He trusted that this Conference might produce a better realization of their union.

"The Union of all Believers with the Lord Jesus Christ Himself, and with each other in Him," was the theme appointed for consideration. In dealing with the first part of the subject, Rev. G. Campbell Morgan said that the union of the believer with his Lord is

A FUNDAMENTAL AND VITAL TRUTH.

There can be no union amongst believers, nor can there be any manifestation of it, save in the essential and initial fact that every individual believer is united to the Lord Jesus Christ. It is impossible for us to create union; but it is possible for us to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace, so that this may be a living witness in the world to the Divinity of our Lord's mission. And, to that end John xvii. 20, brings every believer into the place of one for whom the Lord Himself prayed. We live in a day when attempts of all kinds are being made to bring about "re-union," a word which should find no place among Christian people. Unity can neither be maintained nor manifested by picnics in Switzerland, nor by urging Nonconformists to fraternize with Churchmen. But the name of Nonconformist is an objectionable term, inasmuch as it puts those who belong to the Church of Christ into a negative and accidental division. We are not united with each other and with the Lord Jesus Christ because we admire his teaching, or desire to imitate his example; but our union is that of

AN ACTUAL POSITIVE LIFE.

The subject of John's Gospel is the life itself; while his Epistle deals with the proof or manifestation of a life which produces character. John i. 11-13 shows the genesis of the life. There can be no coming into the life of Christ save by his death (x. 10-15). The law of the life (xv.) is human helplessness abiding in Divine Almightiness. The manifestation of this life is not imaginative and mystical, but is dynamical and transfiguring, having its results in character, in conduct, and in that consummation when we shall see our Lord in his glory and be like Him. In proportion as individual believers, in the denominations of to-day, understand and realize this wonderful union with Christ, the other question of the union of the churches will be solved.

Rev. C. G. Moore spoke upon the second division of the subject. He said that our union and fellowship, not only with God but with one another, must be in the Lordship, loyalty, love, patience, tenderness, and inspiration of Christ, as opposed to self's whims, feebleness, and failing. True fellowship with our brother needs the same Divine grace that redeemed us; and it is only the Holy Ghost that can introduce us into a blessedness which is second only to restored communion with God Himself. It is when I am walking in the light, in the presence of the God of all love, that I learn true fellowship with my brother. The practical nature of such fellowship is illustrated in the story of Paul's conversion, showing how the fears of Ananias were removed, and his heart was disposed to tender love toward the great apostle. The world is to know that we are Christ's disciples by our love one to another. Let us ever approach our brother as one in whom Christ dwells; while, by grace, we clear our own lives of all that makes us unlovable. We must beware of schism, not only in the ecclesiastical sense, but in regard to fellow believers. A large part of our heaven, by the will of our Heavenly Father, will consist in sweet, eternal union and fellowship with all who are, like ourselves, redeemed by the blood of God's Son. Let us seek to enjoy some of that experience even now.

Between the Centuries.

THE Trustees of Mildmay have drawn up the following Invitation for a day of prayer at the close of the century and with a view to the future:—

"Men ought always to pray, and not to faint" (Luke xviii. 1).

"What prayer and supplication soever be made by any man, or by all thy people . . . then hear Thou in heaven, thy dwelling-place, and forgive, and do, and give to every man . . . that they may fear Thee all the days that they live" (1 Kings viii. 38-40).

Dear Friends,—As we approach the commencement of a new century—possibly the closing one of the Christian era—there arise, unbidden, a crowd of hopes and fears, of desires and misgivings; but whether we be filled with joyous expectations or with dismal forebodings, we who belong to Christ must feel the need of his gracious response to this cry—"Lord, increase our faith"; for, whatever be our mood, no Christian can fail to see how utterly we are cast upon the Divine intervention in this world's affairs if utter confusion and anarchy are not to overwhelm us; and upon the shedding down and reception of Holy Ghost power in the Church, if the final apostasy may perchance be delayed.

It seems fitting, therefore, that a day of prayer and intercession should be observed ere the year closes; and Friday, December 14, is suggested for gatherings at the Mildmay Conference Hall, and wherever else friends may be moved to make arrangements for similar meetings to "to call upon the Name of the Lord." We accordingly invite you to meet with us for believing prayer. It is proposed that no addresses should be given in these meetings, but that we should encourage ourselves in the Lord our God by the utterance of brief prayers or texts of Holy Scripture; believing that the "great and precious promises" of the Word should prove sufficient stimulus to pour out our hearts before God for the pressing needs of the Church and of the world.

In our own land especially the pre-occupation of all classes of the people with the events which have signalized this eventful year—whether in Africa, India, or China—has crowded out to a mournful extent the things of God and his spiritual claims, and has further secularized the spirit of the great majority. The Church has been unable to escape the contagion of boastfulness and pride of race which war invariably arouses.

Coldness and worldliness in the Church, with definite falling away towards Romanism on the one hand, and denial of the integrity of Holy Scripture on the other, have enfeebled the Church's testimony to the unsaved, and loosened her hold on the rising generation; and the ever-increasing allurements of public amusements are sadly diminishing the love of home, wherein in former days there lay much of the strength of our national character.

This has been a called a "Century of Missions," and we praise God for the truer and more Scriptural attitude of the Church now manifest towards the Jews, the heathen, and the Mohammedans; but when all has been told concerning the missionary enterprise, we must acknowledge terrible shortcomings in every branch of the Church concerning the unevangelized millions all the world over.

The present terrible crisis in China, the greatest of all mission fields, calls for unceasing and earnest intercession. What if the Lord of the harvest should move so mightily just now in the native churches of China whilst they are deprived of the oversight of Christ's under shepherds from Europe and America? that a multitude should be brought in through the testimony of those who have been "faithful unto death," and through the consistent lives of the believers who still survive; for "God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things that are mighty." It is not therefore well that God's people everywhere, both at home and abroad, should meet together for timely and widespread humiliation and prayer? (Jonah iii. 9.)

The foregoing and many other topics will present themselves to those who are willing to wait upon the Lord for blessing, and who believe that "He waits to be gracious."

It may be well to specialize, to some extent, the subject for each of the three meetings, so as to concentrate thought and prayer more specifically, e.g.:

11 a.m.—The Church of God.—For the arrest of apostasy; for cleansing from worldliness; for self-examination, and judgment of sin; for a great outpouring and reception of the Holy Ghost.

3 p.m.—Our Native Land.—For heavenly wisdom to our rulers, for wholesome legislation, for deliverance from mighty internal foes, intemperance, impurity, gambling, sensational amusements; for revival of the better observance of the Lord's day, and for sobriety of mind amongst all classes.

7 p.m.—For the World at Large.—For good government in all lands; for the diminution of oppression; for speedy settlement of the Chinese problem; for generous treatment of India and all subject races; for "an open door" for the Gospel in all "the dark places of the earth;" for God's special grace for the native Church in China in present perilous circumstances; and that 1901, in contrast to 1900, may prove to be a time of "rest from war."

Requests for prayer may be sent beforehand to Colonel Morton, at the Conference Hall, Mildmay Park, N. Where such requests are for individuals, their names and addresses must be given.

It is hoped that Christian friends elsewhere, at home and abroad, will endeavour to arrange meetings on the same day (if possible) with similar objects and requests.

"A Bright Work in a Dark Place."

UNDER the above title, Mr. John Coates has issued an account of one of the village missions held in connection with the Ross Bible Carriage, Tent and Evangelistic Mission.

A large number of copies of the New Testament were distributed in the village, which is a needy place, chiefly inhabited by miners. Other copies were sold, and a bookstall was started outside a pawnbroker's shop and opposite a large public-house, which is a chief popular resort. Books, full of Gospel light, were sold to the value of £40.

Many heard the Gospel and were impressed. One result was a message to the preacher, that unless he discontinued speaking to the men, he would be thrown into the river, for the pit lads were unable to do their work on account of the fear and dread that had come over them.

Many meetings were held, but during a storm the canvas split and the tent was wrecked by the wind. Mr. Coates hopes to procure "a wooden-sided tent," so that the work may be continued through the winter.

A second tent has been erected in a number of villages during recent months, and deep interest was aroused and many were blessed.

The "Stores" Prayer Union.—The eighth annual public meeting was held at the Police Institute, Adelphi, W.C., on Wednesday, Oct. 10, Mr. J. E. Bignall presiding. The report recalled the many blessings God had bestowed during the past year, and pointed out that the existence of a prayer union in a large business house should be a cause for thankfulness. Addresses were given by Messrs H. R. Lavington, secretary Bible-class Union; R. Bannister, and Miss Vaughan Barber, of the Police Institute.

Letters for Soldiers.—Mr. W. Punter, 27, Pembroke Road, Portsmouth, appeals for the means of distributing "An Open Letter" among the troops returning home.

The Late Rev. Henry Sharpe,

TRINITY CHURCH, HAMPSTEAD.

THOSE who can recall the early sixties, and the comparative simplicity which then characterized much of church and social life, will regard the period as one upon which, in those respects at least, it is refreshing to look back.

One of the most prosperous centres of Evangelical work in the Church of England at that time was the at Hampstead. It could not, indeed, boast of much architectural beauty—its form was akin to that of a simple "meeting-house;" but one could not attend it without being profoundly impressed by the spirituality and earnestness of the preacher, Rev. Henry Sharpe.

It was to the Bishop of London's Fund that the navvies who were then constructing the Midland Railway, beneath those fields, were indebted for the ministry of Mr. Sharpe, who was appointed to the charge of a mission among them in 1865. Prior to this, Mr. Sharpe had filled a number of positions, and always with characteristic earnestness. In 1856 he was appointed to the curacy of St. John the Baptist, Peterborough. From 1858 to 1864 he was incumbent of Trinity Church, Wolfe's Island, Ontario. In 1864 he returned to Peterborough, whence he proceeded to Hampstead.

The temporary church which was erected soon became totally inadequate to the needs and requirements of the congregation and of those who wished to join it. Previous to this, a committee of gentlemen had been formed to arrange for the continuance of Mr. Sharpe's ministry after his were over. In this they were successful, and steps were next taken to erect a permanent edifice for him and his congregation. The site upon which Trinity Church of to-day stands was offered by the Lord of the Manor and thankfully accepted, and the foundation-stone was laid by the late Earl of Shaftesbury. By dint of self-denial, united zeal, and liberal gifts, the whole cost of the building (£16,000) was raised by subscriptions, towards which Mr. Sharpe himself gave £1,000. On July 9, 1872, the building was ready for consecration, and Mr. Sharpe became the first incumbent. A district was assigned a year later, and very soon parish work advanced apace, and the usual organised agencies came into being. The modest mother church was used for some time for the Day and Sunday schools, but when its removal became necessary, by the formation of Fitzjohn's Avenue, the need for permanent schools was imperative. The Lord of the Manor gave another site, upon which the present schools were erected, and an influential congregation was made up of men and women who gathered round the vicar and his beloved wife, attracted by their unaffected simplicity and methods of work.

Mr. Sharpe's preaching was of no common order. It was full of striking words and solemn appeals; in language both racy and powerful, but for the souls of his people, and always pointing to the Redeemer.

Rev. S. A. Boyd, a former curate of Trinity, says of him: "Pre-eminently Henry Sharpe was a man of natural gifts, of active voice, and gentle manner. Those who knew him became aware of his great shrewdness and remarkable power of discernment. It is a small matter, but he was a neat man, and with a sense of what was correct and fitting in all circumstances, which gave him to many people a peculiar charm. Not less characteristic a feature was his playful humour and full and deep enjoyment of life. He was a strongly magnetic man, hopeful, confident, progressive—qualities that drew around him young and eager people. He was a man of moral courage and firmness, a tenacious man and a loyal man. The above were threads in his character; the texture of it was his piety. He was a man with the peace of God ruling in his heart and shining in his life; a man of prayer and with a beautiful gift of prayer; a man who loved his Bible, and was manifestly and wonderfully led by the Spirit."

In a wide circle the vicar of Trinity was known as an uncompromising Evangelical. He held his principles from deep conviction, and though he lived during years wherein the Church experienced many changes, he stood to the position he assumed from the earliest days of his ministry, and never flinched. He took a lively interest in all forms of Protestant activity, and for many years supported the Protestant Alliance, of the Council of which he was a member, likewise the Church Association, and kindred societies.

He also showed deep concern in foreign missions, was a member of the committees of the Church Missionary, and Colonial and Continental Church Societies, and his church was ESSENTIALLY A MISSIONARY CHURCH.

As a natural sequence, home missions had also a warm place in his heart, and the two interests ran on parallel lines. Besides ministerial work, Mr. Sharpe found time to do some good service with his pen, and a book which was published some years ago, entitled "Thoughts on Christian Joyfulness," was welcomed by many.

Mr. Sharpe passed away on July 22 last, aged sixty-seven, deeply lamented by his people and by the many friends, of various denominations, who were interested in the vicar and his work, and to whom he had greatly endeared himself by the lovableness of his personality, and by his earnest Christian life and character. Mr. Sharpe's relations with his people were always characterized by an affection on their part which was only equalled by his pastoral solicitude for the welfare of those committed to his charge.

In a letter addressed to Mr. Sharpe, which only reached Hampstead after the vicar had passed away, Rev. C. A. Fox, himself lying on a bed of suffering, wrote: "One word of intensest sympathy, beloved brother, in your deep sufferings. How strange, and yet how dear, suffering with Christ! It is dying daily, but with Him. He knows, He loves, He suffers. My most tender love to you, my long-loved brother: and now 'be of good cheer, brother Ridley!'—the candle of patience means much in God's sight. With love, yours ever in this world or the next."

GO FORWARD.

IF a thousand Red Seas threaten to drown us we must "go forward." Our "Goshen" was delightful, but we must not go back to it. We must nobly resign our Egyptian paradise, and go through seas and deserts, believing that the land of God is before us. "Go forward."

LAW AND GOSPEL.

The Law showeth us our sin; the Gospel showeth us remedy for it.

The Law showeth us our condemnation; the Gospel showeth us our redemption.

The Law is the word of ire; the Gospel is the word of grace.

The Law is the word of despair; the Gospel is the word of comfort.

The Law is the word of unrest; the Gospel is the word of peace.

THE VITAL TOUCH.

(Mark v. 25-34.)

This woman came at once to the vital touch, because she was so convinced of her disease and its danger. But so many nominal followers of Christ are trying to persuade themselves that their disease is not fatal. She was quite done with all other physicians, and broken off from them. But many of us have not yet been conclusively shut up to Christ. This woman went straight to Jesus so soon as she heard that He was nigh. But so many among us are waiting for the "convenient season." She made the most inconvenient season serve her turn.

MEDITATION UPON GOD.

That which we do know and believe, makes an impression upon us only as it is improved by our thoughts, as it is considered or not considered. A great many things lie asleep in our souls, and signify nothing to us, for want of actual thought. At certain times and seasons, therefore, we should say to ourselves, "Well! I will now go on purpose, and sit down, and meditate upon God. This shall be the business of the present hour." For surely nothing can with higher right lay claim to our entire thoughts than the Author of all. And it is a strange piece of negligence that He with whom we have such great concerns, and who is our All-in-all, should be so seldom the subject of our solemn, designed, purposed meditation; that the thoughts of God should be casualties with us; that we should think of Him only now and then by chance, and never find a time wherein we may say to ourselves, "I will now on set purpose think of God."

The Royal Buckhounds.—The Humanitarian League has forwarded an application to Lord Salisbury, praying him to receive a deputation, whose object would be to urge that the office of Master of the Royal Buckhounds should not be again filled, and that the pack should be converted into a drag-hunt. This protest against the continuance of so indefensible and cruel a form of amusement has the support of members of the late Parliament of all parties, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and other Church dignitaries and Nonconformist ministers. It is to be hoped that the near future will witness the abolition of the practice of hunting virtually tame deer, for it is well-known that the animals used in the chase are mainly carted from Windsor Park, and are practically domesticated.

The Late Captain Orde Browne, R.A.

GREAT ability, immense activity as a trusted artillery expert, and unwearied and successful labour in the service of the Lord Jesus, form an almost unique "threefold cord." They are found in the career of the late Captain Orde Browne, R.A., who died in September last—"a man greatly beloved" by all who knew him, and specially by those who honour faithful Christian testimony conjoined with earnest labour for the welfare of souls.

Captain Orde Browne was the second son of Colonel B. C. Browne, formerly of the 9th Lancers, of Stouts Hill, Gloucestershire. He was born in 1838, educated at the Government School at Carshalton, and at the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, from which he passed into the Royal Artillery, when not yet seventeen, on December 20, 1854. The following extracts from "A Memoir" in The Engineer of September 14 will show the repute he bore in his professional work and life:

Captain Orde Browne served, and served with distinction, in every branch of the Artillery. He took part with the siege train in the attack on Sevastopol during the Crimean War, and was mentioned in despatches for gallant conduct in the trenches. He received the Crimean and Turkish medals, and the Sardinian Order of St. Lazarus for valour. He was promoted captain in 1862, and retired from the service in 1871. He was an intimate friend of the late General Gordon, and, like Gordon, a man deeply and practically religious. These two undertook ragged-school work, and beyond all question did a great deal of good. When Gordon went to the Soudan for the first time, he asked Orde Browne to go with him. Orde Browne refused to leave the school work.

He was appointed Captain-Inspector at the Royal Laboratory, Woolwich, which appointment he held till his death. He was despatched by the Admiralty as Chief of the Transit of Venus Expedition to Egypt, 1874-75. During the winter of 1876 and 1877 he delivered a course of lectures on ammunition at the Royal Naval College, Woolwich. These were so good that he was appointed lecturer on ammunition to the Artillery—now Ordnance—College, a post which he held up to the time of his death. So satisfactory and valuable was his method of instruction that he was asked to give lectures each year at the School of Gunnery, and he had, further, the unique honour conferred on him, not being an engineer, of being asked to deliver lectures at the School of Engineering, Chatham.

There can be no doubt that he was the greatest living authority on armour and ordnance; and his opportunities of acquiring information were unrivalled. If now and again he gave offence by being outspoken, no mortal ever ventured to say that he was unfair of set purpose. Few, indeed, ventured to dispute the soundness of his judgment, no one the accuracy of his statements.

Captain Orde Browne was in the confidence, not only of successive Governments and the permanent high officials of this country, but of those of various foreign countries. It was fully understood that he was absolutely truthful and honourable almost to the point of being Quixotic. Trustworthy to the last degree, he was secret as the grave when secrecy was necessary. If he held that a secret involved anything dishonourable or unnecessary, he flatly refused to be entrusted with it. The knowledge which he obtained in this way was often of the utmost indirect value, because it prevented him from making mistakes. His whole life supplies another example, like those of Newton and Clerk-Maxwell, of the absolute compatability of the most sincere practical religion with the highest scientific attainments.

Shortly after his conversion, when in R.H.A., Captain Orde Browne became a teetotaler. He saw the sin and trouble that drink brought to the men of his troop. Many of them took the pledge then, and he often recalled with pride that, until he left the troop upon his promotion, not a single man was brought up for drunkenness. Quite a revival took place among them. Being drawn away from the public-houses, the men were ready to come to a room he had fitted up in barracks (at that time there were but few Soldiers' Homes), where he and other Christians held Bible readings. On one occasion, after a march from Newbridge to Dublin, the major commanding complimented him on his troop. "Not a man under arrest—not a sore back among the horses!" The men pursued their route along the country roads, singing hymns, and, though billetted among the townspeople,

NOT ONE FELL IN DRINK.

Being appointed to the Royal Arsenal, he and his wife began a work in the Ragged Schools, and among the tramps' lodging-houses. For years he visited and preached the Gospel in the kitchens. His manner was so genial and kindly that even in Roman Catholic houses he was heartily welcomed, and some remarkable conversions took place through his influence. In the work of the Midnight

From photograph by Messrs. Henry Wayland and Co., Blackheath, S.E.

Meeting Movement he and his wife took an active part, and they both strongly protested against the new Act, then in existence, for registration of fallen women.

About this time a wonderful work commenced in connection with a large tent in Woolwich, erected by his friend, Mr. Herbert Townend. For two months it was not only crowded within, but numbers listened from without. Nearly 100 were definitely converted. It resulted in "The Gospel Hall," Nightingale Vale, being erected, with the help of their friend, Mr. Trevor Francis, and subscriptions from other friends. Almost from the time of his conversion, he had worshipped with the Christians called "Brethren." Many have since been saved in that hall through the earnest Gospel testimony given. Amidst all his Government work he never allowed for a minute the Gospel work to suffer, but made it the primary object of his life. He seldom spoke to a stranger without bringing the conversation round to spiritual things, and in travelling abroad he ever took supplies of New Testaments and tracts. Once, when ordered to Egypt, he took a few Arabic New Testaments, to give to some Algerian troops he had known in Crimea, then stationed in Paris. These were so gladly received that he communicated with the Bible Society, whose colporteur afterwards reported that he had sold some 180 Bibles among them. Though Mohammedans, the men were peculiarly accessible while away from their own country.

Captain Orde Browne also delivered several lectures upon "Our Protestant Martyrs" in different places, and gloried in being a Protestant, and in the noble testimony, sealed by their blood, given by so many of our forefathers, leading up to the Reformation. These lectures have been published under the above title, and are sold at the Tract Depot, 100, Wellington Street, Woolwich. He was also well versed in the prophetic Scriptures, and published "The Gentile Powers," which is sold at the same place. One of his friends, an officer commanding in R.A., writes of him:

We can magnify the grace of God which enabled him, in an active life, to do so much for others in the most Christ-like way, which gave him such wisdom, sympathy, and unselfishness, such powers of interesting people in all that was of good report.

He fell asleep in Jesus, after a brief illness, at his brother's residence, Peers Court, Dursley, Gloucestershire. He was buried on Wednesday, September 5, in Charlton Cemetery, Woolwich. The presence of a great sorrowing concourse, mostly of the poorer people, bore testimony to the nature of the work which he had done for years in the neighbourhood. He leaves a widow and seven children, all of whom are following in the father's footsteps. His eldest daughter, wife of Lieutenant-Colonel George Wingate, writes from India—

Our family life was like one life with nine strands. My father will live in every one of us—influencing us, leading us.

What an encouragement to Christian parents! H. A. Mandeville.

Sesame.

Joy dwelleth not in palaces,
Amid the rich and great;
It oft is found where poor men toil,
And dwell in low estate.

It needeth not a golden key
The gates of bliss to win;
Love is the "Open, Sesame!"
And all may enter in.

And all may find what all men seek,
Life's chiefest prize and crown;
Before which earthly glory fades,
And lays its sceptre down.

For love, with magic spell doth work
All hearts to weld in one;
And words and deeds of charity
Shine brighter than the sun!

A Sheffield Convention.—The recent gatherings of Christians at the Thomas Street Hall, Sheffield, in connection with the Rescue and Evangelization Mission, proved a means of stimulus and encouragement to those who assembled. The services were marked by fervency in supplication, praise, and thanksgiving. Many were the tokens of Divine blessing experienced, and much testimony was borne to the working of the Holy Spirit in many hearts.

Army Temperance Association.—In connection with the operations of this useful organization, Mr. Clare White, the secretary, is about to sail for South Africa to organize the work among the 10,000 members of the Association in that land. Lord Roberts, chairman of the Council, has signified his approval of this step. Twenty years ago, when Mr. White was about to proceed to India on a similar mission, the announcement of the fact in our columns brought him many responses of sympathy and support. The address of the Association is 47, Victoria Street, S.W.

Elisha, the Prophet of Vision.

*II.—The Threefold Test.

By Rev. F. S. WEBSTER, M.A.

THE call that came to Elisha, as he was ploughing at Abel-meholah, was readily and gladly obeyed. It was the first great crisis in his life, and it found him not wanting. The next ten years passed quietly enough, for life is not all made up of crises. Nothing is told us of Elisha during this interval, but we know that his devoted care of Elijah earned for him the title "Elisha, the son of Shaphat, that poured water on the hands of Elijah."

(1) He had learned to stoop and serve. It was a great change from the home life of love, and honour, and comfort, to the wilderness life of exile and privation. A faint picture of Him "who, in the manifested Being of God subsisting, took upon Him the manifested being of a bond-servant." As Elisha, the young master and heir, became the servant of Elijah, so Jesus, "knowing that He came from God . . washed the disciples' feet." "He who was rich, for our sakes became poor." This is the first test that comes to every one whom God will use. Can he suffer with Christ? Can he stoop that he may serve? For "before honour is humility."

(2) He had learned to obey God rather than man. The second test is connected with the last solitary walk of Elijah and Elisha. There is something intensely pathetic about this story. We are told that the beautiful orange groves near the town of Jaffa are so sheltered that, for some months in the year, the perfectly-ripe fruit of last year is seen hanging side by side with the blossom of this. Blossom and fruit were side by side in this journey. Elijah so fully-matured as to be ready for translation. Elisha just blossoming out in the beauty of early faith and devotion. Look at that old saint for a moment. He is a childless man, yet he leaves a legacy to one who calls him, Father. He is a penniless outcast, yet he bequeaths the most valuable possession in the world. If the chief joy of parents is to see their children doing good work in the world, what was Elijah's joy as Elisha clave to him with such devotion, and manifested such true spirituality?

But Elisha was tested as to whether he would obey God or listen to human counsel. Three times Elijah said to him, "Tarry ye here, for the Lord hath called me" to go forward. He did not express a wish to be left alone. He simply tested Elisha, as Naomi tested Orpah and Ruth. It was eight miles from Gilgal to Bethel, and the last half of the journey was along a dry watercourse, stony and difficult. But while he said "Tarry," he meant "Come," and so the love of Elisha read it, and rejoiced the tender heart of the rough prophet by his thrice uttered, "As the Lord liveth, and as my soul liveth, I will not leave thee." May we so respond to our Master. May our heart's love be so entwined around Him, that, however difficult the path of our pilgrimage, we may say, "I will not leave Thee."

Very different was the attitude of the sons of the prophets.

THERE WERE THEOLOGICAL COLLEGES,

so to speak, at Bethel and Jericho, and Elijah's last journey took him past these, that he might be cheered by seeing a little of the fruit of his magnificent championship of God's truth. But these sons of the prophets received no special blessing as Elisha did. They knew Elijah was to be taken away. They eagerly announced the sad tidings, and, with strange indelicacy, seemed anxious to talk about it with Elisha. Perhaps they wanted to discuss who was to succeed Elijah, and what effect his departure would have on God's work in Israel. But there was no sense of need, no longing for deeper blessing. Elisha would have nothing to say to them, and while he pressed on to share in his master's triumph, they "stood to view afar off." There are many like them to-day. When God is working mightily in revival, in deepening and quickening energy of the Holy Spirit, the few like Elisha follow on to the end, to share the blessing, the many look on from a distance, viewing things critically and curiously, but not sharing in the opened heaven and the outpoured blessing. There are many who recommend this standing aloof, this policy of non-committal. A prophet who has received his orders from God must carry them through to the end, whatever others say.

(3) He had learned to put first things first. Once more Elisha must be tested. The two have crossed Jordan. That symbol of death has parted before the smiting of Elijah's mantle. It was not fitting that he who was to be honoured by a deathless translation should wrestle with the swift waters of Jordan. And, Christian, if you will, in the power of the Holy Ghost, appropriate Christ crucified, your Righteousness and Life, you, too, will pass through death, if the Lord tarry, unharmed. Then came Elijah's question, "Ask what I shall do for thee." Elisha did not hesitate. He knew what he wanted. There was one longing in his heart, so intense that it dominated all others. "Let a double portion of thy spirit be upon me." His soul was a living flame of pure desire. He had much to learn, for such a request should hardly have been made to Elijah, such a blessing it was not in Elijah's power to bestow. The answer given, therefore, was conditional. "If thou see me when I am taken from thee, it shall be so unto thee." This is the supreme test of all. The pure in heart shall see. A limp longing for blessing, if it can be obtained without cost or sacrifice, receives no answer. No modern telescope could have revealed to the sons of the prophets what Elisha saw. Their vision was dimmed by lukewarmness and the carnal mind. It is the men of one desire who are blessed.

"Missionary Day" in Manchester.

SOME years ago it was laid upon the heart of the promoter of the Strangeways Meetings for the "Deepening of the Spiritual Life," that one complete day should be set apart for pleading the great cause of foreign missions—the world's evangelization; which was in our Lord's thoughts just before He ascended to glory, and formed the subject of his last command to his disciples: "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature."

"Missionary Day" has since then been "an institution at the Strangeways Conference Hall. Each year one of the closing days in October has been set apart at this centre of Home Mission work, among the poor and neglected (the centre also of deep interest and practical help for those whom dear Reginald Radcliffe in anxious tones loved to speak of as "God's Heathen"), that the great cause of the world's evangelization may be pleaded from nine in the morning until nine in the evening by prayer and speech and song.

Notwithstanding wind and storm and rain, the hall was filled throughout the day—afternoon and evening crowded. Rev. Prebendary Macdonald, rector of Kersal, presided, and was surrounded on the platform by ministers and friends of missions of all denominations. As one well-known clergyman remarked in his address, "It was a unique gathering—would to God we had it repeated in every city in the kingdom!—when, laying aside all our differences, a world's great need and a Saviour's great love draw us together."

A half-hour's earnest prayer meeting gave a tone to the day. Then, following the usual customs, Psalm lxxii. was read, and the hushed stillness which prevailed made it evident that each one felt that "a greater than Solomon" was here.

The opening address was given by Mr. Eugene Stock, C.M.S., in which great principles were laid down regarding the world's evangelization. First, The meaning of the word. Second, Why should it be undertaken? Third, By whom should it be undertaken? Fourth, How should it be undertaken? Fifth, Where should it be undertaken? Sixth, When should it be undertaken? In enforcing these six points, which covered the whole question, much valuable information was given and specially earnest and solemn were the thoughts on the third question, By whom? The commission was not given to angels, but to men and women who knew the Lord Jesus as their Saviour, and who were qualified spiritually, mentally, and physically for the work. The closing words on question six, as to when, were—"Now, there is no time for delay, for while we wait the heathen die without Christ."

The cause of God's scattered but never forgotten people was pleaded by Rev. David Baron, who took for a Bible reading Rom. ix. 1-5. He described Paul as a "model missionary." Not only did he long and pray and labour for Israel, but he was even ready to offer to sacrifice his own salvation if it might gain theirs. But only One could ensure our acceptance with God by becoming a curse for us, and his work is a complete one. Mr. Baron drew a remarkable parallel between the life of the individual Israel and the history of the nation, showing that this is the Jacob period of their life, but Peniel shall yet come when they shall see the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ, and have power with God and with man; for God's promises are neither annulled nor transferred to the Gentiles, as some seem to suppose!

Next, Mr. Harold Wills, as a representative of the L.M.S., followed, and in manly, vigorous tones told something of the society's work in India, and of his special call to work among the educated young men of South India, especially in Travancore, where hundreds are educated in the various colleges and schools, and where he is brought into close touch with them at a hostelry which he has established. It was very cheering to hear how caste is crumbling, and how the leaven of Christianity is permeating the whole of South India. Reference was also made to the value of Mr. Gelson Gregson's work in the Syrian church.

After an interval for lunch and another half-hour of prayer—interspersed with missionary hymns, the singing of which formed a feature of the day—a large number gathered for the afternoon meeting, where the first address was given by Rev. W. St. Clair Tisdall, C.M.S., of Persia, who gave a short sketch of the ancient features of the people and the country, and told us that it cost something to follow Christ in Persia, where confession of his Name is usually followed by imprisonment and death. Medical work has been much used in getting at the hearts of the people.

Then followed a very solemn and touching part of the day, when China and the murdered missionaries was laid upon all hearts by a powerful address from Mr. Stanley Smith. In closing, Mr. Smith asked that our lives might be characterized by more self-denial, so that ten missionaries may take the place of every one of the lives laid down in Shansi. Rev. Wetton Cox, secretary of the Moravian Missions Aid Society, spoke of the devotion of the Moravian missionaries, and of the wonderful blessing given to their labours.

The evening found us again in the hall listening to the story of "Our Own Missionary," Miss Creame, C.I.M., who is almost entirely supported by the efforts and self-denial of the children and young people in the various homes connected with the refuge. Coming from the province of Honan, Miss Cream had much to tell of encouragement and blessing in the work.

At this point our prayers ascended for Miss Dodson, the medical missionary, sent out by Strangeways, who is very ill.

From China thoughts were carried to East London, where Mr. Baron gave us a glimpse into the daily work among the Jews, and of testimony. Dr. Baedeker followed with the story of his work in Russia, and in Finland, among the prisoners.

The practical results of these "Missionary Days" is to follow—hitherto it has been the means of adding—chiefly through the liberality of one—considerably to the funds of some of our leading missionary societies; but not only in money, consecrated lives at home and abroad have traced their first impulse to this day.

The Chinese Crisis.—I.

By Rev. W. REMFRY HUNT, Shanghai.

THE RIDDLE.

ASIA is the cradle of the human race. The anomalous thing about it is, that the older she grows the poorer and weaker she becomes. In national and industrial, not to mention political and international affairs, China is in the infant period of helplessness and ignorance. The causes of this travesty are not far to seek. The riddle is complex, but not insoluble. Heathenism has crystallized the life of the nation, and the result is seen to-day in the industrial stagnation, political corruption, social disorder, and moral ruin of the empire, which has threatened in its own downfall to incite universal war.

THE ANSWER.

The Yellow drama is one of quickly-shifting scenes. It is not easy to get a steady focus on the foreground. With amazing rapidity and in a startling manner, the events of the past few weeks have changed the whole situation in Peking, Nanking, Shanghai, and Hong Kong. The lifting of the veil by the allied armies from the Celestial capital has revealed the plot. Imperialistic edicts inspired the insurrection. The Dowager Empress and the Manchu princes aided and financed the dark design. It was a cruel, premeditated, and treacherous scheme to exterminate the hated foreigner, and drive him for ever from the shores of "the land of Sinim."

THE "BOXER" MOVEMENT.

The "Boxer" movement is not a new organization. It is one of the revolutionary sects and secret societies. It is a religio-political force. Throughout the present Manchu dynasty it has existed under various forms and names. From the ignorant and lazy Taoistic and Buddhistic priesthood it draws many of its followers. They make up the militia of the Chinese army. Favoured and financed with Imperial aid, the leaders of this anti-dynastic coterie took on new impetus after the memorable coup d'état in Peking some two years since. From that reactionary movement dates the origin of the present insurrection.

On the banners of these bloodthirsty and fanatical hordes is inscribed the Chinese characters, "Yih Ho Chuan," which means, "United Volunteer Band." This, by a pun on the last character or hieroglyphic, is made to mean "Boxer." Prince Tuan mobilised these rebels. Its banners were unfurled all through Manchuria. The revolt spread like a prairie fire. The cry was made from the Imperial Palace, and the firebrand thrown (into states already kindled for revolution) by the court and mandarinate.

From the Imperial Palace, Prince Tuan circulated anti-foreign edicts all over the empire. Official and accredited couriers were ordered to spread these commands into every city and town in the provinces at the express rate of 200 miles per diem. This was carried out. In three short months the northern and central provinces were swept clean of missionaries, miners, railway agents, telegraph offices, foreign naval and military schools, and everything savouring of modern and scientific improvements.

A REIGN OF TERROR.

During most of this time anarchy, rapine, pillage, disorder, and the general régime of insurrectionary devastation was laying waste the fairest and richest food-producing districts. The result is an awful famine.

It was in the provinces of Shansi, Chili, and Honan, that the missionaries suffered most. The atrocities (details of which are unfit for publication) which were perpetrated upon the highest and noblest womanhood of the century, and the frenzy of these demon-possessed ruffians, whose barbarous passions claimed, in cold-blooded murder, more than one hundred and sixty foreign missionaries—not to mention thousands of native Christians, who are regarded as incendiaries—these things are surely a heinous crime against humanity and a disavowal of international obligations.

THE CLASH OF CIVILIZATIONS.

The causes which lie at the base of the trouble, and which have with such scientific certainty produced the terrible collision of ideals, have had their origin and still have their evolution from within the national existence. The real nature of the event is only just dawning upon the minds of the Chinese masses. This is a rising, too, of the people, and is far more momentous in its issues than a mere conflict with the Government. It is anti-progressive, anti-modern, anti-Christian, anti-foreign, and even anti-dynastic.

From the base upwards it is a tremendous politico-protestant action, in which 400,000,000 of the human race are wildly, and yet with determined energy, struggling to throw off the bonds of national servitude, the tyranny of illegal taxation, the terrors of officialdom, the demands of bribery, the corrupt injustice of the yâmen (criminal court). The widespread belief that "it is the policy of the nations to dismember the Empire"—this has produced a condition bordering on frenzy among the masses, unloosed the basest passions, and fanned the angry flames of the present widespread conflagration.

The Indian Famine.

FOOD AND CLOTHING SUPPLIES.

THE work of providing food and clothing for the starving and naked sufferers from famine proceeds apace. We have been enabled to despatch the following gifts by the s.s. City of Lucknow:—One ton of biscuits, donated by Messrs. McCall and Stephen, one ton from Messrs. John Walker, Ltd., and 100 cases (each 16lb.) of oat flour from Messrs. A. and R. Scott, Ltd. The above are well-known Glasgow firms. We have also been able to send 185 cases (in all 8,880 tins) of condensed milk from the Anglo-Swiss Condensed Milk Co., and between forty and fifty thousand yards of material for clothing, with needles and thread, so that the orphans, both boys and girls, can be engaged in the work of making garments for themselves. All these supplies are sent freight free, by the kindness of Messrs. George Smith and Sons, owners of "City" line.

Rev. Dennis Osborne, of Poona, left England for Marseilles, en route for Bombay, where he will arrive in time to assist in the distribution of these supplies of food and clothing among the most necessitous. Further consignments, however, are urgently needed. We would suggest, with regard to the clothing, that to give sums of money so that we may purchase materials in bulk, would be preferable to sending us small parcels of clothing. Donations for this purpose should be addressed to the office of The Christian.

NOTES FROM WORKERS.

Rev. J. Stevenson, Mission House, Parantij, writes, under date October 10: "Here in Parantij, where the distress, if measured by the death-rate among our children, was next in magnitude to that among the Bhils, we have not quite turned the corner yet. The poorhouse is still pretty full, and only to-day I saw some children picking grains out of the dust as in the worst days. One or two of these were as bad specimens as I ever saw; one girl of about eleven—just bones—could hardly rise when a poorhouse official told her to get up, and go along with him to the poorhouse."

The lady superintendent of the C.M.S. Girls' Orphanage at Clarkabad, Lahore District, Miss M. S. Worsfold, writes: "Again I have the pleasure of thanking your readers for kind help. I hope shortly to bring our famine waifs on to our Orphanage. So far, they have been at a convalescent camp near Amritsar, under medical charge, as, when they were brought from Gujarat they were not in a fit condition to be put with our other children. When I saw them recently, I was delighted to notice how fast they were regaining health and strength. It was a great pleasure, too, to find that they were already beginning to acquire Bible knowledge. Some could tell stories of Bible pictures quite intelligently."

Dr. G. P. Taylor, of Ahmedabad, sends another interesting letter on the position in Gujarat: "There is still very much that needs to be done by way of rehabilitating the farmers. Many of them, and many shepherds too, have and unless they can be supplied with bullocks, or the shepherds with cows or goats, their condition will be sufficiently distressful. They must simply fall from their former position of comparative independence to the status of day-labourers, and will then largely lose heart and hope for the future. Our Irish Presbyterian Mission has taken, in all, about 1,500 famine orphans, and the matter of their support will soon become a serious question. Each child will cost us on the average about £3 per annum, and will stay for an average period of five years. These young people, now brought under the wing of the Mission, will, we naturally hope, pass into the Christian Church; and it becomes thus of supreme importance that they be given a suitable education, and put in a fair way of learning some trade. An Indian Orphan Fund seems an almost necessary corollary to the Famine Fund."

Dr. James Shepherd, of the United Presbyterian Mission, Udarpur, Rajputana, writes:—You could not have sent a more opportune gift than that just received. It will enable me to extend a great deal of help to the starving Bhils. I have here an orphanage of 221 Bhil children, most of them waifs. I am glad to say that many of the famine Bhils have now returned, with the assistance of food and seed grain, to cultivate their holdings. Until the growing crop is reaped, however, many of them will have to be supplied with food and clothing. The latter is the now, as unless we clothe the people and give them blankets they will fall easy victims to the terrible malarial fever, which our excessive rainfall is bound to produce. In fact, it has begun already, and not a few in their weakened state have succumbed to the disease. The mortality from famine and cholera has been appalling, but one thing has helped us, who have been in the thick of it all, and that has been the ready assistance and Christian sympathy which good friends at home have expressed. Such noble efforts, will not lose their reward, but will promote that for which we are daily labouring and praying—the wider extension of Christ's kingdom in this vast dependency."

Countess Schimmelmann.

THE evangelistic work of Countess Schimmelmann continues to be attended with many manifestations of Divine blessing.

A correspondent writes:—The warm sympathy of English friends touched and cheered the Countess. She left England with the idea of raising the money needed for her work (£2,000) by literary work, but this will be impossible, as the requests calling her to hold meetings are so urgent that she cannot refuse them. At Bielefeld, although she had never before been in the city, the large hall was filled long before the time for commencement. The iron-spiked gates had to be shut, but the people took ladders and climbed over, in spite of the police. A lady who has visited the Home for Fishermen at Göhren speaks in high terms of that institution, which is under the direction of the Countess. The Crown Princess of Denmark lately invited the Countess to pay her a visit and describe the work. At another town the factory girls filled the place of meeting, and many were in tears as the speaker told of the love of Christ. The Countess is preparing for an evangelistic tour through the chief cities of Southern Germany.

The Gipsy Boy and the Crab Apple Tree.

"Trees of righteousness" (Isa. lxi. 3).

IT was at a service for gipsy children in the hop-pickers' mission tent that the following occurred:—

Many children of the forest highways and hedges had come in all unwashed and ragged, and as restless as hares. The city missionary talked to them about wolves that worry the sheep and lambs; of lions that roar and seek to devour; of hawks and doves, and then of trees, both good and bad. He asked the children to name some good trees, and they shouted "apple trees," "pear trees," "plum trees," &c. "Bad trees," and they told of trees on which grew poison berries, red, black, or green. They knew good from bad, what to eat and what to avoid. They became interested in "human trees," and quickly named bad fruit, almost in the very words of Gal. v. 19-21; (2) and good fruit as in verses 22, 23.

"If I had an apple tree growing in my garden that in spring put forth abundant blossom, in summer, plenty of leaves, but in autumn produced no fruit, what ought I to do with such a tree?" asked the missionary.

Then stood up a gipsy boy with flashing eyes, and holding his arm up he shouted, "I'd dig about that tree and manure him."

"Well answered—thank you, my dear boy. Now, suppose I dig about the tree and manure it. Winter passes away; in spring time it is filled with bloom, in summer the birds sing in its leafy branches, but in autumn I look for apples and there are none?"

Leaping to his feet, with arms outstretched and in a pleading voice, the boy said:

"I'd well whitewash it, sir."

"Capital advice, thank you. Well, I go home. I dig about the tree, manure it and whitewash it, and the winter passes away. Spring sees it covered with flowers of promise, in summer birds sing songs of gladness in the boughs; but, alas, in autumn not an apple is found."

With a sigh, a rueful countenance, and in a sad voice, the boy said:

"He's no good. I'd saw him down."

"What is this?" asked the missionary, holding up a bough laden with fruit.

"Crab-apples," shouted the children.

"Are crab-apples good?"

"No."

"Listen, children; think before you reply. If I went up the lane and dug up the crab-tree from which I broke off the bough, if I took the tree and planted it in my garden and it grew, what fruit would you expect it to produce?"

"Crab-apples," shouted the children.

"Listen, children. Can anything be done to the old sour crab-apple tree, to cause it to produce honey sweets, russets, and golden pips?"

"It can't be done," said the boy. The other children remained silent.

"Long years ago," said the missionary, "when I was a boy, I went with my father to a field. He dug a crab-apple tree and planted it in his garden. An old gardener then grafted into the branches of the crab-tree some pips, and to-day its branches are bearing golden pippins instead of sour crab-apples!"

The gipsy boy clapped his hands gleefully, and the children cheered because the old crab-tree brought forth good fruit. "Wherefore lay apart all filthiness and superfluity of naughtiness, and receive with meekness the engrafted Word which is able to save your souls" (James i. 21).

Note.—The gipsy boy above referred to in this true story, and his cousin who was also present at the service, both enlisted as soldiers, and were sent to South Africa. One was killed in battle, and the other died of enteric fever this year.

Both youths had left the wretched hedgerow life, became soldiers of the Queen, and I fain hope are the planting of the Lord, that He might be glorified.

"I would not give up Jesus."

FAR, far away is the land of China. There the pig-tailed Chinaman counts his hundreds of brass coins into his monster purse, and there the small-footed Chinawoman toddles laboriously up and down her little room performing her daily duties.

In one of the cities which abound in that great land, surrounded by high and solid walls, and entered by great gateways, the heavy gates of which are shut by night, a little company of children were gathered.

Chinese girls in a Christian school; big girls and little girls, good girls and naughty girls clustered round me, for lessons were ended and a happy time we spent together.

True stories I told them, stories of those who had bravely taken up the Cross and in spite of persecution had kept the faith.

Grave, earnest eyes, looked into mine, and I think more than one heart echoed the sentiment expressed by one tall, serious girl, that come what might, she "would not give up Jesus."

Soon the good-night was said. Weary heads were pillowed, and heavy eyes were closed in peaceful sleep. But they remembered on the following day our talk of the evening before.

Bright, happy girls, full of life and energy and joy, day by day, singing the praises of Jesus, and some of them trying to follow faithfully in his steps, with parents and teachers to help them—what thought had they of persecution?

The clouds were gathering, however, and now in poor China they have burst, aed who is to shelter those lambs from the cruel storm? Will they be sought out and killed because they "will not give up Jesus"?

In Isaiah xxxii. 2, we read, "a man shall be . . . a covert from the tempest." That man is Jesus.

Will you, dear children, who know Jesus and love Him, pray for those and other dear Chinese children who are determined "not to give up Jesus"?

Pray that Jesus will be to them "a covert from the tempest" at this troubled time in China. E. R.

Royalty and Fishergirls.—The Duchess of Fife gave on Saturday, Oct. 27, a tea and coffee supper to the fishergirls at the new buildings of the British and Foreign Sailors' Society, recently opened in Great Yarmouth. The following telegram was sent to the Duke of Fife: "Fishergirls and fishermen at the tea and coffee supper, representing some 7,000 at Yarmouth and the East Coast, beg to present their heartiest thanks to the Duchess of Fife, and they hope her Royal Highness will often find health renewed by the bonnie banks and braes of Scotland."

Christian Endeavour Topic.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 4.

Are you doing your best? (Matt. xxv. 14-30).

THE five-talented men are the geniuses of the world. They are successful in everything they touch. Charles Kingsley botanist, geologist, author, preacher, artist, poet. Ion Keith Falconer, champion cyclist, Arabic professor, devoted missionary. W. E. Gladstone, conversant with every branch of literature, versatile as a linguist, accomplished as an orator, as an author, as a political economist.

For my part, I would like to be the man with two talents, the happy medium; on the one hand, not exposed to the temptations of genius; on the other, not quite at the minimum. It would be a good inscription for a grave-stone, "The man that had received the two talents came."

But probably we are most interested in the man with the one talent. The others have been faithful and industrious. They bring up their neatly-written and orderly reports. We feel that they have deserved the "well-done" that greets them, and we look on with calm approval, as they pass off to enter the joy of their lord. But our interest is excited by the third man, who brings the talent which he had recently unearthed from the hole, where it had lain buried whilst he had spent the precious time in indolence. But why did the man with the one talent make such ill use of it? Ah, this is a true touch of life! The one-talented men see that they can do so little, that they do nothing. They are crushed and enfeebled by a sense of their own insignificance. Many young men and women start in life with high and pure aims, but presently they find they can do so little, their opportunities are so meagre, their influence so limited, their power so scanty, that after a few struggles they give up in despair, saying, "I can do so little, that I may as well do nothing."

But the world will never be saved unless the one-talented people, who are the great majority, can be aroused. The world is not going to be made good and beautiful by a few Samsons, but by a vast multitude of men of ordinary make and muscle, who shall consecrate this, so far as in them lies. Probably we shall do more for the world by getting five men with one talent each to work for it, than by inducing one man with five talents to use them for his fellows. The five men can put the whole energy of their manhood behind their single talents, whilst the one man has only the driving power of one.

No doubt the one-talented people are harder to arouse. The genius, or hero, who is summoned to great tasks, feels the mighty stimulus of his vast opportunity, and of the applauding crowds. No one notices the man with his humble one talent. There is no meed of praise, no bursts of cheering. Hence it is probably a greater thing in God's sight to use one talent faithfully than many. It is a greater test of the quality of the soul to go on doing one small thing well, than to be able to turn with brilliant versatility from one talent to another. The monotony of life presses hard on the soul that has only one string to its bow, one tune to play, one act to perform in the great factory where labour is so carefully sub-divided.

But the one thing that our Lord requires of us is to be faithful—faithful in a very little. He is watching each of us with great eagerness, because He knows, as we cannot do, how much our position in the other world depends on our fidelity in this. It is for our sake, more than for his own, that He is so anxious.

It is remarkable, when men are unfaithful and careless, when they hold their own luxurious ease, as of more importance than God's interests, what low and degraded views they conceive of Him. They think and speak of Him as hard, unjust, and unreasonable; as exacting more than He has a right to expect. The one-talented man is in danger of becoming a slothful and wicked servant, of misjudging his Lord, and of being cast away as worthless and useless into the outer darkness of despair.

C.E. NOTES.

The North London C.E. Union has planned a series of four-day conferences in each of the six groups of the Union. The subjects will be as follows:—Monday, "C.E. Platform of Principles;" Tuesday, "C.E. and Home Missions;" Wednesday, "C.E. and Foreign Missions;" Thursday, "Personal Consecration."

* * *

"Advance Endeavour!" the official report of the Convention, which has just been published by the Sunday School Union (2s. 6d.), is well worth any time spent in its perusal. Photos are given of all the leading speakers and workers, as well as illustrations of various meetings, and different parts of the Palace and grounds as they were fitted up for the use of Endeavourers. The volume contains the utterances of the most representative men of the Christian Church in all parts of the world, the majority of the addresses at the Convention being given in full. It is in every way helpful and interesting and inspiring.

International S.S. Lesson.

November 11, 1900.

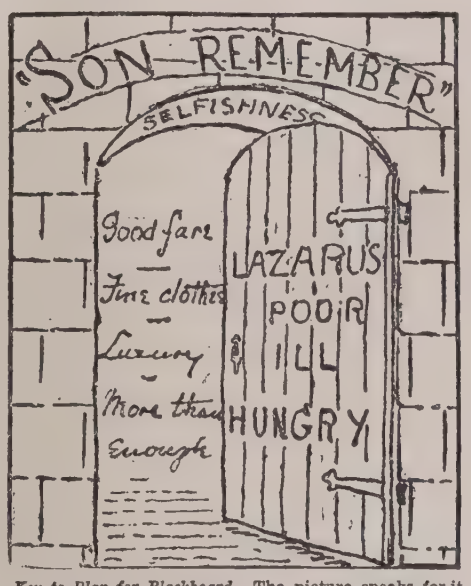
The Rich Man and Lazarus. (Luke xvi. 19-31.)

Golden Text.—"Lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven" (Matt. vi. 20).

Introduction.

THE lesson to-day is full of contrasts; only in one point are the two men alike—they both "died."

Rich man—	Poor man—
Fine clothes	Rags
Good fare	No food
Luxury	Beggary
More than enough	Only asked crumbs
Died	Died
Was buried	Was carried by angels
Down	Up
Restlessness	Rest
Thirsty	Satisfied



Key to Plan for Blackboard.—The picture speaks for itself. The door tells of an outside and an inside. The words show the rich man's advantages. Lazarus, "outside," had nothing.

First Scene: The Rich Man.

(19) Living all for his own pleasure, all for this world. No thought for the future (last week's lesson). The best of clothes, best of food, every comfort and luxury this world can give, all that money could buy was his. At the outside of his gate or door portal was a poor beggar laid, and the rich man had not yet learnt Christ's meaning of "inasmuch" (Matt. xxv. 40), or he would have had pity and fed the beggar. (21) We are not even told if Lazarus had the "sweepings of the crumbs" that he asked for. See another rich man, but just as foolish (Luke xii. 19, 20); and another (Luke xviii. 23, 24). With none of these was a thought about laying up treasure in heaven (Matt. vi. 19-21). It was all for this life only.

First Scene: Lazarus.

A poor, starving (21), helpless (20) beggar; ill in body (21), perhaps from want of food. Even the street dogs were kinder than the rich man.

Second Scene: Rich Man.

Death comes to all, rich and poor alike. (23) The Jews spoke of heaven as "Abraham's bosom." It was a grand funeral; no money spared; but how sad! a lost soul (Job. xxi. 13). (23, 24) "Being in hell;" "tormented;" (26) "great gulf" he cannot pass over; no bridge or plank. Once there means to stay there. (28-31) He thinks of his brothers; but he never heeded when he was on earth, neither will they. How fearfully sad!

Second Scene: Lazarus.

(22) Angel-borne in calm and quiet. How happy! How beautiful! No more suffering, no more hunger or thirst. All is rest, and peace, and comfort (Rev. vii. 17; xxi. 4).

Lessons We Learn.

That there is a future life.
That we all must die.
That there are two conditions in the after life—one with God, one away from God.

"As the tree falls so will it lie,
As the man lives so will he die;
As the man dies such will he be
All through the days of eternity."

Young Abstainers' Union.

AN enthusiastic gathering of young people filled the Egyptian Hall of the Mansion House the other day, on the occasion of the twenty-first anniversary of the Young Abstainers' Union.

The Lord Mayor, who presided, counselled the members to persevere, especially as the difficulties in the way of abstainers are not nearly so great as they used to be. Among people in all classes of society it is happily common to find those who abstain from all intoxicating beverages.

Miss Agnes Weston followed with words of congratulation to the Union on its coming of age, and went on to say that the example set by the members of the organization is out and out, fair and square, on the question. She besought them to fight against the forces of strong drink as long as they live, and ever bear in mind that theirs is a holy war. Much of Miss Weston's inspiring address was devoted to the advance of temperance in the Navy.

Rev. W. R. Mowll, speaking as an abstainer of twenty-three years' standing, and as one who had laboured as a clergyman in London for twenty-one years, said that there was no source of evil that he was acquainted with that was not mixed up in some shape or form with the use of stimulants.

Subsequent speakers were the Dowager Countess of Erroll, Mrs. Hind Smith, and the President, Mr. T. F. Victor Buxton, the last-named of whom mentioned that the 100th branch of the Union has been started.

Christmas Letter Mission.

YEAR by year The Christian calls attention to the work of the Christmas Letter Mission, an organization peculiarly adapted to meet the needs of Christian workers who aim at making the season, not only one of festivity and friendliness, but also of Gospel seed-sowing on a wide scale. Letters suitable for distribution among all classes, sick and well, young and old, are now ready to hand, with bright illustrations. They convey in happy anecdotal form the Christmas message of life and peace as well as seasonable good wishes.

Last year the new fishermen's and Spanish letters were well circulated at home and abroad; and this year a Yiddish letter has been added, which workers among our Jewish brethren will find useful. It is very carefully written by one who knows them well.

Our tramcar and omnibus men are glad to receive their Christmas letter, and large packets of these could be well distributed through the secretary of that department. Will some of your readers, to whom this work may be new, write to Messrs. Hazell, Watson, and Viney, 1, Creed Lane, E.C., who, on receipt of three stamps, will send report, catalogue, and a few sample letters.

Offers of co-operation, or gifts of letters folded and sorted, will be very thankfully received.

(Miss) E. Thornton,
Organizing Secretary.

Mr. Sankey's Movements.

AFTER a lapse of a quarter of a century Mr. Ira D. Sankey visited Greenock on October 21. Notwithstanding the early hour of the meeting, 9.20 a.m., there were nearly 3,000 people present. Colonel William Lamont presided. Mr. Sankey gave his address on the subject of "Singing through Egypt and Palestine." At the outset he remarked that he was delighted to stand on that platform once again. God had spared him to find as much interest as ever in the Gospel stirring the hearts of the people. He took that to be a token that the work accomplished there and elsewhere in Scotland twenty-six and twenty-seven years ago has not died out. The spirit of Gospel song, too, still prevails.

IN HEALTH AND STRENGTH

It is seldom there is seen in Greenock so large a gathering as that which filled the Town Hall in the evening. The proceedings were to commence at seven o'clock, but owing to the crowd which assembled at the main entrance the doors had to be opened an hour and a half previous to that time. In a remarkably short time the whole of the sitting accommodation in the building was taken up, and late comers had to be content with standing room. There were about present. Mr. Sankey's Service of Sacred Song and Story was heartily received.

After glorious meetings at Stirling, the esteemed Gospel singer commenced, on October 26, the first of three services at Glasgow, in St. Andrew's Hall. The building was crowded. Lord Overtoun presided, supported by Sir John Muir, Dr. Elder Cumming, and other local ministers and friends.

Lord Overtoun said it did not require that magnificent meeting to assure Mr. Sankey that he still lived in all their hearts. He was sure he gave expression to their feelings when he very warmly welcomed Mr. Sankey among them again. Those of them who had the privilege of knowing Mr. Sankey a quarter of a century ago would testify that he looked very much the same as ever—his eye undimmed and his natural force unabated—and as able as ever to sing with power, and by God's help and blessing, the which have so thrilled the hearts of innumerable thousands all over the world. But while they rejoiced to see Mr. Sankey, they felt deep sadness in their hearts because the dear companion of his labours, Mr. Moody, was no longer by his side. The speaker recalled the visits of Mr. Moody and Mr. Sankey, remarking that just as Mr. Moody's preaching gave a great stimulus to church work, so Mr. Sankey set people singing who had never sung before.

Mr. Sankey, who was warmly welcomed, said it was a joy again to see some of the faces that he had met that day. There were others who have faded and are gathered home to the place where their loved ones are gathering year by year and day by day, and where by God's grace all hoped to meet again and talk over the scenes through which they had passed on earth. He felt sad to receive such a welcome without his beloved friend, D. L. Moody, by his side. Mr. Sankey said that his experience during his present tour convinced him of the soundness of the work accomplished in the days gone by, and of the strength and power of the movement to which Lord Overtoun had referred.

On Sunday night the spacious building was filled to its utmost capacity, and thousands were turned away from the doors. An overflow meeting was held in Berkeley Street U.P. Church, which was also crowded in every part, large numbers being unable to gain admission. Lord Provost Chisholm presided in St. Andrew's Hall. Mr. Sankey sang several old favourites, as well as two or three newer hymns. The meeting was of an enthusiastic character throughout.

The Congregational Union.

IMPRESSIONS BY A MINISTER.

SOME impressions left by the late meetings of the Congregational Union at Newcastle-on-Tyne seem to be worth recording. The preparation of two programmes in a year—for the Union always has a May and an autumnal gathering—must be a difficult work; but we know of men who were tired a quarter of a century ago of the subject "Our Principles," then and still on the programme. By some exercise of imagination or observation of the needs of the times this might give place to another theme. The exposition of principles hardly seems necessary for such a representative audience as constantly meets to hear it.

IMPROVED METHODS

have much attention, and seem to get more and more. The mechanics of religion have great attraction for some minds, and the less success attends a method the more does method become a theme of meditation and discussion. Our impression has long been that not methods but power is the important question. Without this the finest methods fail, with it the poorest succeed. Power was the prayer of the early Church, and the Church at all stages of growth. This remark applies to the cry that has been raised for years to safeguard the entrance to the Congregational ministry. A purer and stronger life in the Churches would do more than anything else to create the right kind of ministry; for the ministry is the child of the Churches, if, on the other hand, the Churches are greatly made by the ministry. The increase of machinery will probably mean the increase of men who are "troubled about many things," and know only too little of the influence gained by sitting at the feet of Jesus.

DIFFERENT GROUPS

of men may easily be traced in the assembly, who have different views and feelings and ideals. As no ministry is more accessible than the Congregational, it is little wonder that its component parts are somewhat heterogeneous, and that those who have come from other communions still retain a preference for much that they have left. Not a little of the dissatisfaction and unrest which are always so prominent at the Union meetings probably come from a desire to have incompatibles joined. And this feeling is not increasing the comfort of men who were born and bred in Independency. This collecting into groups may be traced along other lines. Thus the Temperance workers and reformers have for many years been a growing party, and will no doubt bring the Union into line with the Temperance movement, even in its most advanced demands. Then, again, there are brethren who would delight to see more time given to spiritual exercises, and to the consideration of themes bearing more directly upon spiritual results than some of the topics now chosen. Were this done it might add to the unity and efficiency of the meetings; and the eagerness with which sermons are listened to, and devotional exercises are entered into, indicates that there is large readiness for a change.

THEOLOGY

has its own time and opportunity, and draws a large audience. The theme this year was historical and doctrinal, and was in the hands of Dr. Robert Mackintosh, of Manchester; it was "The Doctrinal Changes of the Century." Here again we seemed to lack that practical, living touch which men in the midst of daily duties and difficulties so greatly need. After all, the important thing is to have a theology drawn directly from the Word of God, as John Howe drew his, which can be of immediate and effective use in the preaching of repentance and faith.

Brentwood Christian Convention.—The third Convention for the deepening of the spiritual life of believers is to be held on November 20, 21, and 22, in Brentwood Town Hall. The speakers include Preb. Webb-Peploe, Rev. H. B. Macartney, Rev. Dr. Barnes, Pastor Fuller Gooch, and others. The Convener is Rev. S. H. Wilkinson, "Shalom," Brentwood.

Commissioner and Mrs. Booth-Clibborn.

DURING a recent visit to Dublin, Commissioner and Mrs. Booth-Clibborn, better known as La Maréchale, addressed a public meeting in the Friends' Meeting House, which was crowded.

A correspondent writes: Mr. and Mrs. Booth-Clibborn gave an interesting account of eighteen years' labour as leaders of the Salvation Army work among various Continental Nationalities, with remarkable experiences of Divine blessing, and thrilling cases of conversion among infidels, Anarchists, and bigoted opponents of Gospel truth. Those privileged to be present seemed deeply touched by the narratives, which manifested so unmistakably God's power over the hearts and consciences of sinners, and how He can protect and deliver his servants, often under the most trying and dangerous circumstances.

The experiences related made many of the hearers feel humbled in the thought of how much more might be done by those in our own land for the salvation of immortal souls.

Our hearts were moved in seeing and hearing again in Dublin, after so many years, in the person of Commissioner Clibborn, one whose labours as a soul-winner and a minister of the Society of Friends had been owned of God in former years in Ireland. But it was felt by all that our losses had indeed been the gain of multitudes on the Continent. Gladness was also expressed to listen to the Maréchale for the first time in our city. A warm welcome had been insured to her beforehand by the story, well known to most present, how she, the eldest daughter of General and Mrs. Booth, volunteered for the arduous task of spreading the Gospel in Paris and France, and of her fruitful experiences there. Prayers and loving thoughts will follow these workers to their home in Amsterdam (139, Weesperzijde), and their present field of labour in Holland and Belgium.

Women's Missionary Work.

A CONFERENCE of Women Workers of the C.M.S. was opened by a Reception given by the Archbishop of Dublin and Mrs. Peacocke, Tuesday, October 23, at 8 p.m., in the Rotunda Buildings, too many friends having accepted invitations to admit of their gathering at the Palace.

The Archbishop spoke impressively on the progress of missionary work, especially as carried on by women, and enforced the need of spirituality in all plans and purposes. The Misses Gollock, Miss Maude, Miss Storr, Miss Furley, of Uganda, and other well-known lady workers and speakers contributed to render Tuesday and the following days helpful and delightful. Devotional and intercessory meetings were held at 10.15 a.m. and 5 p.m. on the 24th and 25th. Public missionary meetings at 3 p.m., and the time from 11.15 to 1 was devoted to discussion, reports, "practical papers," and details of work.

The numbers attending our afternoon gatherings were so large that an "overflow" was necessary on Thursday, Mr. R. McConachie, C.S.I. (Punjab), kindly lending the assistance of his earnest and enthusiastic words both on Tuesday and Thursday, when the Right Rev. Bishop Day presided.

On Friday morning a service and Holy Communion in the Rotunda Chapel formed a fitting close to the Conference, an impressive address being delivered by Rev. Charles Dowse, M.A. (incumbent of Christ Church, Leeson Park). Miss Minna Gollock kindly met those members of Conference, who still had subjects for discussion, afterwards for an hour's talk and consideration of "ways and means." It will be sufficient to mention Miss Bradshaw's name as hon. sec. of Conference to intimate that all arrangements were carried out in the best possible way, a large staff of "young lady stewards," and other helpers, contributing to the success of this most useful series of meetings. We wish that space allowed a fuller report.

C. Maud Battersby.

All Souls, Langham Place, W.—Rev. F. S. Webster, M.A., is continuing his addresses on Friday mornings at 11.30 on "Elisha, the Prophet of Vision." The subjects for November are: November 2, "Empty Ditches;" November 9, "Empty Vessels;" November 16, "For Empty Home;" November 23, "The Faith of a Little Maid;" November 30, "The Mistakes of a Great Man."

Welsh Notes.

THE authorities of the South Wales Wesleyan Synod have issued an appeal for additional subscriptions to the Sustentation Fund. Commenting upon the appeal, a leading Methodist weekly points out that the average stipend of a married minister amongst the Wesleyan Methodists in South Wales is about £100 a year. The Sustentation Fund augments this to the extent of £8 8s. The strictures passed on such a condition of things are certainly called for, but bad as these latter are, they are not to be compared with the financial position of ministers amongst other Nonconformist bodies in the Principality.

At the Llandaff Diocesan Conference, held at Newport, Mon., on Wednesday, October 24, the Bishop of the diocese gave it as his opinion that Sunday schools as at present carried on are a failure. Other speakers expressed similar views. The Bishop advocated a return to the old system of catechising, which, he said, had been attended with beneficial results in his own parish.

At a meeting of the Cardiff and District Free Church Council held on Friday, October 26, arrangements were made for a mission to be held at Cardiff on February 16-26 of next year. The missioner is to be Rev. John McNeill.

Amongst the provisions in the will of the late Marquis of Bute is one whereby a substantial sum of money is bequeathed to an institution in Cardiff for the benefit of seamen, and which at present is in need of financial assistance. Unfortunately the legacy has attached to it a condition which will prove unacceptable to many. It is that Roman Catholic nurses shall be allowed to visit the institution.

The sixth of a series of quarterly meetings for the deepening of the spiritual life was held on October 23 and 24 in the Lecture Hall of the Y.W.C.A., 27, Charles Street, Cardiff. There were four meetings in all, Tuesday evening, Wednesday afternoon and evening, with an early prayer meeting on Wednesday morning at the Y.M.C.A. Helpful addresses were given by Rev. W. H. Tindall, of Weybridge, and those who were privileged to be present evidently felt the power of the Holy Spirit. It is a matter of deep regret that the attendance at these quarterly meetings is not greater, although we are thankful to note an increasing interest awakened.

About Books.

BOOKS ON THE WAR.

A COMPREHENSIVE account of Christian work as a whole, in connection with the field operations of the British forces in South Africa, is given in From Aldershot to Pretoria. The author, Rev. W. E. Sellers, brings to his task the necessary knowledge and sympathy, and has produced a volume calculated to inform and stimulate as well as interest. The illustrations afford some pathetic glimpses of the sorrows of war. (2s. 6d. Religious Tract Society.)

Another handsome volume on the same absorbing topic is With our Soldiers at the Front; or, Conflict and Victory in South Africa. By Henry Johnson (2s. 6d.). Here we have an outline sketch of the war, illustrated with stories and incidents from battlefield, camp, and hospital, the narrative concluding with events which occurred shortly after the occupation of Pretoria. Special attention is devoted to deeds of valour and forms of Christian work. Many who are still "all in a haze" about the war and its beginnings, will be glad to read the story in these pages. There are excellent engravings. (Religious Tract Society.)

Chaplains in Khaki is a volume of letters written by Methodist ministers who, as chaplains appointed under the authority of the War Office, are attached to various divisions of the British and Colonial Army, serving in Cape Colony, Natal, the Orange River Colony, and the Transvaal. It contains stories of patriotism and loyalty, humanity of action, and Christian devotion. The pages have a peculiar interest, and should have many readers. (2s. 6d. C. H. Kelly.)

Religious Tract Society.

The Care of the Home, by Lucy H. Yates (1s.), supplies helpful hints on matters connected with domestic life—small things upon which the health and comfort of the home so largely depend.

Knots: Quiet Chats with Boys and Girls, by Rev. Archibald N. Mackray, M.A. (2s.) Eighteen in number, the talks are singularly good. The young will read them; and those who teach the young will find much that is suggestive in the pages.

Hidden Beauties of Nature, by Richard Kerr, F.G.S. (2s. 6d.) This is a new edition of a capital book, admirably illustrated from sketches and photographs. Those who would work with the microscope will find splendid guidance in these pages.

The Great Rest-Giver, by the late W. Haig Miller. (2s. 6d.) We cordially commended this book when originally issued. It has been reprinted in a new and very attractive form. It is full of practical insight into life, and rich in suggestion as to the wisest way to meet daily worries and vexations.

Two more "Books for Quiet Seasons" (1s. 6d. each):—The Way into the Kingdom; or, Thoughts on the Beatitudes, by Rev. J. D. Jones, M.A., B.D., of Bournemouth, a volume of devotional studies calculated to prove helpful to many; and How to Attain Fellowship with God, by Rev. J. A. Clapperton, M.A., a small book of great value, eminently sober and practical in its counsels.

Mr. Andrew Melrose has issued a readable biographical sketch of John Ruskin, from the pen of R. Ed. Pengelly. (1s. nett). There is a portrait, also several illustrations.

The Churchman's A.B.C. is the title of a guide to Church doctrine and ritual. It is the work of a Protestant, and should prove of service at the present time. The pages are weighty with facts and principles drawn from authorized sources. (6d. Nisbet & Co.)

Oxford Letter.

OXFORD Pastorate has received an additional helper in Rev. H. D. Lockett, of Lincoln, who commences work this term as Curate of All Saints. He will devote as much time as possible to work among the undergraduates. The work of the Pastorate should not be forgotten by all those who have the welfare of the University at heart. It meets a real need, and is doing a most useful work.

The funeral of the late Sir Henry Acland took place on Friday, and bore testimony to the respect felt for one who had lived a long life nobly, and made a lasting mark on the century. The gathering was a wonderfully representative one of statesmen, clergymen, scientists, and physicians. Perhaps one of the great lessons of his life was that emphasized by the Bishop of Bristol, at St. Mary's, on Sunday morning. He said, "Most of the great students of nature have preserved a belief in God, as the outcome of a conscientious spirit of enquiry."

The Oxford Branch of the C.E.T.S. held its annual meeting in the Town Hall on Monday evening. The Archbishop of Canterbury was the principal speaker. He also preached in St. Martin and All Saints on Sunday morning. His sermon was directed against "offences," stumbling-blocks put in a brother's way, and in speaking of the temptations to drink he mentioned five ways in which the stumbling-block might be removed—instruction, persuasion, example, sympathy, and by an appeal to the Legislature.

The meeting on Monday was most enthusiastic, and again the vigour of Dr. Temple was manifest. Speaking of the progress made in the temperance movement during the last seventy years, he said that anyone who argued now that strong drink was necessary to make people strong, would expose themselves to severe ridicule and direct contradiction. Statistics were completely demonstrative on the point. He said he remembered when the first temperance hospital was opened, and it was declared that if any man died there he ought to be prosecuted, because his death was certainly murder! Now the medical profession could be claimed as for the most part on their side.

A Message from the Dominion.

Toronto, Canada.

Dear Reader of The Christian,

I am writing this brief message far away from my beloved East End. But while I am engaged in the necessary duty of visiting our Emigration Centres in Canada, the work of Waif rescue is ever before me. I see its results daily in stalwart men and women, who, since they were sent out by the Homes, have grown up beyond the seas into lives of honesty, respectability, independence and success—staunch subjects of the Empire, and, very many of them, true servants of and witnesses for Jesus Christ. So my heart is warm toward those children hitherto unreached, whose cry is always going up in our over-crowded cities, and I long exceedingly to see our Ever-Open Doors open yet wider to the sons and daughters of destitution and distress!

Yet advices from England have just come to hand, and my colleagues tell me a doleful tale of diminishing receipts and enlarging demands. It appears that in the first nine months of 1900, as compared with 1899, there was a fall of over £6,000 in our income, while it is impossible to reduce our expenditure correspondingly if the hand of help is still to be kept outstretched as widely as hitherto.

So from over the seas I send to you, a true yoke-fellow and co-worker in the past, the Macedonian cry: "Come and help us" in this work for Christ and for humanity!

I hope soon to be once more in England for the opening of our Winter's work, but I earnestly beg that you will meanwhile, during this dead Autumn season, come to the children's aid as generously as you can!

Any remittance sent to me at the offices of the Homes, 18 to 26, Stepney Causeway, London, E., will be promptly and most gratefully acknowledged.

Believe me to be,
Yours gratefully and faithfully in Christ's service
among the Children,

Thos. J. Barnardo.

18 to 26, Stepney Causeway, London, E.
October, 1900.

P.S.—From 12th to 19th November will, D.V., be observed as a Self-Denial Week for the benefit of the Children. May I also ask that you will practically as well as prayerfully bear this in mind?

The Y.M.C.A.

THE second annual conference of the Young Men's Bible Reading Union, which has its headquarters at Birmingham, was held at Sheffield, and was well attended. Rev. W. Somerville Reid, M.A., of Moffat, Dr. H. B. Wilson (hon. sec.), and others, took part in the proceedings.

Work amongst young men in foreign countries is being heartily supported by the Sunderland Association. The annual meeting of the Missionary Union was a very successful gathering. A missionary Parliament is shortly to be inaugurated. The Association has also started a "Home Circle," a Sunday evening social meeting for young men after church hours. A deficit of £400 on the building and general accounts has been liquidated by supporters of the work. The membership is 767, compared with 732 last year.

The annual Conference of the South Western District Union, representing the Associations in Devon and Cornwall, was held at Devonport on October 17. There was a large attendance of delegates, and Dr. Hingston, the president, occupied the chair. Mr. H. W. Gadd, of Exeter, read in the morning an instructive paper on "The Ideal Association for the Twentieth Century." At the afternoon session, Mr. R. Colenso, of Penzance, spoke on the employment of the rank and file of members in the work of the Association. Colonel St. Quintin presided at a public meeting in the evening.

Sir George Williams presided on October 18, over the first annual meeting of the Redhill Association. Rev. Preb. H. W. Webb-Peploe was the principal speaker. A large number of young men have already become members.

The Blackburn Association is making a special effort to reach non-churchgoing young men. More than fifty such were present on a recent Sunday evening.

The winter's work of the Aldersgate Street, E.C., Association has opened under encouraging circumstances. The Sunday Bible Class, which has for the last year or two been a feature at this centre, has been well maintained, and continues to attract many of the young warehousemen. Rev. F. B. Meyer has also recommenced his Saturday afternoon talks to young men.

The autumn Conference of the South Wales District Union of Associations was held recently at Barry, near Cardiff. Mr. John Cory presided at the morning session, and Mr. W. A. Baker, of Newport, Mon., at the afternoon session. Most of our South Wales Associations are doing excellent and aggressive work.

Personalia.

Rev. Frederick Brown, of Tien-tsin, who was engaged by General Gaselee as guide and intelligence officer to the force on the march to Peking, has arrived home in impaired health. His address is 52, St. Peter's Road, Leicester.

Mr. Henry Varley has arrived at Melbourne, after a pleasant voyage, during which the words of the esteemed evangelist were blessed to some of the passengers. Mr. Varley writes:—"I have already had large meetings in this city, and many doors are open."

Mr. John Lampard, of the Balaghat Mission, has returned from his visit to India on special famine duty. He will remain in England for a few weeks before resuming his own work among the Gonds, during which time any friends desiring to communicate with him may address him at 114, Clapton, London, N.E.

Friends of Rev. Dr. Lindsay, Professor of Church History in the Free Church College, Glasgow, will be glad to learn that he has very much benefited in health by his sojourn abroad. He and Mrs. Lindsay are at present in Venice. The Professor frequently assists Dr. Robertson in the services in the Scottish Church.

Mrs. Helen S. Dyer (author of "Pandita Ramabai—The Story of her Life"), who has spent many years in India, will be glad of opportunities to bring the needs and claims of India's women before the Christian public, wherever suitable openings present themselves during the coming winter. Mrs. Dyer has a large selection of lantern slides illustrating her subject, a fact which gives additional force and interest to her statements. Her address is Aldington, near Hythe, Kent.

On Tuesday of last week, at a meeting at the City Temple, Rev. F. B. Meyer was elected president of the Free Churches of London, a position for which, especially in view of the forthcoming simultaneous mission, his experience peculiarly fits him. This appointment will give great opportunities for usefulness in connection with the religious life of the Free Churches, and Mr. Meyer has already arranged to visit fifty-six centres, preaching and holding meetings for the quickening of spiritual life.

Church of England.

In connection with the 500th anniversary of the dedication of the old parish church of St. Marylebone, known as the Parish Chapel, in High Street, Marylebone, W., dedication and thanksgiving services are being held, concluding on November 4. An interesting and illustrated historical account of the church can be obtained from Rev. E. W. Raby, 15, Beaumont Street, W.

The new vicar of Leyton, in succession to Rev. E. B. Russell, is Rev. J. T. Inskip, of St. Paul's, Penzance, where his conspicuous pulpit ability and Evangelical teaching have rallied around him an influential and attached congregation. During his six years' ministrations at Penzance he has won the respect of Church people and Nonconformists alike. The living of Leyton, on which the new vicar will enter, probably in December, carries with it the patronage of two district churches, and the position is one of influence and responsibility.

The Bishop of Liverpool, in opening his first diocesan conference last week, said that his duty is not to make law, but to administer it; to be as wide as the Church of England and no wider. Since there must be some limit up to which he can go, and since he desires that the limit shall be as clear, obvious and just as possible, he will look to the Lambeth judgment and the archbishops' decision on incense and reservation as the limit of his toleration. Where they are ignored and disobeyed he can neither preach, confirm, licence any assistant clergy, nor lend countenance or support, direct or indirect.

Congregational.

Rev. Charles Lemoine, late of East Parade Church, Leeds, has accepted the pastorate of the first Congregational Church, Mansfield, Ohio, U.S.A. The church has a membership of over 700, and owns buildings which cost £30,000.

Rev. J. H. Jowett conducted anniversary services at Grange Church, Sunderland, on Sunday week. Long before the commencement of the services the spacious church was crowded in every part both morning and evening; at the latter service a great many were not able to obtain admission.

Baptist.

Mr. Herbert Marnham, of Hemel Hempstead, has accepted the treasurership of the Baptist Union in succession to the late Mr. Henry Wood.

The committee of the Deconesses' Home and Mission (59, Doughty Street, W.C.) have now a few sisters ready to take up work in connection with the churches. Regent's Park, Bloomsbury, and other London churches are being served by sisters trained in the Home.

At Perry Rise, S.E., foundation-stones of the new hall have been laid by Mr. J. E. Passmore (treasurer of the Metropolitan Tabernacle) and Mr. John G. Priestley. The building is to be used for the services of the church until funds will admit of the erection of a larger building.

Rev. Alfred A. Savage, who is retiring from the ministry through ill-health, preached his farewell sermons to good congregations at the Salters' Hall Church, Baxter Road, Islington, N., on October 21. On the following evening a social meeting was held in the school-room, to take leave of Mr. and Mrs Savage, whose good work received cordial recognition.

The recognition of Rev. R. Allsworth Elvey, at Back Street Chapel, Trowbridge, took place on Wednesday, October 17. Rev. G. P. Gould, M.A., Principal of Regent's Park College, presided. There was a crowded and enthusiastic gathering. Increased congregations have marked the new ministry, and a scheme of renovation and reseating of the chapel is to be adopted.

Recognition services have been held at Hornsey Road Chapel, N., in connection with the settlement of Pastor Percy J. Smart. At the public meeting, Pastor James Stephens, M.A., presided, and Pastors J.W. Davies (Moderator of the Home Counties Baptist Association), W. L. Tweedie, E. Smart, and P. J. Smart gave addresses. Mr. Evanson, one of the deacons, referred to the prosperity of the work at Hornsey Road.

The Bushey and South Watford Baptist Church, Chalk Hill (Pastor H. T. Spufford), has been re-opened for public worship. Rev. John Wilson, of Woolwich Tabernacle, preached in the afternoon from Eph. i. 13-14, his subject being "The Holy Spirit as the seal of regeneration and the earnest of glorification." A public meeting was subsequently held in the chapel, under the presidency of Mr. Herbert Marnham, when addresses were delivered by prominent local ministers and other friends.

Methodist.

The anniversary of Manchester Wesleyan Mission is fixed for Tuesday, November 20. The mid-day sermon will be preached in the Central Hall by Rev. J. G. Greenhough, M.A., and the afternoon and evening meetings are to be addressed by the President of the Conference, Revs. J. G. Greenhough, S. Chadwick, Mr. R. W. Perks, and Gipsy Smith.

Many District Conventions have now been held in connection with the final effort on behalf of the Wesleyan Twentieth Century Fund. The new impetus to the Movement given at the Burslem Conference has added 120,000 guineas to the amount promised, which now stands, in round numbers, at 848,000 guineas, leaving 152,000 yet to be promised before December 31.

The Birmingham Wesleyan Mission has made a good start with the winter's work. The workers are full of hope. One of the latest developments of the work of the Mission is the taking of the new Carlton Theatre, in Saltley Road, for Sunday evening services. There is a crowded population in East Birmingham, for whom the Church accommodation is altogether inadequate. The theatre services are bound to attract large numbers of these.

The proposal to establish a Primitive Methodist settlement for the training of women for social and evangelistic work, is likely to take a definite shape at an early date, as Rev. J. Flanagan is taking the initiatory steps in connection with the St. George's Mission Hall, Southwark. Suitable premises are at present available in the locality, which he proposes to furnish. The initiatory expenses are expected to be about £600, towards which £250 has already been promised.

The Wesleyans of Eastbrook, Bradford, Yorks, having to find a new abode, owing to dry-rot having seized the roof of their chapel and rendered it unsafe, decided to commence a popular mission (on the lines of the "Forward movement." For this purpose Bradford's most commodious hall (St. George's) has been secured for the next few months. At the first of a series of "Sunday evening services for the people" the congregation was about 2,000.

The work of preparation for the Methodist Œcumenical Conference, London, 1901, is going steadily forward. The Conference will open on September 4, 1901, and continue till September 17, inclusive. It will be constituted of 500 members, divided into two sections, 300 being assigned to the Western section and 200 to the Eastern, ministers and laymen being as nearly as possible in equal numbers. The Eastern section comprehends British Methodism and affiliated conferences and mission fields; and the Western section the Conferences of the United States and Canada and their foreign work.

Presbyterian.

The foundation stone of a new church for the Blackett Street congregation, Newcastle (Rev. Richard Leitch), was laid on Thursday by Sir George Bruce. The ceremony was attended by the Mayor and Mayoress. The congregation dates back to the year 1744.

A social meeting of the Bromley congregation has been held to mark the substantial progress which has been made in connection with the reduction of the building debt. Dr. Moinet presided, and congratulatory addresses were delivered by Dr. McGaw and others.

On October 17, the anniversary of the day on which Westminster College, Cambridge, was so auspiciously opened last year, a company of local friends of the college gathered in the chapel with the senatus and students about the customary hour of evening prayer, for a simple commemoration service of prayer and thanksgiving. Principal Dykes presided, and made a brief statement, recalling many reasons for thankfulness in looking back over the first year of the life of the college in its new home.

Society of Friends.

Friends of Wanstead meeting have arranged for a series of "Christian fellowship meetings" for the first and third Thursdays of each month, for the purpose of explaining and enforcing the principles of the Society, and also for mutual spiritual help.

A farewell meeting to Edith M. Backhouse, in view of her approaching departure for Friends' mission-field in India, has been held at Darlington, and largely attended by members and attenders of the three congregations there. Fitting and helpful addresses were given by Mary Pease, Edward Lingford, and E. M. Backhouse's mother.

At Lancashire and Cheshire Quarterly Meeting a deputation from the Friends' Home Mission Committee was cordially received. An afternoon was devoted to the Conference on Home Missions, was opened by a review, presented by J. W. Graham, of the work of the Quarterly Meeting Home Mission Committee since its establishment in 1889.

The autumn quarterly meeting, held at Bedford, was preceded by a public meeting for worship. The occasion was a satisfactory one, and of interest as being, perhaps, the first of its kind to be held in the county town within the memory of persons now living. Friends gathered together in fairly large numbers in the spacious rooms of the Y.M.C.A. in High Street, on the morning of October 18. Vocal utterances, both of prayer and testimony, were frequent in the meeting for worship.

Fallen Asleep.

Mr. William Davidson, East Mills, Morpeth, who for thirth-seven years was a loyal supporter of St. George's Presbyterian Church in that town, of which Rev. A. Drysdale is the pastor.—Mr. John Hooper, Dryburn, was the oldest member of the Presbyterian congregation at Lowick.—Aged eighty-two, Mr. Edwin Barwick, a deacon of Woodborough Road Baptist Church, Nottingham, for very many years, and for over half a century church secretary.—Mr. W. H. Budgett, son of Samuel Budgett, and well-known in the West of England as an earnest Christian worker and philanthropist.—Rev. Professor Shuttleworth, the Rector of St. Nicholas Cole Abbey, E.C.

Irish Notes.

THE second annual Conference of Church of Ireland Young Men's Societies was held in Clarence Place Hall, Belfast, last week, under the presidency of the Bishop of Down. The first paper was read by Mr. Wm. Maguire, J.P., of Dublin, who seemed to think that during the last half-century young men had deteriorated in character. He urged that they should check the growth of luxury and selfishness by showing young men that idleness was contemptible, and labour admirable. Papers were likewise read by Rev. Dr. O'Loughlin, of Lurgan, and Rev. R. J. Clarke, of Corkwhile amongst the special speakers were Dean Dickenson, of Dublin, and Mr. James Crosbie, J.P., of Ballymena. The latter said the disestablishment of the Church had been a blessing in disguise, as it did away with the isolation of the laity, and gave them a voice in the affairs of the Church. A resolution was unanimously adopted that the societies of Dublin, Cork, and Belfast should amalgamate under the title of "The Church of Ireland Young Men's Society," and altogether the Conference was useful and interesting.

For the past fortnight Rev. William H. Gillespie, M.A., and Mr. William Martin, B.A., has been conducting a series of missionary meetings in the neighbourhood of Ballymena, and have been giving much interesting information about China where Mr. Gillespie has spent eight years as a Presbyterian missionary.

At a Band of Hope Conference just held in Dublin, under the auspices of the Hibernian Band of Hope Union, it was resolved to urge all members of the Band of Hope to get at least one person each to join the Band of Hope movement between this and the beginning of 1901.

The past week has been very full of engagements in Dublin. Besides the Synod of the Church of Ireland and sale of work for the South American Mission, Dr. Harry Guinness has been holding a united mission in the Christian Union Buildings, and his meetings at 3 and 7.30 were largely attended, and highly appreciated. The Bible studies on "Fishers" seemed specially helpful.

The Christian.

☞ To avoid delay it is requested that all letters relating to business matters should be addressed to the firm, Messrs. Morgan and Scott, and not to its individual members. Letters of a personal nature should in every case be so marked.

Communications for The Christian should be addressed to the Editor, 12, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C. All Advertisements should be sent to Messrs. John Haddon and Co., Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

☞ The Publishers request that all orders for The Christian by post, and remittances for same, be addressed to "The Christian" Postal Department, Bouverie House, Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

Cheques and Post Orders to be made payable to Messrs. John Haddon and Co. at that address. (For Subscription rates, see Page 1 of Cover.) Postcard or stamped envelope should be enclosed if receipt is desired.

Notes & Comments

OUR readers will notice on page 6 a special announcement by our publishers, concerning the gift of the new Two-Version Edition of the Bible, under conditions there set forth. We hope a large number of our readers will avail themselves of this opportunity to obtain free of cost a copy of this handsome Bible.

Dr. Munhall's striking Lecture on "Scepticism and the Bible," delivered at the Y.M.C.A., Exeter Hall and Aldersgate Street, is published this week, at this office, price one penny. It is admirably suited for distribution among young men, and, indeed, among all who question the inspiration of the Word of God.

The Union of the Free Church of Scotland and the United Presbyterian Church, which has now been formally carried out, certainly constitutes a very striking landmark in the history of religion in Scotland. Each body entering into the union with its own standard and its own principles, and a full recognition of the Miltonian platform, "In things essential, unity; in non-essentials, liberty; in all things, charity," we can have no doubt that a great blessing will follow this bridging over of a gulf which should not have been permitted to exist so long.

Scottish magistrates have been sorely exercised of late over the rapid increase of Sunday trading, and especially in the surreptitious sale of drink on the Lord's Day. The multiplication of bogus clubs, coupled with the imperfect state of the law, has made the latter evil especially difficult to cope with; but so alarmingly has the evil grown, and with such scandalous results, that the magistrates of Glasgow placed themselves in communication with the town councils of the other Scottish burghs, and ultimately a Conference was arranged, which was attended by provosts, magistrates, and town clerks from Airdrie, Ayr, Alloa, Coatbridge, Clydebank, Dumfries, Dundee, Dunoon, Edinburgh, Falkirk, Govan, Greenock, Hamilton, Hawick, Inverness, Kinning Park, Largo, Leith, Oban, Paisley, Partick, Perth, Pollokshaws, Port Glasgow, &c.

The questions put forward for consideration were—"(1) How to deal with Sunday trading in general, and (2) in particular the hawking of whisky in connection with Sunday clubs." Instances were quoted from Edinburgh where 900, 1,100, and 1,300 men respectively had been seen entering clubs on one Sabbath. In the end it was agreed—

That it is expedient that an Act of Parliament should be passed, if possible in the ensuing session, dealing with clubs and similar institutions for selling or supplying intoxicating liquors, and that a committee be now appointed with instructions to consider the matter, to draw up a scheme of the proposed legislation, and to report to a future conference.

We feel sure that very many of our readers will watch with prayerful interest for the report of this committee, and for its outcome in Parliament.

Lord Roberts and Lord Wolseley have added sound sense to popularity in their manifestoes against the insane custom of "treating" our soldiers as the only way of "rejoicing with them." In a long letter to the Press, which is an appeal to the British nation, Lord Roberts says:

From the very kindness of their hearts, their innate politeness, and their gratitude for the welcome accorded them, it will be difficult for the men to refuse what is offered to them by their too generous friends.

I know how keen my fellow-subjects will be to show their appreciation of the upright and honourable bearing, as well as the gallantry, of our sailors and soldiers, and I would entreat them, in return for all these grand men have done for them, to abstain from any action that might bring the smallest discredit upon those who have so worthily upheld the credit of their country.

I am induced to make this appeal from having read, with great regret, that when our troops were leaving England, and passing through the streets of London, their injudicious friends pressed liquor upon them and shoved bottles of spirits into their hands and pockets—a mode of "speeding the parting" friend which resulted in some very distressing and discreditable scenes. I fervently hope there may be no such scenes to mar the brightness of the welcome home.

In similar strain Viscount Wolseley adds his plea:—

The longer I live the more I am confirmed in the early acquired belief that "Drink" is the hotbed, not only of most human misery, but of crime also. It was once my privilege to lead a fighting brigade through a wild, uninhabited region for a distance of 600 miles. All ranks had to work hard every day and all day, from sunrise to dark. We carried no intoxicating liquor with us, and none was obtainable on the way. I never had a sick man, and all crime, even the most trivial offences, was unknown. Had liquor been obtainable, I am certain I could not have reached my destination with a fighting force in the splendid condition it was in when we marched into Fort Garry in 1870.

The horrid practice of treating friends to do them honour is a most pernicious custom, which directly leads to and encourages intemperance. We are now about to welcome home a large number of our finest soldiers from South Africa. We desire to make every man in it feel how much we admire his soldier-like qualities and value the good services he has rendered to his Queen and country. But there can be no doubt that many of us who tempt him to drink are his worst enemies, and do him a serious injury. Can we find no other way of rejoicing with him than by drinking with him?

My affection for those amongst whom I have passed my life makes me plead for them with others who do not know their good, sterling qualities as well as I do, and to beg that none may offer them drink, which, if indulged in, cannot fail to interfere more or less with their future prospects in civil life.

Is it too much to hope that the rank and file of the populace will take these earnest words to heart?

The Liverpool magistrates have offered to their brethren upon the bench everywhere an excellent example. At the annual sessions for the renewal of theatrical licences, the presiding justice, on behalf of his colleagues, declared that they viewed their responsibility in licensing theatres very seriously, and they wished that more care should be exercised in future in regard to theatrical performances, and to theatrical advertisements on posters in the streets. There was a concealed warning in these words. Since the London County Council prosecution a few years ago, very little has been done in the way of regulating these things, with the consequence that in many large towns and cities the theatrical advertisements once more go to the very verge of indelicacy, if they do not actually cross the line. In the interests of youths and maidens, to whom temptation is already sufficiently strong, these pictorial representations should be regulated. Magistrates possess powers to deal with such things; and offenders must be warned that these will be put into execution.

The report of the Council of the Church Association and Protestant League contains some interesting and important evidence of the tide of Protestant feeling which has been rising during the recent election behind the "khaki wave." The Protestant Electoral Councils made it their task to press the candidates to explain their attitude on the question of Ritualism, and received replies from most of them. Of the 384 candidates who were pledged to sympathy with the Protestant cause in Parliament, 294 were elected. There are thus in the present House of Commons a much larger number of members who are pledged to vote for the Clergy Discipline Bill than who voted for it last year, the total then in favour of it being 156. The Councils made no distinction between the various parties on this question; those pledged to the Protestant cause are found among all the parties. This is as it should be; it is the same in the constituencies.

Organized opposition to righteousness is bad enough to combat, but apathy is almost worse. We confess to a keen sense of disappointment at the result of the London Borough Councils elections. The polling numbers show clearly that vast numbers of Londoners took no interest whatever in the elections—they would not trouble themselves to vote for men pledged to remove the shocking abuses under which London is groaning. The air resounds with complaints concerning the horrible condition of great populous centres, and people are crying out for reforms; yet, when the opportunity is given to deal with these things, the majority are too languid to seize it. It is very discouraging for those who labour and pray that a new state of things may come into existence. The people often seem to be their own worst enemies. Nevertheless we must not despair, but rather hope for better things next time. We shall see no brighter days until the people, by their votes, keep out of the Councils all representatives of the liquor business and all landlords of slum property. At present these gentlemen walk into Councils practically unopposed.

There can be no doubt that the development of the Municipal interest in tramways and other works of the kind has led to an increased disregard for the sanctity of the Sabbath, which does not forebode good to the nation. Apart altogether from the interests of those whose day of rest is converted into a seventh day of toil, other persons are injuriously affected by this secularization of the Lord's Day, and it is to be sincerely hoped that the evil will not be permitted to grow. A writer in a contemporary says, in regard to Liverpool:

With a remarkable suddenness the city has been interlaced with electric trams. . . . One of its most lamentable features is the increase in Sunday travelling, and, as a result, the increase in Sunday labour. . . . Here in Lancashire there will soon be a score of towns with this Sunday problem before them. That the cars should unload opposite popular churches and chapels only increases the difficulty, but it scarcely seems too much to ask professing Christians to refrain as much as possible from the use of cars on Sundays, and by so doing think of their unfortunate brethren who are compelled to work seven days in the week, and are thus debarred from worship and from the means of grace.

The announcement was recently made in the sporting columns of The Times that Lord Rosebery has decided to sever his connection with the turf, "at all events for a time," and has sent all his racehorses in training to be sold at Newmarket. The significance of this announcement cannot be over-estimated. It will be remembered that the open advocacy of the turf by this brilliant statesman had a disastrous effect on his leadership of the Liberal party a few years ago; and those who then found a great difficulty in following as their political leader one whose influence was lent to one of the most soul-devastating sports in the world, will greatly rejoice at this announcement. No one has ever connected Lord Rosebery's name with the debasing vice of gambling; but the impossibility of dissociating that evil from horseracing makes it imperative that a true leader of the people should have nothing to do with a sport which is the chief incentive to gambling, especially among the working classes.

It is interesting to recall the attitude of other prominent political leaders towards the turf. Mr. Gladstone openly denounced the whole system. Lord Beaconsfield, his great opponent, "who was no Puritan," agreed with him so far as to say that it had even in his day become a greater curse to the country than the liquor trade; and Lord George Bentinck, when, over half a century ago, he became leader of the Tory Party, severed his connection with the turf, avowedly on the ground that it was not becoming in the leader of a great political party to be associated with it.

The death of Dr. Godet removes from the list of Evangelical theologians its most distinguished name. He stood alone as the "grand old man" of the Continent, supreme not only in the breadth of his culture, but in the simplicity and dignity of his faith. In his earlier years he filled the important post of private tutor to the late Emperor Frederick of Germany, on whose character he had a profound influence for good. Later on he took part in a movement in Switzerland similar to that which, under Dr. Chalmers, gave Scotland the Free Church, the prime question being that of Evangelicalism v. Rationalism. Dr. Godet's works were marked by great beauty of style (which survives even under the strain of translation), by a profound personal experience of saving truth, and by a scholarship whose accuracy and range could not be challenged. He retained his faculties to the last, and though he had reached the patriarchal age of eighty-eight, was busily engaged in completing the monumental work, "The Introduction to the New Testament," the largest portion of which, fortunately, is already published.

Dr. Forsyth, of Cambridge, contributes a most timely article on doctrinal preaching as vitally connected with right action. Upon one occasion he preached a sermon upon conscience and the future judgment, in which he sought to bring the eternal moral power to bear effectively upon life, conduct, and duty. After the sermon a practical man remarked, "You have given us a doctrinal sermon today," indicating, as Dr. Forsyth says, by his tone, that he regarded it as having no reference to a man's daily life. This, and similar experiences, leads the doctor to say that there seems to be a widely-spread notion that doctrine is some irrelevant and remote thing without much value to the ordinary congregations of people gathered from the diverse energies of life, and he adds:

We must give up that shallow distinction between life and doctrine. A sermon that produces real prayer is a more "practical" sermon than one which produces a donation. Repentance toward God is more vital to Christianity than kindness toward men.

This is getting at the roots of things—it is the old and true Evangelicalism which insists upon working from centre to circumference. A "practical" life, which is not the product of a regenerated heart, is, in the true sense, a failure. And doctrinal sermons must be preached if men are to understand these central verities.

We have often deplored the high and thick barrier which the working classes have been building between themselves and those whom they regard as representative Christians; and like others who know these classes intimately, we have little hope that the prejudice against churches and chapels is at present removable. At the same time we join with most evangelistic workers in heartily acknowledging the growing willingness of working men to listen to the Gospel when it is brought to them. The secret of reaching their sympathies, therefore, is by developing open-air preaching, and informal services in suitable buildings during the months when it is impossible to hold gatherings under the sky.

M. Waldeck-Rousseau's declaration of the French Government's ecclesiastical policy will have far-reaching consequences. The authorities in France have grown tired of the action of the Roman Catholic Church in that country. He charges Catholics with training up one-half of the manhood of France in such a way that it cannot mix with the other citizens as citizens. In future there will be a sterner application of the law of mortmain, which is directed against the acquisition of property by religious congregations, and youths brought up "on Clerical methods" will not be admitted into the public service. The French Ministry are not ostensibly opposed to religion as such, but object to the excessive interference of the various religious orders with national politics.

In a recent interview, Mrs. Bishop, certainly one of the first living authorities upon Eastern matters, did not hesitate to say, without any reservation whatever:

In years of travel I saw many signs that foretold a storm. I saw that the hatred of the foreigner, always so marked a characteristic of the Chinese, was steadily growing. This was in a great measure due to the methods of the Roman Catholic missionaries, for whom personally I have the greatest respect. But they too often fail to make themselves popular with the Chinese. By insisting on precedence being granted the Roman hierarchy equal to that of the highest mandarins; by claiming huge indemnities out of all proportion to the damage sustained during the riots of Sze-Chuan; by the non-admittance of heathens into the churches during the celebration of Mass and other services; in all these ways they have done much to excite the animosity of the Chinese.

Mrs. Bishop also said, in reply to a question whether the Chinese made good Christians:

The very best. There is no cringing about the Chinese. They stand before you as men, and when they have accepted the Christian faith, they will endure any torture rather than renounce it. And it is through the particular characteristics of the people that the religion will grow amongst them. They are such ardent propagandists. If a man is converted, he will not rest content until he has converted a hundred others.

Yet some journalists persist in referring to the converts in China as but few in number, and as having merely professed to accept the Christian faith through self-interest!

An esteemed correspondent of long standing pleads with his fellow-Christians to inaugurate the new century with a United Communion of all believers, irrespective of denominational distinction. He says:

Suffer the inquiry: does it not seem incongruous, after catholic union has been shown during the Week of Prayer, and after petitions for greater oneness have been warmly expressed, if the central act in which all Christians can join together, and which would express that oneness, is passed by? Also with Roman Catholicism around us, is it not important to exhibit practically a real Christian catholicism? This will never be brought about if we simply say, "Come to us," instead of "I am ready to 'Go,'" and unite with all who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity.

Copies of his appeal in extenso, with suggestions as to day and hour, &c., may be obtained freely on application by post to J. V. S. Cuffnells, Wimbledon Common, S.W.

A new plea for kindness to animals has been discovered, which may be commended to the S.P.C.A. as a valid argument. The Lancet points out that fatigue has been found to set up in the human body certain chemical processes that are poisonous, their characteristic symptoms being headache, stupor, and gastric pains. Exactly the same poisonous effect may be produced in over-driven cattle, whose flesh is intended for food. Liebig spoke of a case in which the flesh of a roebuck, which had struggled violently after being caught in a snare, gave rise to signs of poisoning when eaten. These and other facts cited point to the humane conclusion that all animals intended for food should be kindly treated, and that all terror or undue fatigue before and while being killed should be avoided. Many people who seem incapable of the finer sympathies will possibly be open to a plea of this kind. Nature is clearly on the side of humanity in this as well as other matters.

Italy has been agitated by rumours that the Pope is about to call together a new Œcumenical Council of the Holy Catholic Church, and that he is going to publish an encyclical letter this autumn, in which he will make an appeal to the democracy of the world in behalf of his Church. Cardinal Rampolla, the Pope's secretary, is known to be ardent in his democratic sympathies. He thinks Republicanism is, in the end, sure to triumph all over the world, and is anxious that the Romish Church should turn this to its own advantage by showing its sympathies with it from the beginning. This is a fresh instance of the "opportunism" which has ever been a distinguishing mark of that Church. In ages gone by, it linked itself ostentatiously with the monarchical idea, as evidenced by ecclesiastical history. Being rejected by the ruling princes of the world, it seeks to conciliate the people. In both cases it aims purely at its own supremacy, which is the one thing needful in its eyes.

There is one law which every man who announces the Word of God must observe if he is to be in the truest sense successful. It is the law given to the prophet Ezekiel: "What thou findest . . . eat . . . and go . . . speak . . . "—that is to say, application, assimilation, and enunciation. It is perfectly futile for anyone to attempt to teach until he has, with diligence, "found" the Word. But in addition to this, the finder must assimilate the truth he discovers, else he merely speaks truth external to his own life. This Divine Law is never abrogated. The Word of God must become part and parcel of the life that utters it, entering into mind and heart. Only in this way can the spoken Word carry irresistible conviction to the hearers.

Justified.

"I tell you, this man went down to his house justified rather than the other; for every one that exalteth himself shall be abased: but he that humbleth himself shall be exalted" (Luke xviii. 14).

NO term enters more deeply into the heart of the Gospel, or expresses its living and eternal content more fully, than the term justified. It is not too much to say that he who is justified, and has a clear view into the meaning of it, is thenceforward set free from legal alarms, and faces eternity and the judgment to come with a serene mind.

Not all, however, who are justified in fact have that clear view into the meaning of it which yields peace with God, and that settled composure which is the normal effect of the imputation of righteousness without works. By many Christians, justification is

NOT PROPERLY UNDERSTOOD.

They do not see, with the clearness necessary to serenity, that the work of Christ is a justifying work, and that in the person of Christ they have the place of acceptance before God for evermore; and, being confused on this point, the sense of security is liable to be shaken, and their spiritual prospects clouded over. It may help to free souls from the net of servile bondage if we ponder two fundamental aspects of this subject, the first dealing with the character of justification as a DIVINE ACT, and the second with the PERMANENT EFFECT of it.

I. The leading truth in justification is that it is an act of God's free grace.

The case of the publican seems as if designed to make this truth vivid. He has no self-commendatory aspect to present to God—nothing whatever to say in his own favour, no superiority to avouch over any class of mankind, no bundle of good work, or so much as a shred of righteousness of his own. The Pharisee had something of personal character to thank God for. He was not on the grovelling and brutish level of the extortionate and the adulterous. He had plumes of character, not borrowed, which became him well. So his life was not barren of sacrifice. He fasted, he gave tithes of all he possessed. But the publican stood confounded in the Divine Presence. He was perplexed, for he found in himself nothing but what shamed and abashed him; and so, minus all good points, and, smiting his breast with tragic gesture, as a sinner without a plea, he cries, "God, be propitiated to me, the sinner."

Now it is evident that nothing could justify a person of this kind, save an act of alone, and that unless justification could come to him by that road, it could reach him by no other. Was the publican, then, so justified? Yes. "I tell you," says Jesus, "this man went down to his house justified rather than the other."

The truth is that justification is an act of God's free grace emphatically and exclusively. Hence it reaches the publican, it passes over the Pharisee. It could reach the one, it could not reach the other. The Saviour's sketch makes the reason obvious. The publican's confessed state had nothing of personal work or merit, and, therefore, it constituted a field for the display of justifying grace; but the Pharisee's confession, being a roll of self-merit, afforded no scope for the free justifying grace of God.

The truth in question is driven home by the words which follow: "For everyone that exalteth himself shall be abased; and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted." There are many who, like the Pharisee, have something to bring to God—some bundle of good character and good living. The tale of merit may not have the same story to tell in every case, but the intent is the same in all. It is the lifting up before God of what they themselves are and have done. But observe how exclusively justification is an act of God's free grace. None such are justified. In no case does God give, in return for the bundle of good living and good character, the gracious token of justification. On the other hand, all who, like the publican, sink themselves, having no goodness to specify, all such have his lifting up, and are sent down to their house justified rather than the others.

II. Justification is an act of God's free grace the effect of which remains.

It is not every Christian that understands this truth, that the sky of justification is always cloudless, always clear, and has never any mist or obscuration at all—that the same grace which justifies the sinner to begin with, justifies him continuously, and is a serene sky over him world without end. Yet this is so. A sinner is either justified by the free grace of God, or he is not justified at all. If he is justified by an act of God's free grace, the effect of that act abides. He is not justified more one day than another. Justified once, he is justified wholly and irrevocably. Justification or of fluctuations. If you are justified, it was no work of your own which justified you, for you had none; and as it was with you, so it remains. The works of the Christian have no more to do with his justification than had the deadly works of his unregenerate career. The justified person stands on the justifying grace of God; and since from the first moment of justification this has been the case, so is it through all time, and so it will be for ever and for ever.

DOES NOT ADMIT OF DEGREES

Many inquirers fail to see this. They may not be Pharisees, for they may have lost all conceit of themselves; and yet they do not renounce self as the publican did. They have an idea that some kind of meritoriousness is essential, and so they are labouring to whiten their garments in order to get into

A JUSTIFIED STATE.

The like is true of some of God's dear children. They do not see clearly the truth about justification, that it is an act of God's justifying grace, the effect of which abides; that it does not hinge on their own works or merits, even as those who have been divinely quickened; and so, not seeing this clearly, some of them are trying to whiten their garments, if so be they may again grasp in experience the boon of a justified condition. Beloved children of God, learn that justification is an act of God's free grace, the effect of which remains for ever and ever; and that the entire justifying merit in that grace is Christ's, not yours. Learn this, and you shall be no more in Doubting Castle; the sky of justification will be to you always cloudless, always clear; and henceforward you shall tread the terra firma of a justified state, your heart made glad by the music of Christ's own perfect and finished work.

JAMES DOUGLAS.

"Praying Away" Band.—Members of this Band agree to pray daily that God will send one of their number to the foreign field. Prayer has been answered, for since the commencement of the Band, with twelve members, six have become missionaries or are training for service abroad. Mrs. Tulloch, 50, Grange Park, Ealing, W., will gladly supply the cards of membership and leaflets to any who would be able to initiate similar bands among their own friends.

Hints for Mission Workers.—I

BY REV. ALBERT SWIFT, EAST DULWICH.*

WHEN, in the days of his flesh, Christ gazed in compassion upon the hungry multitude, and resolved to feed them, He did so in an orderly manner, by the hands of his disciples—with the five barley loaves and two small fishes, intended probably for their own refreshment.

He could have ignored the disciples, together with their loaves and fishes, and by his own word, merely, have satisfied the crowd. But the mind of the Master was to use human instrumentality, and in the marvellous miracle we have an object lesson for all time of his method in reaching and feeding the multitudes.

Many good people are afraid of revival "methods." Their idea is that the work is God's, and that they have only to wait and watch and see the wonders of his grace. True, the work is God's, and no method or machinery apart from Him can ever "get up a revival." But has He not commanded us to do certain preparatory work—to make the people sit down by hundreds and by fifties, in order that all may be reached; to bring what loaves and fishes we may have to Him, that He may use them as He will—and then to take the gifts that He has consecrated, and distribute to the crowd? When this is done, we may expect the manifestation of Divine power to appear in the blessing of our efforts.

The idea of "waiting God's time," is often but a presumptuous excuse for apathy and indifference. God's time is now, and if He tarries, it is because we are failing in those preliminary conditions upon which successful soul-saving work so largely depends.

PREPARATORY WORK.

Two or three months before the mission, it is a good plan to hold a preliminary meeting. If the missioner can be present, so much the better. At this gathering the work can be explained, and a "Prayer and Workers' League" can be formed. Cards distributed for signature, pledging those interested to prayer, and indicating the work they are willing to take up, serve to enrol those who can be depended upon to help.

But this is not always possible. The preparatory work can be done without such a meeting if every worker will carry out the following suggestions:—

I. PRAY.—Don't wait until the mission is in progress, but begin to pray at once. Prayer is always the first of mission methods, for by this means "the windows of heaven are opened, and showers of blessings fall." True, God is always willing, and does not need to be persuaded; but we are not ready to be used as his instruments until the burden of souls is upon us in such measure that we are constantly crying out to God to revive his work and save the unsaved.

(a) In public.—Let the mission be the burden of petition in all the services of the sanctuary. It is usual to have a week of prayer immediately preceding. Every worker should strive to attend such meetings. Do not think this unimportant.

(b) In private.—All can pray in private. Constant prayer will kindle the spark of desire for revival to a mighty flame, and in consequence the prayer will become more and more prevailing, while faith anticipates, with ever-increasing eagerness, the answer in a glorious manifestation of God's power to save.

(c) For individuals.—It is well to pray for the world, but God saves men one by one, and we need to pray for them in that manner. Every worker should have a private list. Write down the names of the individuals for whom you are particularly anxious. Pray for them, personally, every time you kneel before God.

MAKING IT KNOWN.

2. TALK.—It will not do to stop at praying. Talk about the coming mission, and so manifest interest, as well as help to make it known. Talk lovingly and wisely to the unconverted.

* Copyright. This chapter, with one to follow, will shortly be issued in the form of a booklet, entitled THE MISSION-WORKER'S HANDBOOK. (Morgan & Scott.) for whom you are praying. As a rule it will help matters to let them know that you are so praying. But do not mention it publicly, or you may do more harm than good. Talk!—and remember your talk is the index of your faith and desire. True, revivals have resulted from the earnest prayers of bed-ridden folk, but it must be borne in mind that they were bed-ridden, and could not go about to talk. If God gives us health and opportunity to converse with our friends, He expects us to make use of the same, and tell of the work and the desire of our hearts, for "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh."

3. Advertise.—It is not enough to open the church doors, and issue a little printed matter announcing the services to be held. The attention of the crowd must be arrested and fixed upon the meetings. To do this demands not only a liberal use of printed matter, but personal touch as well. The chief value of cards, &c., lies in their being an introduction for the visitor, and a reminder of the visit to the people with whom they are left. Dr. Peck, one of the most successful pastors in the Methodist Church of America, in his book, entitled "The Revival and the Pastor," has a chapter upon "Walking Evangelists." Would that every Christian worker could read it! It is an inspiring utterance on the power and productiveness of house-to-house visitation. The secretary will attend to the printing, but many workers are needed to reach the multitude with a personal and loving invitation.

HOUSE-TO-HOUSE VISITATION.

The community is usually divided into districts. A thorough canvass should be made by each visitor prior to the mission. A card making a preliminary announcement will suffice as an introduction. If possible, a second visit should also precede the services, the object being to get to know the people. Visitors should carry small memorandum books in which to make notes of special cases—of people promising to attend—or any others about whom the Holy Spirit may arouse their interest. Many additions will be made to the prayer list of consecrated workers in this way. (There is no better place for keeping a prayer list than in this worker's note book.)

The district once assigned should become the care of the worker until the mission is over, and in all probability it will continue so afterwards. It may not be possible to repeat the thorough canvass, but the note book will aid the memory, and the Holy Spirit will assuredly guide those depending upon Him to such homes as most need another visit. From one to half-a-dozen calls—if no more are possible—should be made every night while the meetings are in progress. For this purpose, cards—different each evening—announcing the preacher's subject, are convenient and helpful. But, with or without such introductions, the calls should be made. The Master bids us, "Go out into the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in." We certainly are not doing that when we simply open the church door, and pay some man to scatter announcements of the services.

PERSONAL DEALING.

4. Study.—In every line of life study precedes success. The mechanic must study his work in order to be its master; the business man must study needs and conditions if he would prosper; the minister must study hard and constantly if he would enjoy the blessing of God upon his preaching; and the soul-winner is no exception. "Study to show thyself approved of God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth."

There is need for study in reference to every phase of the work, but pre-eminently so, as to personal dealing with seeking souls. The chaos and confusion in the inquiry room is often appalling. It is the supremely critical moment in the lives of the penitents. They are seeking Christ! How important that they be rightly led! They are to be urged to "rest upon the promises," and yet how seldom is the Book containing those promises seen in the hands of the workers. The Bible is the "Sword of the Spirit," yet how few know how to use it. There is no point at which modern revival effort is more weak, and no weakness that is more appalling in its results. Therefore, study—and particularly study the way of salvation, and the use of the Word of God in making it clear to seeking souls.

THE MISSION MEETINGS.

Having been engaged in preparatory work as well as earnestly praying for weeks past, the the workers should, as a result, come to the mission full of eager, expectant faith; and not in the spirit of mere idle curiosity, which wonders what will happen.

Plenty of stewards are needed. At no time is a cordial welcome and kindly courtesy more in demand. Strangers have been invited to come. Let them meet cheery faces and outstretched hands directly they reach the door. Give them a good seat, and see that they are supplied with hymn books, and every needed attention. Remember that Christ can, and often does, speak as much through the loving ministry of a consecrated steward as through the preaching of the Word.

A good choir is needed—mere artistic singing may be dispensed with. Sympathetic singing is an essential! For the most part, the choir should consist of earnest Christians. Those known to be "not far from the Kingdom," and who desire to help, may be admitted; but the worldling, who only comes because he likes to sing, should not be admitted.

The choir should meet for rehearsal before the meetings begin, in order that they may be thoroughly familiar with every hymn called for. As a rule, however, the hymns should be generally familiar as well as appropriate. In revival the business of the choir is to lead, and not to monopolize the singing.

Workers are needed to speak to the undecided, gently urging them to decision. This is a delicate matter. Better leave it alone than go about it injudiciously. The right word, said at the right time and in the right manner, will help many a person up to the point of saying, "I will." On the other hand, to bore people in an obnoxious manner only serves to irritate and drive them away. No work is of greater importance than this, and in none is there greater need to rely upon the promise, "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God; and it shall be given him" (James i. 5).

Workers are needed to deal with the seekers after salvation. Preparation for this has already been urged, and ought to be most thoroughly done. Workers in the inquiry room should also take the name and address of each seeker, and hand the same to the secretary. If one person attempts to take all the names in a crowded room, some are sure to escape. If cards are provided, each worker should be held responsible for these particulars, concerning the persons with whom they deal.

"The Heart."

By Pastor F. E. MARSH.

THE heart in a good sense is the citadel of our nature; hence Mary pondered the words which were spoken, in her heart (Luke ii. 19, 51); the holy place of true affection, hence the Beloved says to the bride, "Thou hast ravished my heart" (Cant. iv. 9); the spring of consecrated action, hence the willing workers of the Tabernacle were those whose hearts were "stirred" (Ex. xxxv. 21, 26); the inner purpose of the will, hence God recognised the desire of David to build Him a house (1 Kings xviii. 18); and the summary of love's being, for to have anyone in the heart is to love them supremely (Phil. i. 7).

The heart in Scripture covers the consent of the will, as illustrated in the eunuch's faith (Acts viii. 37); the intelligence of the mind, as Christ indicates in his rebuke to his disciples, when He asks, "Why do thoughts arise in your hearts?" (Luke xxiv. 38); the affection of the soul, as may be gathered when God rebukes Israel for being wrong in their life, and says the reason is, "They do always err in their heart" (Heb. iv. 10). In a word, the heart stands for the man himself in all the inness of his nature, and the secret purposes of his being; hence we read of some who "glory in appearance and not in heart" (2 Cor. v. 12).

Letters to the Editor.

A Busy Man's Question.

SIR,—In these times of stress and strain, when men of business have to employ the best of their energy and brains to cope with the ever-increasing competition, it has become a matter of serious consideration with me—and no doubt with many other business men—how to employ a portion of my leisure in a profitable manner in the study of the Holy Scriptures.

To those whose time is abundant this may appear surprising, but they must remember that the best of our mental energy has already been used up when evening comes, and what we want is some well-arranged plan, not of mere reading, but of careful and systematic study, which would enable us to devote, say three-quarters of an hour every night to the object I have mentioned.

In the morning I always read the chapter given in your "Day by Day," with its invaluable commentary, the only fault of which is its brevity. I seek counsel as to further study. I have consulted books and have tried plans, which have invariably failed, because either they have been too complicated, or they did not take into account the lowered mental vitality of the student.

If I wish to learn a language I can find several systems, many of which answer the purpose admirably. What I seek is the same ingenuity and ability in a plan devoted to the study of the Book of books.—I am, Sir, &c.,

Christians and Railway Shares.

DEAR SIR,—The logic of your correspondent, "T.H.E.," seems to me to be faulty. He says, "A shareholder in a public company is a partner," and "he is a party to all that is done and allowed by the partnership generally," and that "the duty of the Christian shareholder is to sell out of such a partnership." He is not a partner in the ordinary sense of that word, but only in the sense that an elector is a partner or participator in the government of the country. He is not a party to all that the directors do if he protests against their doings. It is not his duty to sell out if he can possibly do any good by resisting the evils complained of.

If the House of Commons sanctions the iniquities and miseries caused by the liquor traffic, the Christian members of that House who protest are not parties to the iniquity, and they are not bound to resign their membership.

On March 25, 1868, at a meeting called by the Lord's Day Rest Association, with the late Sir Charles Fox in the chair, the following resolution was moved by the late Joseph Hoare (banker), seconded by the late Rev. G. M. Murphy, and carried unanimously:—"That friends of the Sabbath should purchase a share or shares in the Crystal Palace Company for the purpose of enabling them to vote against all efforts to open the Palace on Sundays." The result was that shareholders' proxy papers, representing 6,000 votes, were sent to this Association. Then we demanded a poll of the shareholders, and the Sunday League was beaten on the question of Free Sunday demonstration at the Palace by 28,423 votes against 5,217.

And if ever a limit is to be put on the railway traffic on Sundays, Christians must not "back out" but "back in," and make their influence felt at the directors' meetings. Our country greatly needs that Christian citizens, who are not ashamed of their colours, should take a leading, active, vigorous part in the government of our country, corporations, and companies.—I am, sir, yours faithfully,

Charles Hill, Secretary,
Lord's Day Rest Association.

The Mother of Manuel Matamoros.—Mr. William Greene writes from 3, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.: "With the £60 recently raised, the mother of Matamoros has been able to pay all her debts. There is, however, a like burden on the chapel, which friends of work in Spain may like to remove."

Church Union in Scotland.

On Wednesday, October 31, the Free Church of Scotland and the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland became by union the United Free Church of Scotland. No such important event in Scotch Church history has occurred during the last fifty years.

OPPOSITION TO UNION.

The supreme Assemblies of each of these Churches met on the previous day in their own Hall in Edinburgh. The meeting of the United Presbyterian Church was quiet and uneventful, for the Church was unanimous in entering the new body. But this was not so in the case of the Free Church. Difficulty had been anticipated; the interest was accordingly keen and marked. Long before the hour of meeting, the large building was crowded to excess, and people were unable to obtain even standing room. After a sermon by the Moderator, Dr. Walter Ross Taylor (Glasgow), from the text, "For He must reign till He hath put all enemies under his feet," and after an able address on "Union as taught in the New Testament," when he had been re-elected in order to finish the proceedings, some preliminary business was despatched, though not without evident feeling, and then the motion for union was proposed in a short but weighty speech by Dr. Rainy. The opposition motion was proposed by a country minister, Mr. Bannatyne, of Coulter; but it received only 27 votes, while Dr. Rainy's received 646. The nature of the vote, however, was such that it made plain that a larger portion of the Highlands than was expected had refused to enter into the Union; while those who voted in the minority are without doubt men of high personal character, and transparently conscientious. After the vote had been taken, and the Assembly closed, they met in a side room, and formed themselves into what they called "The Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland." They are reported to claim about 20,000 adherents, all practically in the Highlands.

MINISTERS IN PROCESSION AT THE UNION OF THE CHURCHES.

UNITED PROCESSION.

The 31st opened wet and dreary; but the rain cleared just as the procession, which had been arranged as the preliminary to union, began. The members of each of the courts assembled at their Hall, and, forming in procession by pairs, marched after their Moderators and officials to the large Waverley Market, which had been fitted up for the occasion. The streets were crowded, spite of the weather, and in some places the police had erected barricades. The procession—said to have exceeded a mile in length—was so long that its two ends were not visible at the same time. Its two lines united at the Royal Institution, and then marched through a dense lane of people into the immense building, which had been prepared as the place of meeting. When the Moderators at the head of the two lines—one long and straight from Princes Street, and the other sinuous and descending from "the Mound"—met, they lifted their hats (that of the Free Churchman three cornered, as he wears Court dress), shook hands, and then proceeded together. And what they did was repeated by each of the rows as it came forward and met one from the other direction.

AN IMPRESSIVE SCENE.

The Waverley Market is a building which holds 6,900 people. It was fitted up for the occasion with seats for 6,500. The roof was covered completely with a light gauze of broad stripes in red, white, and blue. Galleries had been raised round about on three sides, and were covered with red cloth, faced with festoons of yellow. A large platform, capable of accommodating about 200 persons, had been erected. The lobbies were in charge of a large body of gentlemen ushers. The seats in the body of the hall were reserved for the members, of whom the United Presbyterians furnished about 1,100, as they have been accustomed to send each of their ministers along with an elder to their supreme court, whilst the Free Church furnished about 700, as they have been accustomed to send only a third of their ministers (with an elder for each) by rotation. Over the doors and along the walls were arranged many interesting trophies—an original copy of the Scottish League and Covenant, banners and weapons used by the Covenanters, and the Scottish Banner of the Christian Endeavour Society. The galleries were quite full; in fact, the tickets of admission, though charged at a high rate, had been applied for twice over, and many persons had made no application as they knew all had been disposed of.

The sight was a most imposing one when at 11.30 a.m. the Moderators of the two contracting Churches entered with the clerks and took their seats on the platform. The building presented a sea of expectant, earnest, excited faces. On the platform, besides Drs. Ross Taylor and Mair, were, on the one side—Drs. Murray Mitchell and Thomas Smith, veteran Indian missionaries of over half a century; "Ian Maclaren," a former Free Church student and minister; Lord Aberdeen, an Established Church elder; and Sir William Henderson, of Aberdeen; and on the other—Dr. Stewart, of Lovedale, well known as one of the makers of South Africa; Dr. Whyte, of Free St. George's, Edinburgh; Dr. Parker, from London; Dr. Maclaren, from Manchester; Dr. Brown, of Bedford; Lord Provost Chisholm, of Glasgow; Lord Overtoun, Lord Kinnaird, (though an Anglican), and John McNeill, a Free Church minister. There were also Dr. Cameron Lees, of (Established) St. Giles' Cathedral; Sir R. Pullar, Sir J. Usher, Prof. Crum Brown, and Messrs. T. Shaw, M.P. (late Solicitor-General for Scotland), G. M. Brown, M.P., A. W. Black, M.P., and J. Colville, M.P. Lord Rosebery came a little late, and took his seat beside the Moderator. There were also present large deputations from the Presbyterian Churches of England, of Ireland, of Wales, of Canada, of Victoria, of South Australia, of South Africa, and from the Congregational Church of England, the Congregational Union of Scotland, the Methodist Church, the Baptist Church, the Waldensian Church, the Dutch Reformed Church, the Evangelical Churches of France, and the Presbyterian Church of Jamaica. And telegrams from churches all over the world were received in congratulation during the course of the day.

THE ACT OF UNION.

After the opening services, in which both the Moderators took part, the minutes of the separate meetings of the previous day were read by the two clerks. Then the uniting act was proposed by Dr. Murray Mitchell, a man much respected, not only for his great accomplishments, but for his deep spirituality and his long service as an Indian missionary. It was seconded by Dr. Henderson, of Paisley, the senior minister of the United Presbyterian Church. Both disclaimed the idea of hostility to any other Church as being in their action, denied that the new Church would be used for political purposes, and averred that the new Church knew no politics. They also expressed the hope that the Union would lead to other and wider ones, to a fresh baptism of the Holy Ghost, and a new impulse in missionary activity. The scene then became very solemn. The proposal was carried unanimously, the whole audience standing, and the members holding up their hands in token of assent. Whilst they remained thus standing, Dr. Ross Taylor declared the act adopted, and the act of union was signed by the Moderators and clerks. Giving the people no time to sit down, the Moderator called on them to sing the closing verses of Psalm lxxii.

"Now blessed be the Lord our God, the God of Israel, for He alone doth wondrous works, in glory that excel.

"And blessed be his glorious Name to all eternity. The whole earth let his glory fill; Amen, so let it be."

Then the Moderators advanced and shook hands; and each for his section of the new Church welcomed the other.

THE FIRST MODERATOR OF THE NEW CHURCH.

The Churches having thus united, their first duty was to elect a Moderator. This they accordingly at once proceeded to do. Dr. Mair, the Moderator of the U.P. Church, in proposing Dr. Rainy, said that this was the only name thought of by either section of the house, as this was the man who more than any other one had promoted the union just accomplished, and as he was the only survivor of the original Union Committee of 1863. As the Earl of Moray (a Free Church elder), who was to have seconded the motion, was prevented by his health from discharging the duty he had undertaken, Lord Overtoun did so in a few well-chosen words. The Moderator, in his Court dress and doctor's robes, looking tired but radiant, then entered amid a scene of rapturous enthusiasm, and proceeded to give his introductory address.

THE MODERATOR'S ADDRESS.

After expressing the hope that the proceedings of the day might lead to larger unions even outside of Scotland, he pointed out how many Churches shared in the national heritage. He paid a graceful tribute to the Established Church of Scotland for its many activities, and told his audience how he looked for the day when a great Scottish Church would exist with a connection with the State which would be friendly but not statutory. He pointed out how effectively the smaller bodies of Presbyterians could carry out their testimony in union rather than in separation, and then made kindly reference to the sister Churches even outside Presbyterianism. He claimed that in the new church they had changed nothing; that in it they had preserved all that the original Scottish Church had reckoned binding; and reminded the audience, amid immense applause, that the Church of Christ is not bound by any ordinance of the State, but is, in right of power from her Head, possessed of progressive possibilities in which she can accommodate herself to the needs of the age in which she lives. He then went on to point out that if the Church had this privilege, the members were responsible for the way in which they used it, and asked his hearers how they intended to act. First there was the need of consolidation by love into such unity of feeling that in a short time no one would be able to tell to which section they had belonged. Then there was the duty of showing what a Church could do without State aid for itself, for the nation, and for the world; then of making men know that the kingdom of God had come nigh to them, and causing them to feel the claim of Christ; and lastly, of meeting the need for missions at home and abroad.

The address was really a manifesto of the policy of the new Church, and given forth by the man, who personally as well as officially, was alone qualified for it. The other proceedings were of a formal nature, except the resolution of thanksgiving which Mr. Shaw, M.P., proposed, and Dr. Whyte, of Free St. George's, seconded in a characteristic speech, and the kindly speeches delivered by Lords Aberdeen and Kinnaird.

The evening meeting was as full as that of the forenoon, but an overflow meeting was held in the Synod Hall of the United Presbyterian Church, which is capable of containing about 3,000 persons, and was also filled. Some of the deputies and friends from other Churches addressed these meetings. Dr. Parker's address was characteristic, those of Mr. Macdonald and Dr. John Watson, beautiful and elevated, those of Lord Provost Chisholm and Dr. MacLaren practical and stirring, and that of Dr. Cameron Lees kindly and hopeful. The address to Her Majesty the Queen, which was adopted in the evening, made touching reference to the death of Her Majesty's grandson; and at the conclusion of it the immense audience rose simultaneously, and "the precentor" (Mr. Fraser) led them in singing the first verse of "God Save the Queen."

Thus ended this memorable day, and one may say the assembly also, for the rest of the business is but formal, except the great missionary meetings to be held on Thursday night; at it Principal McKichan, D.D., Bombay; Dr. Husband, Rajpootana; Dr. Stewart, Lovedale; Dr. Ross, Manchuria; Dr. Laws, Livingstonia; Dr. Johnstone, Jamaica; and Dr. Torrance, Tiberias, are to address the audience.

What strikes one most of all is that, with the absence of all show and noise, the whole has been full of quiet determination and fine spiritual feeling not only between the two uniting bodies and their members, but towards the Churches outside. From first to last all bitterness and sinister aims have both been officially disclaimed, and have been conspicuous by their actual absence. Constantly, and by men of all shades of opinion, the hope has been expressed that what was done would only lead to a wider and more blessed union. The desire has pervaded all, and cropped up in all the proceedings, that this union may lead to a great spiritual revival, and to the more effective meeting of that heathenism which at home, as well as abroad, presents to us so grave a problem, and presses on us so clamant a demand.

With reference to the dissenting brethren, the desire that they should return is universal; and no door will be shut against them that can be kept open.

Bible Learners' Union.—This union provides a simple yet effective plan for Bible study. Cards containing selections for one year are supplied to members, together with a circular letter bearing on subjects chosen for learning. On receipt of four stamps, these will be forwarded by the hon. secretary, Miss Brine, 7, Argyle Villas, The Drive, High Barnet.

*The Evangelistic Watchword.

By Mr. J. R. MOTT.

WHAT is involved in taking as one's personal watchword, "The Evangelization of the World in this Generation"? Far more than mere intellectual assent to the idea and nominal acceptance of it. More even than earnest belief in it, and strong desire to see it realized. Knowledge, emotion and resolution are not substitutes for action. It is very dangerous for a man to become intellectually converted to a great idea, and not practically. Nothing less is meant than making the watchword a commanding influence in each man's life.

There are several particulars in which the watchword should govern the Christian. In deciding upon his life-work the Christian must let the watchword have its true place, and not be afraid to settle the question in the light of the opportunity and obligation to make Christ known to all men. He should be ambitious to enter that particular work and field in which his life will count most for the world's evangelization. This decision, made conscientiously and fearlessly, will result in not a few going out to unevangelized lands as ambassadors for Christ. Others will be led to work in Christian countries as ministers and laymen, but for the same purpose—to give all mankind

THE OPPORTUNITY OF KNOWING CHRIST.

The vital matter is that a man be willing and anxious to work where God wants him to work. If he is not willing to serve Christ everywhere, he cannot serve Him rightly anywhere. The watchword should also influence a man's preparation for his life work. The fact that the undertaking is difficult, as well as extensive and urgent, demands thorough preparation on the part of all who would do most to accomplish it.

The Christian who has taken the watchword as a factor in his life will make a study of the great subject of world-wide missions. By regular and careful reading of missionary literature, and in other ways, he will seek to understand all that is involved in the realization of the watchword, and to ascertain how he can do most to promote its realization.

The religion of Christ should be a great reality in the life of every man who adopts such a watchword. How inconsistent and unreal it would be to urge preaching Christ as the sufficient Saviour and rightful Lord of all men, and yet not know Him in personal experience day by day as a triumphant Saviour and as the actual Master of one's life. There is no more direct or effectual way to hasten the evangelization of the world than to give Christ absolute authority in one's own life, and to be filled and energized by his Spirit.

The watchword summons the man who would come under its sway to a life of self-sacrifice. He must give up personal ease. His time must be economized for study, prayer and work on behalf of missions. By real self-denial, as well as by he will make his money exert the maximum of influence on the extension of the Kingdom of Christ.

Every one who feels pressed in spirit by this watchword must also realize that he is called to a life of prayer. Like Eliot, and Brainerd, and Martyn, and Pastor Harms, he must know what it is to devote long hours to prayer. A missionary movement which would evangelize the world in this generation must acquire great momentum; and this can result only from more Christians giving themselves to the ministry of intercession.

* Extracted from THE EVANGELIZATION OF THE WORLD IN THIS GENERATION, by John R. Mott, M.A. (3s. Student Volunteer Missionary Union, 22, Warwick Lane, E.C.) The book is a powerful statement of missionary facts and principles, strikingly presented by one who is enthusiastic in the advocacy of a plan which is as Scriptural as it is bold, as eminently reasonable as it is consistent with human progress and high Christian duty. Workers in the foreign field will find in these pages a disclosure of the thoughts of their own hearts, while young Christians may read to their great enlightenment and lasting comfort in the service of God.

The Christian who adopts this watchword must devote himself with intensity and enthusiasm to its realisation. He must not be satisfied with the little which he is now doing, but rather in doing all that he can. Let him be profoundly in earnest, or else take some other watchword. Every mighty achievement in the history of the Church has been a triumph of men of genuine enthusiasm. Real Christian enthusiasm is not a product of the energy of the flesh, but of the Spirit of the living God. Such enthusiasm is constant, contagious, irresistible, and

CANNOT BE DISCOURAGED.

If this watchword has come to be a power and inspiration in one's life, it is his duty to press it upon others. One of the best ways to ensure its realization is to carry on a constant propaganda among Christians for the express purpose of influencing them to let it become a governing factor in their lives. If the Church is to be deeply moved by this idea, many, both ministers and laymen, by public addresses, by articles in the press, and by conversation in the circles in which they move from day to day, must give themselves to its advocacy. From among them surely God will raise up some whom He will use mightily in rousing the Church to go forth to evangelize the world. It is impossible to measure what might be done by a few men who, catching a vision of a world evangelized, yield themselves wholly to God, to be used by Him to realize the vision.

Welcome to Mr. W. R. Moody.

BY invitation of Lord Kinnaird, a company of gentlemen who had been closely associated with the work of Messrs. Moody and Sankey in London met on Friday morning last week at Exeter Hall for breakfast and an informal meeting to welcome Mr. W. R. MOODY, who is on a brief visit to this country.

Lord KINNAIRD, in addressing his guests, expressed his regret that Mr. Sankey, Lord Overtoun, and others were unable to be present. He had, he said, just returned from Scotland, and was rejoiced to hear that there were evident signs of a great Revival beginning in many parts of the North of Scotland, not so much in the large towns as in the quieter and less luxurious villages. He believed that God was about to reveal his power among our people, though possibly not on the lines of those missions which had been so extraordinarily successful in earlier days.

Suitable and cordial remarks then followed from Sir JOHN KENNAWAY, Prebendary WEBB-PEPLOE, Revs. F. B. MEYER and CAMPBELL MORGAN, and Messrs. T. A. DENNY, EUGENE STOCK, and R. C. MORGAN, all of which breathed the fervent love and esteem in which the great evangelist, D. L. Moody, had been held by his friends, a love which is extended to his son, but, as more than one of the speakers hinted, "not only for his father's sake, but for his own."

For "Mr. Will" (as he was familiarly addressed) has a personality of his own, with a quiet, gentle manner, a good address, a sympathetic voice, and withal a keen, penetrating look. In grateful terms he thanked those present for the kind things that had been said, and then plunged into an interesting account of the work at Northfield now under his personal care.

One of his father's early admonitions was, "A real friend is the greatest treasure." He felt this very keenly now as he stood in the presence of so many true friends of his father. He spoke of the growth of the work at Northfield, and how his father, feeling the importance of a sound education, had started it in a very small way for those who could not otherwise obtain any learning, and that it had grown till there are now 850 students there. Ninety-five per cent. of these would have been unable to pay for their education. The school is founded on the Bible and they have two lectures weekly. Each student has some manual labour to do, and by degrees they all see the wisdom of this. Its moral effect is wonderful.

Mr. Moody will be in town next week, and if any of our readers wish to communicate with him before he returns to America, they may address letters to our care.

A Berkshire Village.—In an isolated village some ten miles from a town, in the county of Berkshire, there is being commenced a very gracious work. At Vernham Dean, Mr. and Mrs. Sydney Watson, seeing a great need for mission work, have erected a hall at their own expense, and also maintain the work. In order that the young men may be saved from the public-house a reading room has been added.

The Evangelical Alliance.*

CHINA AND THE GOSPEL.

THE need of fresh labourers for the harvest was the subject of consideration at the evening meeting on Thursday (Oct. 25). In the name of those assembled, the chairman, Mr. J. Hope Simpson offered the speakers a hearty welcome, as men who had come from a distant land, being spared by God's mercy in the midst of great perils, and privileged to carry forward a glorious work for Him, as our representatives in the mission field.

Mr. Stanley Smith (C.I.M.) said: In speaking of the need of the Gospel for China, I cannot but think what a highly-favoured nation we are. I suppose that the reason why we in the West are essentially nations of progress is that our hearts and minds are towards the future, while we look for that grand consummation which shall one day come about. But the ideal of the poor Chinese is in the past.

THE GOLDEN AGE OF CHINA—

which, after all, exists only in imagination and not in fact—was 4,000 years ago. In this looking back, which is so characteristic of the Chinese, we find that the nation as a whole is a standstill one; if anything, it is retrogressive rather than progressive. The worship of Confucius is the chief religion of China, and Confucianism leads to many evils. The highest motives the Chinese have, in the worship of their gods, are barter and abject fear; while the objects of worship are treated with insincerity and irreverence. There is nothing in any of the religions of China to teach the people the nature of disinterested love. What is true of the mineral resources of China holds good as regards the minds and hearts of the people; for, having no proper appliances, they cannot develop the wonderful wealth of the country. The coal area of China is ten times that of Europe; but they have no material for development. It is exactly the same with their brains; they have no proper system of education. Their hearts are the same as those of Western peoples, but they have no real religion. More missionaries are urgently needed in China, and the sufferings which existing workers have undergone during the recent troubles may well teach us that sacrifice and cross-bearing should enter more largely into our own lives. Is there not, in the present day,

TOO MUCH EASE AND LUXURY

among us? If the Christian Church could only rise to the height of giving five per cent. of its revenue to the Lord, we should have enough and to spare for all the missions upon the face of the earth; but nothing like that proportion is reached. Could our murdered brothers and sisters come among us, would they not say that they considered it a privilege to lay down their lives for the Lord in the conflict between spiritual light and moral darkness? Would they not ask us to see that the gaps in their ranks do not long remain unfilled?

Rev. H. B. Macartney (C.M.S.) said: It has been estimated that of every three children born into the world, one looks into the face of a Chinese mother. The anti-foreign feeling of which we have heard so much is not indigenous to China. It is Manchu; and why has it spread all over China? Because the Manchu himself is a foreigner, and, as such, he desires to keep other foreigners out of the land.

THAT IS A NATIONAL SECRET;

and now we do not wonder that the truth has come to light, and that all the recent murders can be traced back to the Manchu woman who has held in her hands the reins of government. She is anti-foreign, and therefore says, "Let them all bleed and die." As to the Roman Catholic policy, I believe that, when we repossess the land, we should send out proclamations and have them posted in all Chinese provinces and cities, saying that we, as Protestants, have nothing to do with the Church over the way. I often feel inclined to deny the name of Christian to the Roman Catholic body. They have articles of the Christian creed, but they are overlaid and are underground, and the superstructure is Mary Woman worship, and faith in a woman, is the sort of religion that suits the depraved human heart, and is widely diffused throughout the world. As to French policy, it is one of the most remarkable features of modern times that a Government which, at its centre, is atheistic, should, in its missionary aspect, be profoundly religious. When French missionaries go out, they are covered with blessings, and are protected when they get into foreign countries. I do not know a single case where the French Government damned their own missions in a foreign country. But here is

A FEARFUL CONTRAST;

and I know that I am upon delicate ground. Is there a Government in London which damns British missions in foreign countries lest they should produce complications which it is thought will involve our country in trouble? As a nation, we ought to be proud of our missionary work; the nation should say so to Parliament, and the latter should make it known to the whole world. The missionaries have done the Foreign Office service more than once. A favourable impression is generally prevalent in China, produced by loving Christian character. Let missionary hospitals speak for the victims of opium, the lepers, and other sufferers. Missionaries have been busy in works of mercy among the blind; they have rendered assistance to consuls; and Christians worked nobly during the siege of Pekin. The Christian man is the representative of God in the country; and the mischief has been, not that we have sent too many missionaries to China, but that we have sent too few. In regard to it has been suggested that China should have a national church, uniform in ministry, liturgy, and worship. It is asserted that the Chinese will gather around such a church, but I do not believe it. In the first place, it is too late in the day, for the denominations are already in the field, and, in that capacity, have experienced God's blessing. The idea is to strike out the words Wesleyan, Church of England, Presbyterian, Congregational, American Board of Missions, and China Inland Mission; but those who have fought under these flags are not likely to relinquish their predilections. In a Christian Church, apart from denominational lines, there would soon be a cleavage; and it may be that we should see in China a great many more sects than there are in England.

CHURCH POLICY,

I would emphasize the importance of

and would have Lord Salisbury able to say some day that the Foreign Office is not afraid of missionaries who go out from England, but is proud of them, and would give them the utmost protection in its power.

A third address was given by Rev. A. E. Claxton (London Missionary Society), of which notes will appear in a later issue.

In conveying the cordial thanks of the meeting to the speakers for their addresses, the Chairman said he hoped that Lord Salisbury had, by this time, concluded that he made a profound mistake in speaking of foreign missionaries as he had done. Lord Curzon, Viceroy of India, had testified to the value of the work done by our missionaries.

FRIDAY'S MEETINGS.

On Friday morning Canon Harrison was chairman of the meeting. In common with other members of the Church of England, he was deeply interested in the work of the Alliance. It was always a pleasure to him to meet with the Lord's people. He looked back to the glorious days, long since gone by, when the American evangelists were in this city. Members of Christian churches in Liverpool knew of the splendid work done by those men; and the ministers of various denominations can point to-day to the good results of that work. As to the subject now to be considered, we can never overestimate the importance of holding firmly "the inspiration and authority of the Word of God." While acknowledging the ability, intelligence, and learning of those who attack that Word, it seemed to him that such efforts have altogether failed to undermine inspiration. To discredit any part of the inspired Word, is to destroy the whole. The Bible has made this country great, glorious, and free; and it has been the means of bringing millions of fallen creatures from nature's darkness into spiritual light.

The first speaker was Pastor Hugh D. Brown, of Dublin. He said that the utterances of the Bible are not mere echoes of dead prophets and apostles, but are the present, up-to-date, loving, throbbing teachings of God, the living Spirit. Divine revelation commends itself to us, not only through the objective lessons of its power in the world around, but also in the subjective testimony of our own renewed hearts indwelt by that Holy Spirit who is Himself the Interpreter of Scripture. We may consider first, the claims of the Book itself, as to its authority; and, then, the endorsement of those claims. The Bible is very clear cut and emphatic on the first point. There are in the Pentateuch, the Historical Books, and the Prophets, to the direct inspiration of God.

We do not claim that every word of our translation is inspired by God; revision having provided us with many changes in this respect, through reverential handling of the various original MSS. Nor do we claim that every action and utterance recorded in the Bible is inspired; for the devil's lie in Eden, Sennacherib's blasphemy, and the speeches of Job's friends are familiar instances to the contrary. The Revelation of God includes a shorthand record of what certain men have said and done; and we hold that the record is inspired, though many of the statements made by men, and some of their actions, are not inspired. The unaided mind of man could never express the great thoughts of God; and inspiration becomes an absolute necessity when we touch

THE SUBJECT OF PROPHECY.

The Incarnate Word Himself is an endorsement of the Old Testament, both in his person and in his testimony. Modern criticism attacks not merely idioms and MSS., but the very character of our blessed Lord. Like Him, the various apostles make references to many things in Moses, the Prophets, and the Psalms. The Holy Spirit also endorses the blessed Book of which He is the Author and Interpreter; showing that the very symbolism of the old time ritual was instituted under his direction (Heb. ix. 8), and that He moved the prophets to inquire and search diligently concerning "the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow" (1 Pet. i. 11).

Exposition of the subject was continued by Pastor Fuller Gooch. Reading Mark vii. 5-8, he said there can be no doubt that we possess the canon of the Old Testament as used by our Lord and his Apostles; and Christ here asserts the absolute supremacy of the Scriptures, as the Word of God, over all other literature. We gather from his words that, apart from the prescriptions of the Bible, no worship can be acceptable to God. Moreover, the Word of God is made of none effect by the addition of human tradition. The Books of the sacred writers are altogether beyond their own or any other form of genius.

To quote an excellent definition of inspiration, it is "that special Divine influence upon the minds of the sacred writers, in virtue of which their productions, apart from errors of transcription, and when rightly interpreted, together constitute an infallible and sufficient rule of faith and practice." Inspiration is, therefore, a supernatural influence exerted over the minds of those whom the Divine Inspirer chose to be the channels of his communications to man; and hence the writings are inspired even more than the men who wrote them.

ALLIANCE WORK ABROAD

was referred to by several speakers at the afternoon meeting. Mr. R. C. Morgan presided, and read Acts xv. 12, 36-40, as being very applicable to the circumstances in which they were met, namely, to praise God for the work of which they were to hear, and to ask his continued blessing upon the workers. In days when the cause of the simple Gospel of

* Concluding report of Liverpool Conference.

God's grace is imperilled, even from within the professing Church, this Alliance needs to be upheld and sustained by all evangelical people.

Dr. Baedeker testified that, by the influence of the Evangelical Alliance, spiritual realities have become blessedly operative in the various countries where he has travelled. He made reference to the Blankenburg branch of the Alliance, with its annual international and interdenominational Conference which does so much to promote and foster Evangelical faith upon the Continent. It is his purpose to shortly revisit the high mountain district of Trans-Caucasia, where are located most of those who have been banished because they dared to separate from the idolatrous Greek Church of Russia. No society has been able to do anything for the relief of these sufferers, save the Evangelical Alliance, which, for years, has sought and obtained means for their assistance and support amid persecution. Dr. Baedeker has also repeatedly passed through carrying to the inmates copies of the Scriptures, printed in their own language, he being favoured by the Russian Government with unique facilities in this respect.

Rev. Dr. Gritton, member of Council, urged that the cultivation and exhibition of Christian love, which have brought forth worthy fruits of many kinds, are sufficient reasons for the existence and continuance of the Alliance. The substance of his address has already appeared in our issue of October 25, under the title of "Evangelical Alliance Work on the Continent."

Interesting details of spiritual progress among the people of Finland were given by Mr. E. W. Lönnbeck.

Rev. J. Politeyan expressed the thanks of the Armenian people to the British public in general for their Christian love and sympathy at the time of the terrible massacres. The people are specially grateful to the Evangelical Alliance for exerting its influence to secure the release of prisoners, and for collecting and distributing means to succour Armenian orphans.

Pastor Mascher desired to thank the Alliance for its sympathy and prayers with regard to difficulties about the Lord's work in Saxony. As the result of Alliance action, the Baptists last year obtained permission for undisturbed worship; and this is also the case with other churches.

At the closing meeting on Friday evening, earnest and stirring addresses were delivered upon the Romanizing movement, and the relation of the Evangelical Alliance thereto. There was a large attendance.

THE ROMANIZING MOVEMENT.

Archdeacon Taylor, who presided, traced the growth of the movement from the issue of the notorious "Tracts for the Times" at Oxford in 1833. To a large extent, he said, this movement has been successful so far as the Church of England is concerned. The National Church at this moment is largely "Catholicized"; in other words, "Romanized," all but in name—the only question is as to the degree. One of our leading statesmen, who a short time ago seemed disposed to deny its existence, or at least to confine it to a very few extreme men, very recently at a public meeting said, "There were some members of the Church of England who, it seemed to him, differed so little from the Romish Church in their doctrines that their secession might perhaps be no serious loss to the Communion." I can assure him that if he will only pursue his studies a little further in that direction, he will find that the secession would not be a small one.

The English Church Union includes more than 4,000 clergy—bishops, deans, archdeacons, and priests—with lay members and associates who number at least 35,000 more. Of this compact and formidable body Lord Halifax is the able and experienced President, whilst their sympathizers and imitators may be reasonably estimated at 4,000 clerics more, and laity in proportion. We know what their doctrines and practices are, not from a few extreme men, but from the resolution, or manifesto, recently put forth by the English Church Union through its President, maintaining the Real Objective Presence of the Body and Blood of Christ in the Sacrament on the "altar," irrespective of faith in reception. It is as follows: "The bread and wine, through the operation of the Holy Ghost, become in and by consecration verily and indeed the Body and Blood of Christ, and that Christ our Lord, present in the same most holy Sacrament of the altar under the form of bread and wine is to be worshipped and adored."

This is absolutely the doctrine of the Council of Trent as regards the bodily presence of Christ in the Sacrament, and is virtually Transubstantiation, albeit the word is not used. In accordance with this doctrine they demand, and, as far as they are permitted, practise the six points of the Ritualistic Charter—vestments, altar lights, eastward position, incense, mixed chalice, and wafer bread. Masses and prayers for the dead are openly "in full swing," and the sacrament of penance or auricular confession and sacramental absolution. What the doctrines of this Romanizing movement are you can easily learn from such a work as "The Catholic Religion," by Rev. Vernon Staley, with preface by Canon Carter. I mention the names that we may not be accused of making erroneous statements.

There is not the least necessity for Round-Table Conferences or abortive contrivances of that sort to try and reconcile Evangelical Christianity and Romanism; a deep and broad cleavage separates the two. The bridge is not yet made which will unite them. In one word, the doctrines of the Ritualists are simply

ROMANISM UNDER AN ALIAS.

In my deliberate opinion it can be truly said that fully one-half of the clergy and their churches are already Romanized, and a considerable portion of the other half more or less so. A determined minority, however, are stalwarts still; and, though they may die out, they will never surrender, nor ever abandon the Reformation.

It is said by some that the recent action of the archbishops and bishops has lessened the evil. I regret to have to say that I see no evidence of the truth of that statement, and do not believe it. In a few instances, unimportant excrescences of incense and portable candles carried in procession have been given up, but these scarcely touch the fringe of the question. The authorities appear to me to have made up their minds to allow altars, altar lights, and sacrificial vestments as legal in the Church of England, for there is no mention made of them; and as long as there are 4,333 churches where there are altar lights at noonday, and 2,000 of them with the vestments, both of which are absolutely illegal, as well as the altars on which they stand and at which the clergy minister, and profess to offer up Christ as a propitiatory Sacrifice for the quick and the dead, so long I attach no importance whatever to any statement as to the diminution of the evil through episcopal interference. One can only wonder that such as the statistics given indicate, can be allowed to continue for a day without an effectual remedy being applied by those in authority. Such a state of things would not be tolerated in any other national institution.

Prompt action is called for (1) in fidelity to the pure Gospel of Christ and the salvation of immortal souls; (2) the social, moral, and spiritual welfare of the nation at large; (3) in the best interests of the unity, stability, and prosperity of the British Empire, upon which the cause of liberty, justice, and progress throughout the world so largely depends. May God graciously awaken the nation to a sense of its great and grave responsibility. We have no desire to interfere with the equal rights of others. We only plead for the cleansing of our National Church from doctrines and forms of worship which have no lawful place within her fold.

Mr. Samuel Smith, M.P., said: In this controversy it is becoming clear that practically the same issues are at stake as at the Reformation. During the dark period of the Middle Ages one might almost say that another religion had displaced that which was taught by Christ and his apostles. The cataclysm which we call the Reformation was the revolt of the imprisoned intellect and conscience of mankind against priestly tyranny. Yet, strange to say, England has witnessed in this century the strongest tide of reaction towards sacerdotalism ever known in Protestant countries. Let us be just to the Oxford Movement. It was a reaction against a form of Protestantism out of which the spirit had largely departed.

Perhaps the weightiest argument against sacerdotalism is that it leaves no place for the operation of God's Spirit outside the so-called Apostolic Succession.

THE HIGH CHURCH THEORY is that Divine grace runs in a channel of hereditary descent from the Apostolic See. This descent is by episcopal ordination supposed to be in a direct line from the Apostles. It can furnish no explanation of the wonderful blessing that has attended the ministry of non-episcopal Christians—men such as Bunyan, Spurgeon, D. L. Moody, Geo. Müller, and countless others. If the conversion of bad men into good men is the supreme test of a living Christianity, then the true successors of the Apostles are often wholly outside the so-called Apostolic Succession.

Protestants hold that priestly and sacramental Christianity is a departure from the simplicity of Christ. It is an imitation of Judaism; yet we allow that it often yields true reverence and devoutness of life. I have examined several Ritualistic catechisms, and find them to be little else than translations or adaptations of Roman Catholic books of devotion. However much we may admire the earnest life of many of these Anglican priests, we cannot shut our eyes to the stealthy, underhand methods by which the doctrine of the Reformation has been supplanted in many of the parishes of England. The propagandism of what is substantially alike in voluntary and Sunday schools, and in many private schools, is threatening the Protestant faith of the future generation.

ROMISH DOCTRINE AMONG THE YOUNG,

But I am hopeful that a fresh study of New Testament theology is spreading over the land. I think the sacerdotal movement has culminated; and if we are favoured by an outpouring of the Divine Spirit, we may face the twentieth century without fear. The trials which the nation has passed through may turn out to be blessings in disguise.

Rev. G. Campbell Morgan offered counsels on counteracting the Romanizing movement. Earnest closing words were spoken by Rev. T. Stuart Gardiner, who urged that the Alliance must increase and deepen its influence. It must not live in the past, merely continuing in the things that claimed attention years ago; but it must interest itself in the burning problems of the present time. He thought that, of late, Evangelicalism had been too individualistic. Its adherents should take a deeper interest in the political and social questions of the day, seeking that Christ's will shall be done in our legislation, and sending more men like Mr. Samuel Smith into Parliament. Nothing is more needed in the House of Commons than a Christian party.

One of our perils is a paralyzing and weakening pessimism. Our teaching must be more ethical, emphasising the truth that Jesus Christ came to save people from selfishness, pride, and self-indulgence. An easy-going Evangelicalism will not conquer the Romanising movement. We can only conquer it by more devotion and self-denial, and, above all, by an earnest, whole-hearted seeking for the one power which shall fit us to overcome the evil—the Pentecostal power of the Holy Ghost resting upon our ministry. When we have that, our Evangelicalism will be irresistible, and will be once more a force in the land.

TESTIMONIAL TO MR. JOHN KENSIT

IN AID OF

The Wickliffe Preachers' Fund.

PROTESTANT CHURCHMEN, and all persons interested in the patriotic and devoted efforts of Mr. JOHN KENSIT to promote

PURITY OF WORSHIP IN THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND, and to check the proceedings of law-breaking clergy who seek to

Undo the Work of the Reformation, are invited to join in the above Testimonial, which is intended by the promoters at once to mark their sense of the value of Mr. KENSIT's services, and to furnish a substantial money contribution towards the expenses of

THE WICKLIFFE PREACHERS' CRUSADE.

During the year ended the 30th April last, Mr. KENSIT has addressed 156 meetings and the Wickliffe Preachers 1,034 meetings, or in all something like 448,000 persons, in support of the Protestant cause.

Among those who have already sent or promised contributions are Mrs. Arbuthnot; Colonel Alves; Lady Alicia Blackwood; Captain A. W. Cobham, J.P.; John Cory, Esq., J.P., D.L.; Councillor Chesshire; Rev. J. Dimont; Colonel Porteous; Archdeacon Taylor; and A. L. Vernon, Esq., J.P. Donations, large or small, will be gladly received, as it is wished that the movement shall represent all classes of Protestants.

Circulars and full particulars may be obtained from the Hon. Secretary, Miss GERTRUDE MANSBRIDGE, 32, Birchington Road, West Hampstead, N.W.

Subscriptions will be received and acknowledged by Mrs. WHEATLEY BENNETT, 60, Brondesbury Villas, Kilburn, N.W.

Women Workers' Conference.

THE Conference of the National Union of Women Workers, held at Brighton on October 23, 24, and 25, dealt with many subjects bearing on the social and moral well-being of the community.

At the inaugural meeting the Hon. Mrs. A. T. Lyttelton gave the presidential address, in the course of which she pleaded that England must throw into the great struggle against evil the strength and determination she has shown in the conflict through which she has recently passed. The only right use of empire is to CARRY ON GOD'S WORK.

The subject of "Women as Educational Authorities" was subsequently dealt with. Lady Laura Ridding contended that the presence of women on county and borough educational authorities would be beneficial to the community; and Miss Day, of the Greycoat School, Westminster, who followed, said that the ideal school should be (1) a place of worship; (2) a place of mutual service; (3) a place of instruction. Mrs. Creighton urged that it would be a good plan if women were on the governing bodies of our public schools, because some things would then be looked into which are not looked into now.

On the second day "Homes for Inebriates and Temperance Legislation" were considered at the morning session, Mr. R. W. Branthwaite (Home Office), in the course of an earnest address, said that when the Act of 1879 was passed, regulating the establishment of inebriates' homes, the idea of drunkards being willing to enter such institutions was received with derision. Sufficient time has now elapsed to prove that many do so consent, and the records show that a large number have been turned away for want of room.

Mrs. Flora Annie Steel, speaking upon the life of the average Englishwoman in India, said that outside mission effort there is little or no kindly, charitable, or neighbourly work done by English ladies. There are two reasons for this strange aloofness. One is that not one in a thousand of the Englishwomen who go to India takes the trouble to learn the language of the country. Another reason is the disinclination of most Englishmen to allow their womenkind to mix up in any way with native society; and this is by far the most serious obstacle to change in the future.

The Hon. Emily Kinnaird contributed a paper on "The Right Use of Leisure." She counselled people to be more at leisure in their work. We had far better make less in our business, and remain human beings, than become money-making machines.

A varied programme occupied the third day. Mrs. Percy Bunting read a paper on "Training for Domestic Service." After urging that a larger measure of freedom must be accorded to servants, she condemned the habit of having dinner parties on Sundays.

Mrs. Healey (Oxford) dealt with the training of Poor Law officials, and called for adequate preparation on the part of those who have to deal with "life's failures" in the workhouses. The condition of laundry workers was considered at a meeting presided over by Mrs. Geo. Cadbury. Miss Gray advocated a number of reforms, including the and forcible words were spoken by Miss England and others on the bad sanitary conditions which obtain in many laundries.

At a meeting on "The Housing Problem," Mrs. Fawcett spoke of the terrible conditions under which many of the poor live; and Mrs. J. R. Macdonald said it was dreadful to think that there are thousands of little children growing up in places where no flower can blossom. Do we contemplate what this means as regards the future generations? Overcrowding is the nightmare of great cities; and private enterprise cannot be trusted to meet the crying need of better dwellings.

At one of the concluding gatherings Lady Battersea urged the study of the effects of alcohol on the body; and Mrs. Creighton made an appeal to her hearers to take a lofty view of life. In the modern young woman some charm has gone, perhaps, but some capacity has been gained, and it is the duty of young women to understand their responsibilities, to realize the value of work, and to use their powers in high forms of service.

The Church and the Masses.

AT the autumnal meeting of the Church Parochial Aid Society, held at Exeter Hall, encouraging accounts of work were given.

The first speaker was Rev. John Parry, who spoke of seven years' work at Bromley-by-Bow. He said that he had been determined to reach the people. If the mountain will not come to Mahomet, Mahomet must go to the mountain. He had felt that they must plant mission-rooms where the people are. In one part of the parish there was a mission-room all ready to their hands. One of his fellow-workers was put in charge of it, and so successful was his work that they were soon able to build a permanent church. Two railway arches are used for mission work in another part of the district.

The missioner in charge has done excellently during his three years' labour there. Before that time there was not, so far as the speaker knew, a single communicant in the district; now they have communicants' roll of from 150 to 200. Such is the result of going amongst the people, and of inviting them to come to the services in their working clothes.

The second address was by Rev. F. J. Pegg, Curate of St. Silas's, Sheffield, who described "Life amongst Sheffield Steel Workers." Mr. Pegg does a great deal of visiting amongst these men, both in the works and

IN THE PUBLIC HOUSES.

He is always well received, even by the landlords, and he has heard the men remark that "when a clergyman goes into a public-house to seek his congregation, the least we can do is to go to his church." Gamblers are giving up their sin, and people who were living in almost heathen darkness are now willing to receive visits from the clergyman.

Rev. B. B. Liptrott, Vicar of St. George's, Stonehouse, Devon, spoke on "Seafaring Folk," or "Life and Labour in the Three Towns.'" They have three Sunday schools, with 800 children, and the Mission Hall Sunday school is the poorest of them all. Half the teachers are working-class people, who, although they toil all the week, give up their Sundays to the teaching of the young. There are three mission halls, each of which is doing excellent work. Six years ago Mrs. Liptrott started a rough girls' club, which have been wonderfully prosperous. Some of the girls are now Sunday school teachers. Mr. Liptrott described the work in other C.P.A.S. parishes, mentioning particularly that at St. Jude's under Prebendary Howard and at St. Saviour's under Rev. J. Jones. It was in the latter parish, when conducting an open-air service, that a drunken man tried to stab him with a pocket knife. This man, however, was won to Christ, and is now a consistent Christian worker.

A vivid description was given by Rev. H. B. Ladbury, curate of St. Clement's, Nechells, Birmingham, of four nights in a common lodging-house. It was after eighteen months' hard work in the parish that Mr. Ladbury decided to and live for a few nights in a common lodging-house. The disguise he assumed was complete. He paid his fourpence for a bed, and went into the lodging-house kitchen. The language he heard there was appalling. It was shocking to find even young boys there, who were thus contaminated by the evil around them. In the daytime Mr. Ladbury became a "sandwich man," and walked about the City with his "board" for some eight hours. He mixed much with the men, and found that they did not trust the clergy. "They can tell a good tale," said one man, "and the chap what can tell the best tale gets the best job." But Mr. Ladbury is persuaded that the men can be reached.

Heaven—Two Shillings a Day!

AS a rule, we Sisters of the West London Mission are too busy to write or talk much about our work. The condition of things around us is so urgent, and our days are filled with attempts to relieve the pain, distress, and sorrow on every hand. But every now and then the sorrows of the poor seem too appalling, and we are compelled to stop and ask ourselves if a Christian country is going to tolerate longer such evils as we daily see, and if the Christian Church, which believes in Jesus Christ, is not going to do more in his Name for the outcast and miserable.

One part of the district in which we work is that bounded by Marylebone Road on the north, Oxford Street on the south, and Tottenham Court Road and Great Portland Street on the east and west. I speak of this chiefly since I know it best; and in this small area are crowded together people who have no room to live decently, no certain employment, no power to earn a decent livelihood. Rents are high, competition is keen, and the sweating system reigns. And, so far from improving, things are getting worse. Old houses have been pulled down to make way for expensive flats. The houses removed take from the space already so precious, and the poor might as well look to live in Buckingham Palace as in these new flats.

One of the Nursing Sisters took me out to make a visit with her. We climbed to the top of a house, where two women lived in two tiny rooms, where they have been for twenty years. They were perfectly respectable, and asked but to maintain themselves in peace and decency.

"What is your rent?" we asked. "Five-and sixpence a week." That is not much for this neighbourhood, though it is much for them.

Mrs. A. has worked for a manufacturer who supplies a West End firm. Her chief employment has been button-holing Eton collars. "How much a dozen?" "Twopence-halfpenny." "And how many can you make in a day?" "One dozen dozen."

But that is hard work, and she has lost that employment, and now has to take what she can get. For a pair of knickers or a chemise, representing a day's labour, she gets, as the highest price, 8d. and 6d. respectively. Were she to attempt to charge more, she would lose her job. She had just got some repairs to do, and her mother was "felling" a sleeve, while she tidied their little room. And

HER MOTHER IS NINETY-THREE!

All that they can earn now is 1s. or 1s. 6d. a day, that is, from 6s. to 9s. a week. Deduct the rent, 5s. 6d., from that, and there is not much left for food, even with the parish allowance, and this small income is very precarious indeed. From the little bent figure, and the worn withered face, my eye travelled back to a text on the wall, "They shall see his face." Surely it will not be long, and heaven will be rest indeed, but one longed to rest that weary old frame at once.

"If I could only earn 2s. a day!" said the daughter.

"Ah!" sighed the old mother, "that would be heaven." "2s. a day!" and "that would be heaven." Ah, Christian reader, pity the sorrows of the poor when heaven comes down to 2s. a day!

After making this call, I went alone, and climbed a narrow dirty staircase. I was just about to knock at the second floor back, when a neighbour said that Mrs. B. was out.

"But where is she?" I asked. "Gone to work."

"But the baby is only a fortnight old." "Yes, but her husband is dead. She went to his funeral yesterday, and so now she has only her own earnings to depend on. And then you see she works for a laundry, and the lady is very busy, and might be offended if she stopped away longer."

So the baby was put out to nurse, and going on to the laundry I found Mrs. B. busy ironing. She earns nine shillings a week, and gets parish relief. This is all she has with which to pay rent, and feed and clothe herself and four children. How long can she carry a load like this? The last time I wrote to The Christian I mentioned a case then on our books. Help was sent us, and now in a country cottage lives a happy rosy-faced woman who owes everything to timely help, and who has been lifted out of the bitter struggle, and enabled to earn her own and her child's livelihood. Surely I shall not speak in vain this time. I plead that Christian men and women should unite to study and relieve the causes of this suffering, to take up in earnest the crusade against overcrowding, sweating, immorality, and drink. While we can reach only individual cases we are doing so little, so pitifully little.

Winter is coming: distress will soon be greater still, and the bitter sorrows of the poor will cry louder.

*Ritualistic Sisters of Mercy.

By Mr. WALTER WALSH.

THE part taken by Sisters of Mercy in the Romeward Movement is well worthy of consideration. In some parishes Ritualism would soon die out without their aid. They go in and out amongst the people, acting as the pioneers of the priest. Wherever the Sister finds an entrance, it will not be long before the priest follows. In only too many instances they fill the confessionals with penitents, whom they have carefully prepared and instructed beforehand. Some Sisterhoods devote themselves to nursing, by which they are often enabled to introduce the Ritualistic priest into the death chamber, instead of a faithful minister of the Gospel. How great their influence may be in the preparation of wills, and in inducing the dying to leave money for "the Church," may be easily imagined. They give alms to the poor, for which, however, they expect, sooner or later, their "pound of flesh" in the souls whom they capture for the priest.

I have not a word to say against Sisters of Mercy as individuals. I consider them to be the dupes of a wily priesthood. They are objects of pity. At the time of the Protestant Reformation every nunnery in the land was for good and valid reasons swept away, and the country for more than 300 years saw their faces no more. And the country got on very well without them. At length they have been revived, and they are now so numerous that it has been said that there are at present more Sisters of Mercy connected with the Church in England than were here in Roman Catholic times.

And, unfortunately, we have also in the Church of England real nuns, who never leave their convent walls. Protestant Churchmen have no objection to ladies devoting their lives to works of charity; on the contrary, they welcome their valued assistance. But they do ask, Why cannot ladies be kind to the poor, educate the young, and be merciful to the sick, without adopting and without teaching to old and young those Roman Catholic practices and doctrines which were cast off at the Reformation? We do not object to anything good that Sisters of Mercy may do: we only protest against their temporal works of mercy being corrupted by the false teaching given with them.

And, after all, we cannot forget that Protestant women are in the truest and highest sense the best Sisters of Mercy to be found in the world. It is true that they take no Romish vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, and in a multitude of cases they are even married women; yet we maintain that the good works and noble deeds of the Protestant women of England far exceed those of the Ritualistic party. They are not, it is true, to be seen in convent walls, but they are to be met with wherever sorrow and suffering exist, everywhere seeking to recover and save those who are lost in sin and crime. Take any Guide to the Charities of England, and there you will find a record of Protestant work by Protestant women not to be equalled in the annals of the world's history.

The Ritualistic Sister of Mercy must first be brought under the influence of the Romeward Movement ere she can herself become one of its missionaries amongst the people. The schools for ladies under the management of Ritualistic Sisterhoods are used for training up many future convent novices in the Ritualistic faith. The supposed superior virtues of "The Religious Life," as it is called, are early impressed on the girls educated at these schools; it is therefore not to be wondered at that many of them become Sisters of Mercy, often, I believe, without realizing the nature of the step they have taken or the possible evils which may arise from it.

When a young lady actually becomes a member of a Ritualistic Sisterhood, in order that she may become a true proselytizer among the people, the first thing necessary is that she shall be of her Superiors. For this purpose she is, in several of these institutions, required to take a vow of obedience—in some cases of blind, unquestioning obedience. There is a large institution known as the All Saints', Margaret Street, Sisterhood. Its former chaplain wrote a little book for their guidance, entitled The Religious Life Portrayed, for the use of Sisters of Mercy. In it he told his unhappy dupes: "A religious (i.e., a Sister of Mercy) has made the sacrifice of her will in taking the vow of obedience. She is no more her own, but God's, and she must obey her Superiors for God's sake, yielding herself as wax, to be moulded unresistingly."

What an obedience of this kind may lead to, when demanded by a bad-tempered or vicious Superior, may be more easily imagined than described. In the "Rule of Holy Obedience," which was, and for all I know may still be, the rule in the Sisterhoods founded by Dr. Pusey and Miss Sellon, the poor victim—for such I must call her—is told: "Banish from your mind any question as to the wisdom of the command given you. If ye fail in this, ye have failed to resist a temptation of the Evil One" (Sisterhoods in the Church of England, by Margaret Goodman). A "rule" such as this prevents the poor Sister from ever questioning the morality of the command given to her by either her female or male "Superior."

Dr. Pusey, in his widely-circulated Manual for Confessors, adapted for the use of the English clergy, advises Confessors to tell Sisters of Mercy to look upon their Father Confessors as "Angels sent by God to reconcile us to his Divine Goodness," and that they ought, when pouring out their sins to the Confessor, to answer his "curious questions, which are not part of the confession, such as your name, what penances or virtues you practise, what are your temptations, &c." (p. 190). I wonder is there any father or mother who reads this book who would wish a daughter of theirs to be subject to the "curious questions" of some young bachelor priest? I believe they would be righteously indignant at the idea of such a gross outrage on propriety.

The vow of poverty is very much favoured by Ritualistic priests, and for obvious reasons. It enables them, in many convents, to secure for those institutions often very large—of the ladies who become Sisters of Mercy, and with the result that the wealth of these Sisterhoods is, it is believed, now in the aggregate much greater than that possessed by English Roman Catholic convents before the Reformation.

The Sisterhoods founded by Dr. Pusey are very greedy and grasping. They cannot rest satisfied until they have emptied the purses of their Sisters of every penny; and, not even content with that, they require that if any money is given to them after they become Sisters they must on no account spend it on themselves. They must hand it over to the convent authorities, who will kindly spend it for them. In proof of this I give here the 'Rule of Holy Poverty,' which obtains in Dr. Pusey's Sisterhoods. It is as follows:—

"It is not permitted to any Sister to appropriate anything, however small, or under whatever pretext, to herself; since each shall on the day of her entrance renounce in favour of the Community not only the possession but the use and disposition of everything which is hers, or shall be given to her; all this being under the entire regulation of the Superior. Ye shall neither ask for nor receive anything without permission; and when ye shall have received it, ye shall place it in the hands of the Mother-Assistant for use of the Society." (Goodman's Sisterhoods in the Church of England, Page 83.)

In this way vast sums of money are acquired for the spread of the Romanizing movement in the Church of England. And here, of course, arises another question—Is there any public audit made of the accounts of Ritualistic Sisterhoods? It is through its Charity Commissioners, to ascertain that the funds of public institutions are fairly and honestly administered, and that there shall be no breach of trust in any case. . . .

The vow of chastity, as taken by the Ritualistic Sisters of Mercy, needs not to be dwelt upon at any length. Many volumes have been written on the subject of this vow in Roman Catholic countries amongst men and women; but I think that it will be acknowledged by every impartial reader that neither it nor either of the other convent vows are required of anybody by the Church of England. They stand with no Church of England authority whatever. They are distinctly Romish, and are therefore necessary as a part of the Romanizing conspiracy to "Catholicize" the Church of England.

* Extracted from "The Ritualists: Their Romanizing Objects and Work." By Walter Walsh, author of "The Secret History of the Oxford Movement." (Paper, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d. nett. Nisbet.) This is "A Book for the People," and deserves the serious attention of all Protestants.

The Martyr's Crown.

Rejoice, and be exceeding glad, for great is your reward in heaven (Matt. v. 12).

Too oft with careless steps we pass
Where He has said, "Beware!"
Our Master's agony for sin
We all too feebly share.

But where He cries, "Rejoice, be glad!"
Our tears of anguish flow,
The Martyr's crown shines faint above
The fiery path of woe.

Christ, give us hearts to feel like thine,
Eyes in thy light to see,
To measure earthly loss and gain
By what they meant to Thee;

To watch above life's fleeting hour
Eternal glory break,
And triumph in their joy untold
Who died for thy dear sake.

C. C.

Rev. Charles Garrett.

"ONE of the Manchester papers was good enough to say that when I died the words ought to be cut on my tombstone, 'Here lies Charles Garrett, who tried to do his duty,' and the writer only did me justice. My failures within and without have been numberless, but I have tried. My one thought has been to lift up the downtrodden, and to save others from sorrows which I have tasted." Thus, characteristically, wrote Charles Garrett of himself.

Mr. Garrett, whose decease we recently announced, was an earnest and effective preacher, and a large-souled philanthropist. He had for many years devoted himself especially to the service of the suffering and degraded, and his incessant efforts for the well-being of the masses had earned him the esteem of Christian people of all denominations.

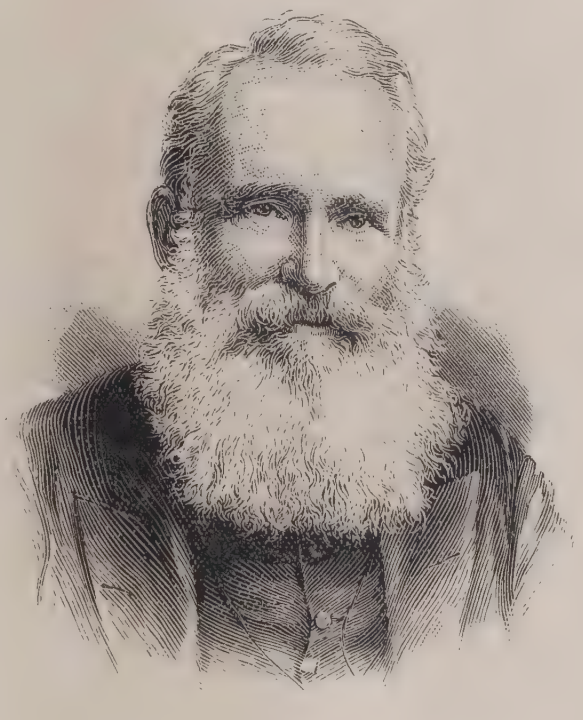
Born at Shaftesbury, in Dorsetshire, he at the age of fourteen signed the teetotal pledge, and shortly afterwards became a popular temperance advocate. He became a Wesleyan Sunday-school teacher, and subsequently a local preacher. Resolving to devote his life to the ministry of the Gospel, he was accepted by the Conference, and, in 1847, entered Richmond College. His first sphere of activity as a minister was at Mildenhall in Suffolk, and then, after Ely and Louth, he proceeded to such populous centres as Rochdale, Preston, and Hull, and rapidly developed in power and usefulness. His forcible and sympathetic appeals influenced large numbers of people, and many believed unto salvation. Mr. Garrett considered that men lacked a true perception of, and sorrow for, sin. Hence his pungent, powerful, persuasive appeals for its abandonment.

Mr. Garrett's chief work, was, of course, the Liverpool Mission, which he founded a quarter of a century ago. He was the first Wesleyan minister appointed to establish and superintend a city mission, and to be emancipated from the three years' rule. It was an experiment; but, aided by his esteemed wife, he succeeded in conciliating opponents, winning friends, and making his way.

From one chapel, Pitt Street, ill-adapted and burdened with a huge debt, Mr. Garrett's Mission has branched out into eight chapels and halls, besides houses for men, women, youths, girls, and children, and into many another ingenious method of doing good; and all without debt. This was all only a natural sequence to his untiring zeal and unquenchable sympathy for the poor of Preston during the terrible times of the Cotton Famine, when literally he kept many from starving to death.

In Liverpool, where he lived for more than twenty-eight years, Mr. Garrett became a remarkable power for good in civic life. He was consulted and trusted by members of Parliament, by mayors and magistrates, and by chief constables, by merchants and philanthropists, as well as by bishop and clergy, and ministers of all the churches. He suggested the formation of the Vigilance Committee, which has so nobly aided the Watch Committee and the police in the surveillance of the drink traffic and the enforcement of the licensing laws. That the Liverpool Licensing Bench is in the van of temperance reform to-day, is largely the result of his work.

The story of the establishment of "The Liverpool British Workman Cocoa Rooms" is well known. The memorable mission of Messrs. Moody and Sankey, in 1874, reached its climax in the All-Day Convention in the Victoria Hall. The wealth, the education, the religion, the philanthropy of Liverpool were represented in the immense gathering. Mr. Moody requested Mr. Garrett to speak on the subject, "How to reach the Masses." To describe the incident in Mr. Garrett's words:—"I hesitated to respond, but found there was no alternative. I said the answer to the question was a simple one, as it had been supplied by the Saviour when communing with his disciples. I pointed out that the Saviour's words were, 'Go to every creature,' and that in building churches and chapels we had been saying to the people 'Come,' instead of acting upon Christ's injunction to 'Go.' I said, 'We are mourning over the immorality of Liverpool. We have been branded as the black spot on the Mersey, and what is the cause—the giant cause—of this immorality?



From photograph by Messrs. Russell & Sons, 17, Baker Street, London, W.

Without question it is the drink traffic, which has been to a large extent supreme in the city. I said that, looking to the docks, they would find 10,000 to 12,000 men employed there, and yet from end to end there was not a single place which a working-man could enter except the public-house, nor any place where his wife or daughter could wait without danger of being insulted. I suggested that, if we were really in earnest, our best plan would be to form a company, with, say, £10,000 capital, and open places along the docks where the wants of the men could be supplied without the dangers and risks which must always be inseparable from public-houses."

Mr. Garrett's proposal was received with enthusiasm. Mr. Moody went to the late Mr. Alexander Balfour in the meeting, and said to him, "Mr. Balfour, here is salvation for Liverpool; will you take hold of a company like this?" Mr. Balfour at once said, "Yes, I will take a thousand shares." Mr. Samuel Smith and a host of others followed the example, and Mr. Moody was able to announce that the company was formed and the capital raised. People from all parts were throwing money on the platform asking to have shares in the company, and the scene inspired the late Professor Drummond to write a pamphlet, entitled, "What Five Minutes Did."

The Cocoa Tavern Company has thriven exceedingly, and, although the shareholders did not found it with the idea of making money, they have received practically 10 per cent. from the beginning. At the present moment there are upwards of seventy "British Workman Public-houses" in operation, £50,000 is invested in the company, and 30,000 persons are fed daily. The influence of the movement is to be seen in many other towns. The practical benefits cannot be over-estimated. The Wesleyan Conference, which in 1882 elected Mr. Garrett its president, further showed its high appreciation of his work in Liverpool by making his appointment in the city permanent.

The shrewdness and quiet pertinacity of Mr. Garrett largely helped to found the Methodist Recorder newspaper, and out of his own personal afflictions sprang the Homes of Rest for Ministers and the Invalid Ministers' Rest Fund. When stationed in Preston, he was one of the four founders of the Industrial Orphan Home and School. His presidential year was made memorable by the erection of the Wesley Memorial at Epworth, the funds for which he largely helped to raise.

The late Bishop Ryle entertained the greatest respect for his Wesleyan co-labourer, to whom he wrote, in the early part of this year: "We shall probably not meet much more in this world, but I shall not forget you, and live in the hope that we shall meet to part no more in the world to come, where there is no death and where there shall be no more tears." Bishop Chavasse, too, speaking at the recent Diocesan Conference at Liverpool, said: "Charles Garrett belonged to the whole Church of Jesus Christ. He was a true man of God, a warm-hearted evangelist, a remarkable philanthropist and lover of his fellow men, and set an example to ministers in every Christian body. I am sure, as we read the Psalms this morning, we must have thought of him as we came to the words,—'Right dear in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints.'"

Demill Ladies' College.

SINCE the return of Rev. H. B. Demill to the Ladies' College, St. Catherine's, Ontario, the interest in the undertaking awakened by his visit to Great Britain, has found many practical expressions. In acknowledging the sympathy manifested by our readers, Mr. Demill emphasises the need for visiting the surrounding towns and villages in order that the thousands of young girls who are being drawn to Romanism may be rescued. The faculty, however, hesitate to incur further liability until the College is relieved of the debt with which it is now burdened.

As an instance of the need and utility of the institution, Mr. Demill writes:—"A friend wrote me to come to Toronto, where a bright young girl was likely to be placed in a convent. I hastened to the place. The night before they had seen the convent people, but no positive arrangements had been made. The mother told me she could not sleep for the anxiety of having her child in a convent, and expressed her gratitude in finding a school under Protestant management in which to place her. Reverses have overtaken the mother, who is now obliged to earn the livelihood for herself and daughter. We have to take her girl for a little over half our regular low rate. It is wonderful how many Protestant young girls there are in convents. There is much necessity for our work being extended, that many more may be rescued from the blight of that terrible system of deception."

Elisha, the Prophet of Vision.

III.—Equipped.

By Rev. F. S. WEBSTER, M.A.*

IT was a very special equipment that Elisha received on the day of Elijah's rapture. It was something manifest and unmistakable. "The spirit of Elijah doth rest upon Elisha," was the spontaneous testimony of the sons of the prophets. Heaven received a new guest that day, one of the bravest and noblest of the sons of men; and earth received a new enduement of heavenly power, when a "double portion" of the master's spirit came upon the young servant.

1. What was this double portion? The more ancient authorities explain it as a larger measure of the Holy Spirit. Theodoret declares that Elisha demanded a gift of the spirit of prophecy twice as large as that granted to Elijah. Luther adopts the same view. And, if the request seems lacking in modesty, it is maintained that it was a sense of personal inferiority that prompted it. Elisha felt that if he was to be a worthy successor to Elijah he would need twice as much Divine assistance as Elijah enjoyed. If, too, he knew that he would be more of a domestic prophet than Elijah had been, this would INCREASE HIS SENSE OF NEED.

It takes more grace to follow Jesus Christ in his untainted, uncompromising mixing with men, than to follow John the Baptist. This view is borne out by the fact that Elisha worked more miracles than Elijah, and it is in beautiful harmony with the parallel in the New Testament—"The works that I do shall he do also; and greater works than these shall he do; because I go unto the Father."

The modern view, however, is that in asking for "a double portion" (a double mouthful, the word really is), Elisha was only seeking the portion belonging to the eldest son. If this were so, why should Elijah have answered, "Thou hast asked a hard matter," and why should he have expressed any hesitation as to the granting of the request? A father can give the first-born's blessing with confidence. Surely "the double portion" was nothing less than the fulness of the Holy Ghost, in Old Testament times; but now, thank God, the lawful inheritance and right of every true child of God.

A RARE ENDOWMENT

It was typified by the mantle which Elisha received after it had been doubly baptized, first in the waters of Jordan, then in the fire of heaven. So does our ascended Saviour baptize us "with the Holy Ghost and with fire."

Notice the four occasions where the mantle is mentioned. (1) In 2 Kings xix. 13, Elijah uses it to hide his face when God was speaking to him. So by means of the Holy Spirit we hold communion with, and are able to hear the voice of, God. (2) In 1 Kings xix. 19, Elijah casts it upon Elisha. So by means of the Holy Spirit we influence men and win them for God. (3) In 2 Kings ii. 8, the waters of Jordan divide when smitten with it. So every difficulty can be overcome, God makes a way for us through the most impassable barrier, if we rely upon the Holy Spirit. (4) In 2 Kings ii. 13 the mantle fell from the shoulders of Elijah as he was swept up into the presence of God. He had no need of it when translated and transformed. And we who now know God only by the Spirit will, when Jesus comes, see Him face to face. There will be no wrapping of our faces then.

FAITH WILL BE LOST IN SIGHT.

2. How did this "double portion" come to Elisha? We notice both parallel and contrast to the story of Pentecost and the Ascension. The contrast is on Elijah's part. He said, "Ask what I shall do for thee before I be taken from thee." He knew the limitations of his own power. The fiction of influence exercised by departed saints is proved utterly without foundation by this Scripture. Very different was it with the Lord Jesus. He said, "If I depart, I will send Him unto you."

* Notes of an address in All Souls' Church, Langham Place.

Christ's power to give the Holy Ghost dated from his Ascension. Elijah's power to do anything ceased with his translation. So there was a note of uncertainty in Elijah's granting of the request. There was only one "if" in the Saviour's promise: "If ye shall ask anything in my name, I will do it." And this helps us to understand the meaning of the condition in Elisha's case. To ask in Christ's name means to ask with a due sense of Christ's authority and glory. "The Holy Ghost was not yet received, because that Jesus was not yet glorified!" It is as "we see Jesus crowned," as our faith sees beyond this world, where He is rejected and despised, to the heaven where He is "crowned with glory and honour," that we become "endued with power from on high." If had been as he was with all the travel stains, and marks of conflict of his earthly pilgrimage, he would never have been the man of power that he became. While it was his single-hearted spirituality that enabled him, through God's grace to see that heavenly sight, it was the vision itself that made him the man "full of faith and the Holy Ghost" that he so manifestly proved to be. In the case of Elisha the Pentecostal enduement followed immediately after the Ascension: there was no ten days' delay, as with the apostles. His testing time, his emptying time, came first; and when his faith was perfected by the sight of the open heaven, the "double portion"

BECAME AT ONCE HIS OWN.

3. How perfectly natural the story is! Elisha's grief was genuine and unrestrained. Spirituality does not uproot natural feeling. His grief was personal: he rent his clothes as one who mourned for a father. His grief was patriotic: he felt that "the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof," had been taken from them. For of more value to the nation than any standing army were the zeal for righteousness and the strong faith in God which Elijah so conspicuously possessed.

But his grief gave place to action. With resolute confidence he took up the prophet's mantle and retraced his steps towards Jordan. That retracing of his steps to the riverside was the most trying and critical period in his whole life. Would the same power that Elijah had exercised be at his command? The time between the claiming of a promise and the first outward manifestation of the fulfilment of it is always critical. You believe in the promise of forgiveness, and then wait for the sense of peace. And you must wait in faith. God will never give you any manifestation to encourage your faith: your faith must REST ON THE BARE PROMISE ALONE.

And Satan is busy with temptation, suggesting that, as everything seems just the same, the promise has not been fulfilled. So during that journey to Jordan Elisha was sorely tempted. "It was no use thinking that he could do what Elijah had done. It would be a great mistake to attempt to divide the waters. The sons of the prophets were looking on. Surely his first miracle had better be done in private. Let him fetch a compass and strike a ford higher up the river." But Elisha dared to believe. Not in himself, not in the mantle, but in God. Boldly he struck the waters, crying, "Where is the Lord God of Elijah?" At once the waters parted, and Elisha went over.

So must it be to-day. The world asks in derision, "Where is now their God?" The faint-hearted and curious ones who stand afar off echo the cry. The Church that cannot answer is doomed to fall. A supernatural faith demands a supernatural life. It is no use boasting of apostolic descent, or even keeping the apostolic faith, unless we live apostolic lives. The true Christian is one who has God as his friend and companion, and the world under his feet. If in simple faith and utter self-abandonment we claim our "double portion," there will be a strength and calm, a spirituality and deadness to the world about our lives, and men will see that the living God is with us.

From Mr. Henry Varley.

WE had a very pleasant voyage. The heat was trying, but bearable—not helpful to attendance at meetings on board. A number of the soldiers appeared much interested. The young commanding officer is, I trust, a real child of God, but taken with Catholic Apostolic Church views.

One very clear case was that of a young man, a passenger. Whilst I was speaking, I believe the Holy Spirit quickened him, and he "passed from death unto life." He is returning to England (as he wrote me) "to fall on my knees and ask my wife's forgiveness, whose heart I have well-nigh broken by my past sinful life. I go to show her what the Lord has wrought in me." On his return from Sydney he came, and said he knew not how to thank me for the blessing received. Praise the Lord for his use of us in any way, anywhere.

I have had already large meetings in this city, and many

DOORS ARE OPEN IN ALL DIRECTIONS.

The Geelong Convention has been a season of refreshing from all I hear. I did not go, for many things need attention after so long absence. I hear of disappointments on the part of some who used to attend and have ceased to do so. Stated in few words, it is put thus: "So long as we are at the Conferences, and attend the meetings, we get stirred up and share the spiritual joy, but it does not last!" Hence they have given up attending.

Now it is clear that there is danger just at this point. It is difficult to maintain a superfine experience in the ordinary round of daily life. Hence the importance of not overdoing the subjective side. It is the constant presentation of the Christ, the strong, faithful, and enduring One, who, when made known, and exalted, transfers Himself by the wisdom and grace of the Holy Spirit to his people. What Christ is must not be confounded with

THE BELIEVER'S EXPERIENCE.

We cannot improve upon the good old term, "the objective side of truth." To see and know what the Lord is, and, in the constant exercise of faith, to appropriate all that He is, yields an abiding foundation, every way superior to the most ecstatic or devoted conditions of Christian experience. If conventions for the attainment of a higher experience are not to wear themselves out, and pass away, the great doctrinal and practical truths of the Word of God must be searched out, restated, and emphasized in living and Holy Ghost power.

As an illustration, "The Band," as the company of brethren are called, who control and manage the Geelong Conference, have combined to shut out the truth of the Lord's pre-millennial advent. The solid and stable truths which belong to this great fact of Divine revelation is ignored chiefly because it does not suit Wesleyan views, and is regarded as unsuited to the emotional experience which is a leading aim and intention at this Conference. This is done in the forefront of terrible indications of that is going on, and of the near approach of his coming to deliver the groaning creation from its dirge and requiem into the power and glory which shall surely follow the "manifestation of the sons of God."

The weather here has been extraordinary, nearly six months of winter. It was cold and damp when we landed. My beloved wife took severe influenza cold which lasted some days. I am thankful that she is quite herself again. We join in warm love to you and any inquiring friends.

Melbourne, Victoria, September 18.

Antwerp Mariners' Institute.—Rev. J. Adams has been minister of the Mariners' Church, 21, Avenue du Commerce, Antwerp, for over eight years. He informs me that a visit from English Christian tourists or ministers is an extremely rare pleasure. An earnest brother, patiently toiling in such isolation, is surely worthy of the encouragement and cheer which a little knowledge of these facts is sure to bring him.—Yours truly, Edward Walker, Congregational Minister.

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, November 11. Jeremiah iv.

THOUGH Israel had incurred a just penalty, yet the Almighty was prepared to prevent the full incidence of the blow on condition that abomination and sin were put away. Therefore the command goes forth, Break up the fallow ground. It is absolutely necessary for the Church to get right, or the world cannot be saved. If any who read these words belong to churches which are anticipating a mission amongst the ungodly and worldly during the coming winter, let them exert all their influence first to secure a thorough amendment of conduct and heart from the professing children of God.

The appeal, however, to the rebellious city was destined to be in vain. In verse 5 the prophet beholds the northern invader entering and ravaging the land, and all hopes of averting the invasion are dismissed. From verse 10 one would suppose that Jeremiah had cherished a belief that the people would heed his appeals, and that the anger of God would be averted. Instead of this, he realizes that God is about to sweep the land, not with the cool breeze that winnows the grain, but with the deadly sirocco and its clouds of scorching sand (v. 11).

In the most graphic language the prophet depicts the sudden destruction which was about to fall, and the terrible effect of the invasion, which would reduce the land to a repetition of primeval chaos (cf. v. 23 with Gen. i. 2). It is necessary that we should declare the judgments of God. I notice that five times in St. Matthew's Gospel our Lord speaks about the wailing and gnashing of teeth. Let us not omit that note, though we speak it with tears.

MONDAY, November 12. Jeremiah v.

Diogenes, the cynic, was discovered one day in Athens in broad daylight, candle in hand, looking for something. When someone remonstrated with him, he said that he needed all the light possible to enable him to find a man. Something like that is in the prophet's thought. God was prepared to spare Jerusalem on lower terms than even Sodom, and yet He was driven to destroy her. Both poor and rich had alike "broken the yoke and burst the bonds."

The description of the onset of the Chaldeans is very graphic. They settle down upon the land as a flock of locusts, but still the chosen people refuse to connect their punishment with their sin. It never occurred to them that the failure of the rain, the withering of their crops, and the assault of their foes, were all connected with their sin. There is nothing very strange in this obtuseness, for as we read the history of our own times, men are equally inapt at connecting national disaster with national sin.

What a delightful metaphor is that of v. 22, which reminds us that God has made the soft sand a perpetual barrier against the sea! It is not necessary for Him to resist the waves with a parapet of cliffs; sand will serve his purpose equally well. It makes one think that the people of God, lowly and pulverized though they be, will yet suffice to resist the onset of the mighty waves of Satan's power. Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings, God ordains strength.

TUESDAY, November 13. Jeremiah vi.

Again the prophet describes the coming of the dreaded Chaldean. He compares the Chaldean generals and their armies to flocks which cover the land and devour everything. He sees the brown tents pitched around the city, and hears the clarion summoning the assault at noon. The soldiers, eager for plunder, regret the falling of night, and resolve that even the darkness shall not interpose between them and their prey. The people seemed utterly obdurate, and their obstinacy aroused even the anger of the prophet (v. 11).

How often men try to heal the wounded conscience by saying, Peace, Peace, when there is none. So long as sin is unrepented of, so long as men do not know how to blush, there is no justification for speaking kind and soft things. We must not scruple to declare the whole counsel of God, tearing away the bandage with which men conceal their proud flesh, dealing stringently and faithfully in the hope of bringing them to repentance.

I heard one say the other day that if you travel along a fresh and unfrequented road, and come to a place where four ways meet, but the sign post is fallen down, and you cannot tell which of the directions is indicated by either of the four arms, there is always one way of solving your difficulty. You always know the name of the place you have come from, and by putting the arm of the sign post which has the familiar name upon it, in the line of the road by which you have travelled, you are able to tell at once the names of the towns to which the other three roads will conduct. So, in the difficult maze of life, it is often well to ask for the old paths—your mother's words, your father's counsel, what you learnt in the home. These will enable you to adjust your journey through the unknown.

WEDNESDAY, November 14. Jeremiah vii.

This message was given in the gate of the Temple, which probably was entered by as vast crowds as in other and happier days. The prophets led the people to suppose that if they maintained their outward observance of religious rites, they would escape impending judgment. Men are always prone to attribute to the externals of religion a saving efficacy, imagining that a rigorous attention to these will condone for the commission of sins like those enumerated in the earlier verses. It is a terrible thing for a soul when, beneath an outward decorum of behaviour, the heart is filled with all manner of abominations, as the Temple was filled with robbers (v. 11. See also Matt. xxi. 13).

Shiloh was an utter waste. When the ten tribes of Israel tempted and rebelled against the Most High God, and kept not his testimonies, they moved Him to anger, so that He forsook the tabernacle of Shiloh, the tent which He placed amongst them, and delivered his strength into captivity, and his glory into the adversary's hand (Psa. lxviii. 60). So the fate of Shiloh, which at the time of writing was utterly destitute, would overtake Jerusalem.

The ornate ritual of Leviticus was not part of the original covenant between God and Israel. All He asked of them was obedience (vv. 22-23). And in our own behaviour towards God, the observance of religious rules and ritual is comparatively unimportant if only the heart is ever open toward Him. The outward is, after all, only the scaffolding for the inward; or like the bladder on which boys learn to swim, but with which they must learn to dispense before they can strike out into the deep. The discipline of school prepares for the independent life of manhood. The law is our schoolmaster leading to Christ—but have we reached Him?

THURSDAY, November 15. Jeremiah viii.

This chapter is filled with denunciation of the unreasonable and infatuated obstinacy of Israel. As the horse rushes madly to the fight, so were the people set on evil. The very birds that were sensitive to the laws of migration, and obeyed the call of the sunnier clime, were more impressible than was the chosen race. O my soul, art thou sensitive to those gentle monitions of the Spirit of God, which are intended to direct his children? How often does God call thee away from the stormy winter to the lands of sunny fellowship and burning love, but thou heedest not! Probably these impressions of God's will, like the gentle touches of a lover's hand, are perpetually accosting us, but we are too busily engaged with our affairs to notice them.

From v. 10 we have a description of the desolation about to visit the land, causing the people's heart to turn faint. Far away, in the far country, the exiles might begin to question how such a fate could have befallen them, when they had counted on God being in Zion as its King. There could be but one answer, that He had been provoked to anger; therefore they were not saved, though harvest and summer had passed.

Is not this the secret why you are not saved; why the harvest passes, and the summer ends; why year succeeds to year, and still you are held by the cords of your sin? You are regenerate; the Lord Jesus is within you by his Spirit, and willing to be your King. There is balm in Gilead and a Physician. The Spirit of God is prepared to break your bonds asunder, and give you complete deliverance. But He is as a mighty man who cannot save, so long as you persist in grieving the Holy Spirit by ways which are a constant affront to Him.

FRIDAY, November 16. Jeremiah ix.

Tears, give me tears, as I see the vast population of Great Britain, growing up without the religion that made our land great. When the working classes in growing numbers absent themselves from places of worship; when the youths and maidens turn their backs upon the religion of their fathers; when the little children count their Sunday-schools irksome—what reason there is to weep! When Jesus beheld the city, He wept over it.

So great was the sin of his people, that the prophet felt that the most desolate lodging place would be preferable to their company. Brother supplanted brother, neighbour slandered neighbour. They wearied themselves to commit iniquity. Therefore, they must be scattered among the heathen. It is wonderful how God overruled that scattering, for the cleansing of his people, and the enriching of the world. It seems as though He must do good in one way, if not in another. If He cannot make of us his ideal, He will do the next best thing that is possible.

Nothing human or earthly can give us security. True safety and honour can only come by knowing, obeying, and trusting God (23, 24). Let us turn to 1 Cor. i. 18, which is founded on this passage, and learn how little the wisdom and might of the world avail in the presence of God. Better profess the Cross with its apparent foolishness and weakness, better elect to stand with Christ though He be crucified, better choose to be counted amongst the foolish, the weak, and the base things of the world whom God hath chosen, than to glory in the might and wealth of this vain world, which are but for a moment.

SATURDAY, November 17. Jeremiah x.

What a contrast the prophet draws between the idols with which the cities of Judah were filled and the king of nations! We are conducted into an idol factory, into which the workmen bring a tree from the forest, of which they make idols, and carry them whither they will. If the images glisten with silver or golden plates, or are clothed in blue and purple, what is it but the work of cunning men? From them to the true God, the living God, the everlasting King, how unutterable the space! O fellow believer, why do we fear before nations which lack the knowledge of our God? How impossible it is for their gods to deliver them; how certain it is that Christianity must become the all-conquering religion of the world!

The eleventh verse in the original is in Chaldee, a dialect which Jeremiah uses only here. It was probably interpolated as a suggested answer for the exiled Jews when catechized by their foes. Having uttered it, the prophet proceeds with a sublime description of God. How insignificant do our foes become when we contrast them with Him who established the world by his wisdom, and stretched out the heavens by his understanding! He is our portion. We are his inheritance and He is ours. We have all in Him, and He should have all from us.

If you do not pray, you cannot prosper. If you do not inquire of the Lord, your flock will scatter. O minister of God's Gospel, be not content with speaking to man more than thou speakest to God (v. 21). Let God direct thy steps (v. 23). Often lift thy soul to Christ, and say, "Correct me, let me not miss thy best, or anything which it is possible for man to know, or do, or be, in this mortal life. If this can only come by privation and suffering, so be it"

The Chinese Crisis.—2.

By Rev. W. REMFRY HUNT, Shanghai.

ARE THE MISSIONARIES TO BLAME?

MISSIONARIES are suffering much of the blame at the hands of the enemies of the Cross, both heathen and Western, for this uprising. Missions, it is true, have contributed not a little to the convulsion. They did not, however, instigate the rebellion. In the arena of an arrested and dying civilization missions have played a primary part. They sounded the bugle blast of reform. They educated the masses. They inspired hope in the minds of enslaved millions. Through the multiple agencies that have been at work in this great empire, in both secular and religious avenues, the forces of civilization in railroads, mines, quarries, telegraphs, schools, and colleges have had a peculiar and disturbing effect upon the foundations of Chinese life and society.

Into the compound of superstitions in the Chinese mind has also been forced the strangest innovations. The "forrin devil" came to stay. He was given a cold perfunctory tolerance. It was hoped it would be made so warm for him that he should be compelled to retire on his own account. To the heathen astonishment, Christianity seemed to thrive on persecution. Not only did the missionary teach, but won converts. Was the Western cult of Jesus to supersede Confucianism? This was the point where the argument must converge.

The clash was inevitable. In asking the Chinese to forsake their ancestral customs, rites, ceremonies, idols, age-venerated creeds, dearest and cherished (though pagan) religious services, superstitions connected with terrestrial magnetism, the wind and water spirits, the gods which are part and parcel of all the ramifications of Chinese society, these demands, even though couched in the wisest and most tolerant language, have not been, be it said to the credit of Christian missionaries, misunderstood. It has, however, brought about a terrific impact of heathen and Christian ideas and ideals, and drawn out the angry derision and fiercest hate of the idolatrous priesthood whose craft is in danger.

THE OUTLOOK.

The future of this colossal empire is problematical. Whether the end of the Manchu dynasty is at hand, or whether under a new régime, and through a purely Chinese Government, a progressive and helpful era will result, or whether by still preserving the "territorial integrity" an international protectorate shall keep intact the dangerous elements in the state, the present indications or future forecasts do not aid in the solution of the mystery.

The situation is full of gravity. The "open door" has been shut in the face of the world. Walls of seclusion have been heightened only to be battered down by the forces of civilization. The envoys, ministers, and statesmen of the world have been treated with outrageous and murderous insults. Legations have been destroyed. Treaty rights have been trampled under foot. All this has been done with, and by the aid and sympathy of the Imperial Government. In this, her declaration of war against civilization, China has forfeited her claim to be given a place in the comity of nations, and has in the audacity and viciousness of her anti-foreign crusade more than outclassed the atrocities of the most barbaric races.

THE PEACE SETTLEMENT.

The Governments must establish a peace which shall be permanent. This should be known in every corner of the empire. China is arming on a gigantic scale. Any patching-up policy will be more than disastrous. An empire swings on the pivot of dissolution or reconstruction. To the great and powerful governments of Christendom the problem appeals for solution. The effect which the crisis has already had upon the relations of Governments with each other is indicative of the fact that the functions of those Governments in demanding protection and liberty for their nationals will be maintained.

It is too late in the day for Christian civilization to sanction the world powers to be half-civilized and half-savage. In professing to possess a high civilization, the Chinese have laid themselves open to the sternest rebuke and chastisement, and to them it may even yet mean that, if they cannot establish some sort of civilized government over themselves, then they must submit to one being maintained over them, both for their own as well as for the interests of our common humanity.

From REV. J. SADLER, Amoy.

As this is my last chance of approaching you before returning to China, may I say how grateful I am for the exceptional kindness you have shown in letting me plead the cause of China in your paper.

At the present critical period there is one point of importance to be noted. Many of the best friends of missions in this country are greatly exercised as to all missionary societies not sanctioning any punishment of those in China who have been guilty of the extraordinary crimes committed. They argue that we should act in the spirit of our dying Lord when he said, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." Now missionaries have shown that they do act in that way, but if the State see it needful to call for such action as friends dread there can hardly be a reason why we should interfere, any more than we do with the course of law in this country. The most solemn opinion of the very best men in China is, that unless some due chastisement be administered, in six months there will be a repetition of all the calamities and still worse. So that it is absolutely necessary for the State to act in a just and proper manner.

It cannot be imagined that any Christian in touch with his Saviour will deliberately and continuously call for revenge. Such a thing is out of the question.

BUT JUSTICE IS NOT REVENGE.

It is often said, Let missionaries cut all connection with the State. Will the friends who say this come down from abstractions and transcendentalism to the present conditions of actual life in the Far East, and show us how?

We are compelled to register ourselves at the Consular offices, according to our nationality. We are amenable to law just as at home. If we travel inland we must use a passport. It has been said that Britishers in China are less protected than the nationals of any other nation. Surely no one will wish that utter lawlessness should prevail in China any more than at home.

With regard to Scripture, any careful reader perceives that our Lord's teaching was many-sided, according to the circumstances. Though He said "My Kingdom is not of this world," He also said, "Render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's." Were He in China to-day, He would doubtless stand for national righteousness all round. Let it be observed that though we have to rejoice in the general fact that suffering is productive of good, yet it is to be remembered that some great students of history maintain that the blood of the martyrs is not always the seed of the Church, and they have instanced the Church in France, which never recovered the slaughter of the Huguenots. However we may be averse to the use of force, there is surely a loud call for the exercise of moral suasion and for such timely and firm dealing as will prevent war. Rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil. They are ordained of God, and should be so treated.

Buenos Aires.—A Conference of Christian workers of Buenos Aires and district was recently held in the Salado Hall. It was a gathering of much spiritual power, and the unity of those present, as expressed in the motto, "All one in Christ Jesus," was fully realized. The suggestion that such conferences be held periodically found much favour, and will probably be adopted Work among Boer Prisoners.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: There has been a time of rich blessing in the prisoners' camp at Green Point. Several have found light, and believers have received new impetus and have given themselves afresh to the Lord. Meetings for prayer and thanksgiving are still held, and much interest is shown. Rev. Mr. Snyman, from Ventersburg, led the services. Not a few among his audience were from his own congregation. He spoke earnestly on Heb. xii. 11, to the refreshment and comfort of many.

Rev. Mr. Alheit was lately the recipient of an address from the prisoners, signed by elders and deacons from different parts of the Orange River Colony, which ran: "Far from our native land, far, also, from our dearly beloved ones, we did not expect to have one of our own ministers. We did not call to you, 'Come over and help us,' but the Lord thought upon us, and He inquired, 'Who of my servants will go to the place where the prisoners are, and work in my vineyard there?' And you answered, 'Lord, I will go!' So your reverence has come to us and preached the Gospel to us, which has been to many of us the power of God unto salvation. Our sick you have visited, and prayed with and for them. You have gone to the burials to show the last honours to the dead. There you have given comfort. You have sent telegrams to relatives of the deceased. You have kindly satisfied our wants, and helped us to clothing and other necessities. And how shall we repay you? Here we have neither gold nor silver, we are but poor prisoners of war. But He who has called you is faithful, and will repay you. We can assure you that your labour has not been in vain amongst us; as many have testified already, they will thank God all the days of their lives for blessing received."

Rome and Our Soldiers.

SOME weeks ago we printed extracts from letters from nursing sisters in South Africa which appeared in the Irish Catholic, showing how our Protestant soldiers in South Africa were being supplied with Romish scapulars and charms. In a later issue of the same paper, we note further evidence of this effort of Roman Catholic workers to induce our soldiers to put their trust in these deluding things. This time the letter is from one of the "Sisters of Nazareth" at Port Elizabeth. She writes:—

"The Sisters visited the camp a day or two before the soldiers left, and distributed scapulars, badges, medals, &c. The poor fellows came in crowds, asking for these. It was consolation to us to see them all wearing the brown scapular on leaving here. They all knelt down, and begged the Sisters to put on the scapulars with their own hands. . . . Another poor fellow, when the Sisters gave him a miraculous medal, asked if it would bring him safely back to his old country, the Highlands of Scotland. Protestants also asked for, and seemed to have faith in, these objects of piety. Sergeant Everitt, poor man, called the other day to see his three little children. Although he is not a Catholic, he asked me to give him a pair of scapulars and badge of the Sacred Heart, and begged our prayers that Almighty God would spare him for his children's sake."

Meetings in Tibet.

WRITING to a friend at home, Dr. Martha Sheldon, American M.E. missionary at Darchula, says:—"On July 28 we were eight miles within Tibet, sitting by the road side, arrested by the Tibetans within a few rods of Tahalahat, where the Raja lives. We are now (August 4) safely back again. We spent Sunday in Tibet, held two meetings, and were ordered to leave. We replied that we never travelled on Sunday. We sent the Raja a silver penholder and a Tibetan Testament. I pulled out a Tibetan's aching tooth, and think the natives were mollified somewhat. At any rate they left us undisturbed, except to watch us. We crossed the Lipu Pass (17,500 ft.) with seven coolies, and our Christian Pandit and servant. Our people go over into Tibet in great numbers to trade."

The Indian Famine.

NOTES FROM WORKERS.

WRITING from the C.M.S. Orphanage at Nasik, Rev. A. Mainwaring says: "We have taken in over fifty famine children during the last few months, and have promised to receive 176 more from the Government relief camps. We have found in former famines that the waifs gathered at such a time require special nursing and food for several months."

Dr. Margaret Mackellar, of Neemuch, writing under date October 12, says: "I have to thank you for the different sums you have sent for our famine work in Neemuch. Hundreds and hundreds of souls have been helped thereby, and the work of distributing grain to the poor villagers will go on for two or three months yet. We have had to do with between 1,200 and 1,400 orphans in Neemuch. Of this number we have nearly 500 in our orphanage."

From Sihore, Mr. Alfred Taylor, of the Society of Friends, says: "After dismissing as many as possible from the Mission Poor House, we have 280 inmates, many of them in a miserable condition, and suffering from every sort of famine disease, with the exception of cholera, from which we are thankful to have been free for several weeks. Our Poor House work is more important than ever now, and the scenes there most distressing to us, even after all this heart-hardening time. The Poor House is really the famine relief hospital, and in it are gathered together some of the most awful cases of famine suffering that it is possible to imagine. There are still about 2,800 on relief works in Sihore."

One of the leaflets issued by the Kurku and Central India Hill Mission contains a letter from Mr. Lewis, of Bhaisdehi, Central Provinces, which says: "Government from the first recognised that it could not do all, and even definitely named certain lines of work which it must leave to private charity. These were: feeding and caring for the sick, and providing extra and more delicate food for them and for the emaciated than a Government kitchen could give; the provision of clothing—especially in the rains—for the ill-clad; seed-grain and bullocks for the small landholders, to give them a new start in life, when the ploughing and sowing season should arrive; the opening of cheap grain shops where necessary; and the care and future training of orphans. In each of these directions God has permitted us to minister to the people. We praise Him for thus touching the hearts of his people in many lands on behalf of stricken India, and our hands and hearts are strengthened by knowing how much prayer and self-denial these funds represent."

A Grateful Tribute.

WE recently announced the return to England, in impaired health, of Rev. Frederick Brown, of Tien-tsin, who was engaged by General Gaselee as guide and intelligence officer to the force on the march to Peking. Mr. Brown has received from China a copy of a letter sent by the Hon. E. H. Conger, United States Minister, to the missionaries besieged in Peking. It reads:—"To the besieged missionaries, one and all of you, so providently saved from certain massacre. I beg, in this hour of our deliverance, to express what I know to be the universal sentiment of our Diplomatic Corps, the sincere appreciation of, and profound gratitude for, the inestimable help which you, and the native Christians under you, have rendered towards our preservation. Without your intelligence and successful planning, and the uncomplaining exertions of the Chinese, I believe our salvation would have been impossible. I hope and believe that somehow in God's unerring plan your sacrifices and danger will bear rich fruits in the material and spiritual welfare of the people to whom you have so nobly devoted your lives and work. Assuring you of my personal respect and gratitude.—Very sincerely yours,

"E. H. Conger."

Obituary.

MISS K. EMERY.

FOR over thirty years Miss Kezia Emery, who passed away on August 17 last at Gavinana, Tuscany, had given her time, strength, and riches to Italy. She contributed with special generosity to the needs of the Italian poor. She was the mainstay of Dr. Guiseppe Comandi's Industrial School for Boys in Florence, and also supported orphans in other institutes. Miss Emery published and distributed, by means of her own colporteurs, millions of tracts, besides assisting the Bible Society. She had many pensioners on her bounty, too, in various parts of Italy. Miss Emery was constantly economising in her personal affairs. She lived and dressed in the simplest manner, regarding her large income as "not her own." Many lament the loss of her kind and gentle presence. S.B.

REV. W. HILL.

At the age of seventy-one, Rev. William Hill, a widely-known and esteemed minister of the Baptist denomination, has passed away. In 1855 he entered upon a missionary career, working at Berhampore, Ganjam, and Cuttack. After one years' service the condition of Mrs. Hill's health necessitated a return to England, and Mr. Hill accepted the pastorate at Barton-in-the-Beans, Leicestershire. Here, during Mr. Hill's pastorate, two new chapels were added, and the work prospered greatly. A second journey to India was undertaken on Mrs. Hill's health becoming improved, and that lady superintended mission orphanages, and was a pioneer of Zenana work. Some few years subsequently, Mr. Hill was elected as the secretary of the General Baptist Missionary Society. This necessitated his residence in England. When the fusion between his society and the Baptist Missionary Society took place, he devoted his energies to the work of the Bible Translation Society, and to advocating the claims of missions.

DR. FREDERIC GODET.

It is with sincere regret that we announce the death of Professor Frederic Godet, the well-known Biblical commentator, at the age of eighty-eight. In the words of Le Christianisme: "In him the town of Neuchatel loses the most illustrious of its sons, and Evangelical Theology in the French language its most eminent representative. Moreover, the sorrow which overwhelms the Free Church of Neuchatel and Protestant Switzerland, will be felt throughout Evangelical Christendom."

Dr. Godet studied theology in his native town, also at Berlin and Bonn. He was ordained to the ministry in 1836, and spent a couple of years as assistant pastor at Vallangin. In 1838 a new and important sphere of usefulness opened to him as tutor to the Crown Prince of Prussia, the late Emperor Frederick of Germany. For six years he held this position, inspiring such respect and love as to lay the foundation of a friendship which terminated only with the Emperor's death. After leaving the Royal Family of Prussia, Dr. Godet spent six years as pastor in the Val-de-Ruy. From 1851 to 1866 he was pastor at Neuchatel, and during all that time onward till 1873 the Professor of Exegetical and Critical Theology in the National Church. From 1873 to 1887, when he retired, he was Professor of the same subjects in the Theological School of the Independent Church of Neuchatel.

He was a Doctor of Divinity from the University of Basle and from Edinburgh. He rendered great service by his writings, and especially his New Testament Expositions, amounting to well-nigh twenty volumes, and covering the most read and most studied sections of the Sacred Book. He made substantial contributions to Christian thought and conviction along lines distinctively Evangelical, and his volumes on John's Gospel and the Epistle to the Romans occupy a place of their own in a great literature. The author was a man of faith, careful of truth, and had all the mental and spiritual qualifications for the leader of men in the highest reaches of religious inquiry. In recent years his health was feeble, and he is mourned by those who honoured and loved him as a Christian and a scholar.

Irish Notes.

MR. M. W. BEATTY, M.A., son of Rev. Dr. Beatty, ex-Moderator of the General Assembly, and a young man of great promise, who has undergone a thorough course of training for foreign missionary service, has been set apart by the Presbytery of Belfast for mission work in India.

The Egyptian Mission Band, which was formed about three years ago in Belfast, when six young men went out to Egypt to study Arabic, and do what they could for the expansion of the Master's Kingdom in that country, has been doing a valuable work among the English, Germans, French, Italians, Greeks, Copts, Moslems, Syrians, Druses, Swiss, and Levantines scattered in the villages along the Nile Delta. The first public meeting of the Band was held in Belfast last Friday evening. Rev. C. Inwood presiding. Addresses were delivered by Mr. J. Martin Cleaver, B.A., and others.

The opening meetings of the sessions of Magee College, Londonderry, and the Assembly's College, Belfast, took place last week under favourable auspices. At Magee College the opening address was delivered by Rev. Dr. Petticrew, who took for his subject "The Sinner's Inability in Spiritual Things;" and in the Assembly's College, Belfast, the opening address, which was by Professor Walker, was on "A Survey of the Criticism of the Old Testament during the Nineteenth Century." Both addresses were very able and were listened to with deep attention. In Magee College also a statue of the late Rev. Dr. Rogers, of Londonderry, was unveiled.

By the death of Rev Dr. James Griffin, of Dublin, the Irish Methodist Church has lost one of its oldest and most highly-respected ministers. Born in 1813, he entered the ministry of the late Primitive Wesleyan Methodist Conference in 1837, and for several years filled the position of Deputation Secretary, and in this capacity preached with great acceptance from time to time in many of the leading pulpits of Scotland and the North of England. He also filled with marked ability the position of President of the Conference. In 1877 he took a leading part in bringing about the union of the two principal Methodist bodies in Ireland, and ever since continued to be one of the best-known ministers of the United Conference. He was an impressive preacher and an able platform speaker.

The Y.W.C.A.

THE World's Y.W.C.A. week of prayer is held November 11-17. The president, Mrs. J. H. Tritton, writes, earnestly entreating all who are interested in work amongst young women to unite during the week. She continues: "The need for prayer is greater than ever, because the work is growing in nearly every land. Growth means difficulties to be overcome, more workers, more money, more prayer, and more praise. How much of the blessing for the coming year depends on prayer made during those days for God's blessing on the associations in America, Australasia, Africa, Asia, and Europe?

"The object of our World's Young Women's Christian Association is unique—(1) Because it brings Christ's message to nominal Christians in every land, whom the missionaries to the heathen are unable to help. (2) Because it is represented in every country and so appeals to us all, whether it be in India, Africa, Spain, Italy, China, or any other place which is specially on our hearts.

"A paper has been compiled with special subjects for prayer, and can be had on application to the World's Y.W.C.A. Office, 26, George Street, Hanover Square, W.

"Prayer meetings will be held each morning during the week at 11.45, at Morley Hall, George Street, Hanover Square, W."

The annual meeting of the Association at Weston-super-Mare was held under the presidency of Mr. Barstow. Miss Dora Clark, from India, gave an address, and Rev. J. Dawson, President of the Y.M.C.A., also spoke.

The autumn Conference in connection with the South of England and South Wales Branches was recently held in Bournemouth. The Mayor (Mr. J. C. Webber) presided. Miss Digby, in speaking, alluded to the death of the Hon. Mrs. Eliot, wife of the Dean of Windsor, who, while staying at Bournemouth, had taken a lively interest in the work of the Association. Rev. S. A. Selwyn, shortly leaving for his new sphere of work at Hampstead, and Mrs. Meyer, also addressed the meeting.

Home Missions.

At Midland Fairs.

In the course of a brief review of the evangelistic campaigns which this society has carried on at fairs during the present autumn, Mr. W. L. Tweedie writes:—"Amid the din of steam roundabouts, and surrounded by a surging mass of humanity, a devoted band of about a dozen evangelists from the Open-Air Mission, go forth to preach the Gospel. Hymn and testimony follow each other in quick succession, each speaker, under the Divine enabling, driving the truth home deeper and deeper upon heart and conscience until at last there breaks forth the cry, 'Oh, sir, what shall I do? I would like to give God my heart! Yes, I will trust Him now!' and so on. What a consummation to all the labour!

"Such, briefly, are the experiences of recent endeavours at Peterborough, at Nottingham, and at Leicester. We praise God for many who have been gathered in at these places.

"But not the least interesting experience has been that in the villages round Nottingham. During three days we visited nine of these, holding in all twenty-three services. God wrought mightily by his Spirit and the Word. We may give one case.

AN OLD WOMAN,

eighty-one years of age, stood listening attentively to the proclamation of the Gospel. When the service was over she came forward, and, with streaming eyes, said, 'Oh, I do want to be saved, but I have such a wicked home I don't know what to do, and I have been so bad!' Later, she said, 'I will trust Him, just now.' As we drove away from that village, a collier, with coal-begrimed face, who had been standing at his own door attentively listening all the while, cried out to us,

'BE SHARP AND COME BACK AGAIN!'

"During this campaign some 40,000 tracts, booklets, Gospel portions, and marked Testaments have been distributed, and for the most part thankfully received. The loyal co-operation, warm support, and generous hospitality of many Christian friends, has greatly helped and cheered us."

THE AUTUMNAL REUNION.

Members, supporters, and friends of the Mission rallied in large numbers at Exeter Hall, for the autumnal reunion, a few days ago. This annual gathering is welcomed as an opportunity for workers enjoying mutual conversation, and a means of strengthening the ties which bind together labourers of varied and extensive spheres.

At the meeting, which followed the "social," Mr. M. H. Hodder presided, and spoke words of hearty greeting and encouragement to the workers. He related his own personal experiences when commencing as an open-air preacher, and went on to urge the importance of those with the privileges of education taking part in out-door evangelistic effort. God can do without culture and education, but He demands both. Colonel F. W. Roberts and Colonel F. Major described phases of the work at seaside resorts and racecourses, where, often from a restless and scowling crowd, the penitent's cry for mercy has arisen. Mr. Wm. Henry Bird related his experiences among villages on the Welsh Hills, how in remote districts crowds had gathered to hear the Gospel preached by the evangelists, and numbers at every meeting had caught Christ. The secretary, Mr. Frank Cockrem, briefly reviewed the summer's work, and acknowledged the loyalty and devotion of the brethren who have unsparingly given their services to the extension of the operations of the Mission.

Dr. George Hanson, of Marylebone Presbyterian Church, followed with an earnest and helpful address.

Miss Steer's Work.

THE Samaritan work so vigorously carried on by Miss Steer in the East End of London is, as one of the speakers said last week at the annual gathering, of national importance. The same energy and faith which were applied to the work of rescue in days when Ratcliff Highway was full of flaunting infamy, are now devoted chiefly to preventive effort in the interests of the young.

The annals of the Bridge of Hope are in which ill-treated, half-starved, miserable little children have been transplanted from the filth and fever, the dirt and degradation of the slums to the brightness and comfort of the Children's Homes at Chingford. Miss Steer also cites many cases where men who have lost their wives, or still sadder, when the women are confirmed inebriates, have brought their children to the Bridge of Hope, willing to pay all they could afford, so that the children might be saved from the evils surrounding them.

Miss Steer's work, however, is of a many-sided character. There is the night shelter, where, immediately, and without inquiry, any friendless young woman or girl is received and boarded and lodged until other arrangements can be made for her. During the past year, 741 cases were sheltered, most of them being and girls under twenty years of age needing protection and help. The importance of such an institution amid the squalid and destitute district between Whitechapel and the Thames is obvious; but, beyond this, there are so few places where destitute and distressed women can find shelter for the night, that Miss Steer's homely and well-managed refuge is resorted to from all parts of the metropolis.

Rescue work is still carried on, although, largely as an outcome of the efforts of Miss Steer and her friends, the character of the vicinity has been entirely changed, and houses of ill-fame and ill-sanitation have been closed and demolished.

"Every year," says Miss Steer, "we get many young women to visit us, who have passed through the Home, and long since left us for service. A few months since, B.B. came to see us. Eight years ago she was here, having sought shelter from the temptations that were ruining her life. She has been six years in her present situation, and is a valued Christian servant. She reminded us that it was in one of our Sunday afternoon Bible classes that the resolve was formed, and which she has since kept."

The truly Christian and abiding character of the work is well illustrated by the following cases: "Three years ago H.S. went out into service. She was not one in whom we had confidence, and she was thought of with some anxiety. But she kept her first place two years, steadily improving, and then only left to take her sister's place in a family where she had been many years. S. has passed her first year there most satisfactorily, and seems likely to remain.

NOW A SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHER,

she is deeply interested in her work, but she never forgets the Home." J.H., who left some years ago, and of whom Miss Steer could not then feel very hopeful, recently wrote: "I am sending you a little gift for the work. I am respectably married, and have a nice home now. I gave you a lot of trouble, and I am always sorry for that, but I owe everything to you, and the teaching I had at the Home. . . . I should like so much to come and see you, for you were my best friend."

The annual meeting unfortunately clashed with the public reception of the City Imperial Volunteers, so that many friends, feeling unable to face the difficulties of crossing London on such an occasion, were absent. The gathering was marked, however, by many expressions of cheer and sympathy. Rev. R. W. Harris, rector of St. George-in-the-East, who presided, paid a tribute of respect to the memory of Prebendary Harry Jones, who supported the work so firmly, and went on to voice the claims of Miss Steer's large family of 250, who have to be clothed and fed. Mr. Harris referred to the evidences of worth supplied by the Cottage Homes, which he described as

"A VERITABLE GARDEN OF SOULS."

In the spirit of true patriotism, which aims to make our country sweet and clean, the speaker appealed for a generous response to Miss Steer's urgent call for help.

Other speakers were Rev. J. P. Gledstone, Mr. W. A. Coote (National Vigilance Association), and Miss Blanche Leppington, all of whom spoke earnest words in advocacy of much needed social reforms, and in encouragement of Christian effort. Miss Steer gave a brief address, outlining her present need, and giving some idea of the great and growing extent of the work. Not a single bed is unoccupied, and many of the cases pressing for admittance are of an urgent character. Miss Steer's address is the Bridge of Hope, Betts Street, E.

Soldiers on Salisbury Plain.

BEYOND the immediate results of the Sunday and week-day services and innumerable meetings at the Soldiers' Home and Welcome at Winchester, which for twenty-six years has had its headquarters in Hyde Close, the ramifications of the institution extend to every part of the civilized world. Wherever the flag of Britain flies and her soldiers penetrate, its influence is known and felt. While it cannot be said that all the troops camping on Salisbury Plain have been influenced by the Winchester Mission, it may be safely assumed that a large number have been led to higher and better things.

At Bulford Camp, the Volunteers heartily appreciated the privileges found in the Winchester tent, where interesting literature, writing materials, and refreshments are provided. Carefully as this department of the work is looked after, the spiritual side is ever kept to the front, with most encouraging results. Night after night the tent was crowded with soldiers listening attentively to the homely, earnest words, and joining heartily in the stirring hymns. Apart from the services and meetings, there was the regular daily work of the missionary moving in and out among the men, speaking words of counsel and encouragement. When the camp broke up, many were the expressions of gratitude and appreciation from those who had been helped both spiritually and temporally through the efforts of Miss Perks and her colleagues.

Mrs. Macalpine's Homes.

TO those who are ofttimes perplexed and saddened because of the manifest power of the evils which beset young womanhood, a report such as that to hand of Mrs. Macalpine's Institutions, at Manchester, cannot but prove a means of inspiration and encouragement. A note of sincere gratitude is voiced by matrons of both the Rescue and Maternity Homes for the answers to prayer and the sympathetic interest of friends of the erring. No serious or critical cases have marked the year. A deep religious feeling has been noticeable among the girls, and in many instances there has been reason to believe that the great change has been wrought. In place of the sad, sullen, and hopeless look there has come the brightness and joy only born of a surrendering of self to Christ.

Seventy-five patients have attended the Maternity Homes. In forty-two instances the putative fathers of infants have been dealt with; in some cases relations have undertaken it, but more frequently the expense of obtaining meagre money compensation falls upon the authorities of the Homes. Many grateful letters are received from former patients, who have not forgotten the friends who held out to them a helping hand in their time of need. The Rescue Home proves an incalculable boon to many who have taken the first step of a downward career. Not in every instance is the influence of the institution sufficient to bring the inmates to a sense of their need of a Saviour, but many are the wanderers who have been led to return to the fold through the blessing of God upon the ministry of the Home.

Copies of the annual report may be obtained of the superintendent, Mrs. Coller, 80, Greenheys Lane, Manchester.

Justices and Temperance.—The justices of the borough of Newbury resolved at a recent special meeting that all licence holders should be again urgently requested to entirely discontinue the sale of intoxicating liquors to children apparently under the age of thirteen years.

About the Harvest.

We have been celebrating the harvest thanksgiving, and some words of our Lord Jesus Christ came to mind, and set me thinking. The words are these: "The Lord of the harvest."

The Lord of the harvest; then the harvest is the Lord's? Yes, very really so.

When you boys have been kite-making, you feel that the kite you have made yourself, and with great patience and glee have finished to the tassel at the end of the tail, is very really yours, your very own. "It is mine," you say; "mine, for I made it."

When you girls have dressed a doll, making its various garments yourself, and dressing it up to your heart's intense delight, you feel that the doll is very really yours. "It is my doll; I made all its clothes and dressed it." So you boys and girls feel that what you have yourself made is most truly yours.

Now turn to the first chapter of Genesis; the very first verse in the Bible reads thus: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth," that is, God made them; therefore, He is the Lord of the heavens and the earth, because He made them. Now look at the eleventh verse; there you read—"And God said, let the earth bring forth grass; the herb yielding seed; and the fruit tree yielding fruit, after his kind, whose seed is in itself; and it was so." God is therefore the Lord of all things that grow upon the earth, because He made them and caused them to grow.

Now turn to Psa. civ. verses 13 and 14; there you read—"He (that is God) watereth the hills from his chambers; He causeth the grass to grow for the cattle, and herb for the service of man; that he may bring forth food out of the earth."

Well might the writer of Psa. xxiv. say, "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof." God is therefore the Lord of the harvest, because He made the earth, and the grass, and the herbs, and the fruit, and not only made them, but waters them with his showers, and causes them to grow and

TO RIPEN FOR THE HARVEST.

In the spring-time the farmer goes forth with his horses and his plough, and ploughs the land, breaking it up into long furrows, so that the seed may fall therein: then he comes along with a basket full of wheat, or barley, or oats, which he scatters by handfuls into the ground. Then, harnessing his horse to an instrument called a harrow, he drags it over the furrows, to cover up the seeds sown, and then—well, what then? Why, he can do no more, but just leaves it in God's hands.

When the farmer has done his part, then God begins to work; He waters the earth, and causes the seed to sprout, and warms it with his sunshine, causing it to shoot forth and grow; first the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear. Day and night God works, never tiring, never wearying, that He may provide food for man and beast. Man can plough and sow, but God alone can make the seed spring forth, and grow, and ripen to make glad the heart of man with the harvest.

Each blade and stalk springs from one grain of wheat, or barley, or oats, as the case may be; but when God has finished his work, instead of one grain, you find at the top of the stalk thirty grains, or sixty, or 100; all grown from the one little grain cast in the ground by the farmer; God has blessed him with the "increase," and given him back his grain thirty fold, sixty fold, or 100 fold; so royally, so bountifully, does the Lord of the harvest give.

Now turn to verse 27 of that first chapter in the Bible, and there you read, "So God created man in his own image, male and female created He them." So man himself is the Lord's, because He made man also; and as the earth, and the things that grow thereon, honour the Lord of the harvest by their beauty and fruitfulness, so let us honour God who made us, and who gives us these beautiful and good things to enjoy. Let us honour Him by lives beautiful with goodness, and fruitful in kindliness and love, remembering always, with glad hearts and true, from whom all good things come; and let us joyfully praise "the Lord of the harvest," who made us and provides us our food year by year so plentifully. J. W.

Things to Forget.

If you would increase your happiness and prolong your life, forget your neighbour's faults. You should also forget the slander you have heard. Forget the temptations. Forget the fault-finding, and give a little thought to the cause which provoked it. Forget the peculiarities of your friends, and only remember the good points which make you fond of them. Forget all personal quarrels or histories you may have heard by accident, and which, if repeated, would seem a thousand times worse than they are.

Blot out as far as possible all the disagreeables of life; they will come, but they will grow larger when you remember them, and the constant thought of the acts of meanness, or, worse still, malice, will only tend to make you more familiar with them. Obliterate everything disagreeable from yesterday; start out with a clean sheet for to-day, and write upon it, for sweet memory's sake, only those things which are lovely and lovable. American Paper.

Personal.

I am glad to receive so many letters acknowledging prizes and certificates, and to know that these latter have been appreciated. It is impossible for me to answer all the letters personally.

Hilda Reid, Louie O'Brien, Lilian Kyne, Stanley Smith, Margaret Jones, Ernest and Robert King.—I am glad to welcome you as new "Searchers," and hope you will enjoy the study.

Gertrude Bristow.—Your name appeared in Division III. because you gave your age as fourteen.

Winnie Gartshore.—I am sorry you have not seen your name in the Foreign List so frequently as you wish, but there has always been some reason. Your friend Virgie has had her name in once or twice.

Betty Stocks.—Thank you very much for your interesting letter. I am always glad to hear of your work.

Keith Miller, Ethel Walls.—You may send your answer in a wrapper if you do not enclose a letter, but it is more likely to be delayed or lost in the post.

Hannah Chapman.—Thank you for your little note. I am glad you enjoy the "Searcher" so much.

Mabel Fletcher, Margaret Guillaume.—I am glad to hear that you are better again.

Nancie C.—The meaning is that the Apostle used a Greek word having the same significance as "torpedo."

Albert Gray.—Many thanks for your two nice photos.

Clarice Peach.—I am very sorry to hear that Percy is so ill, and hope soon to learn that he is better.

Poppie Stidolph.—You must not be discouraged; you are getting on very well with your questions. Always remember, "Try, try, try again!"

Kitty Fausset, Alec Miller.—I cannot find your clock. There were several clocks without any names, perhaps yours was one of them.

Isabel Inglis.—In 248, your answer to question ten was wrong, and in 249 you and your sister gave the wrong answer to question one.

Evelyn Tracey.—Your answer to question two of 249 was wrong.

Ethel Dancy.—If you looked in "Second List" 250, you would see your name.

Mansfield White.—Your clock, although neat, was altogether wrongly arranged. For twelve o'clock you gave one word, for eight o'clock you gave eleven words, for eleven o'clock you gave twenty words! This could not be passed.

Christian Endeavour Topic.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 11.

A Decision for Christ (Luke xiv. 25-30).

JOHN THE BAPTIST said that our Lord would bring his winnowing fan. Here we see Him using it. The great multitudes which followed Him were apparently attracted by some hope of material advantage, and He took the directest method of winnowing the chaff from the wheat, as He bade them sit down and count the cost. He was unwilling that any should come to Him under a false impression. The soul of honour and high-mindedness, He meets each disciple who comes to Him with ardent desire, with the searching test, "Have you counted the cost?" In this, how different our Master is from the world! Madame Bubble, as Bunyan calls her, approaches with fair promises which are destined to fade as the mirage on the desert sand, whilst our Lord paints in vivid colours the straits and privations to which his followers may be reduced. He leaves it for others to tell of the exceeding weight of glory which they win who do not shirk the test.

Notice here the threefold repetition of the solemn words: He cannot be my disciple (vv. 26, 27, 33). It would be well to underline them in your Bibles. There is a sense in which the way of salvation is extremely easy. One look of faith and we receive eternal life, and are assured that we can never perish; but that faith must carry in its heart the germ of discipleship—the tenacity, determination, indomitable resolve to learn everything that the Master has to teach. We are not only saved sinners, but are saved to learn, redeemed to be taught. The education is free, but there are certain things which we must be prepared to forego if we would be entered in that school. Let us not be content to be saved; let us be intent on discipleship. It is not for us to worry as to the grades of teaching through which the Master may pass us; that is his care. It is ours simply to be willing and obedient; not like the children who, whilst they sit on their form, are always looking through the open window upon the garden with its flowers and bees, or mingling with their lessons thoughts of their toys and play. The disciple must bring the unbiassed and disengaged mind to the grace of God, which comes disciplining us, and teaching us to deny ungodly lusts, and live rightcously and soberly and godly in this present world.

And what are those things which we must cultivate in order for discipleship? (1) A supreme love (v. 26). The Lord does not ask us really to hate those related to us by natural ties, but to give to Himself and his work so much love that, compared with all else, it should be as sunlight to starlight; and that for love of Him we should be willing to act as one who hates all other loves when they conflict with obedience. There is no call to hate natural ties until they oppose our entire obedience to the will of Christ. We are first converted from the natural to the spiritual, and then from the spiritual to the natural again. (2) The denial of self (v. 27). There is a great difference between self denial and the denial of self. We are not simply to cut off this and the other indulgence, but we are to put the cross of Christ between ourselves and the gratification of our own will, the following our own way. We must be willing to follow the Lamb, though the old Adam cries out in grievous pain. The way of Christ is always the way of the cross, out of which springs the Easter joy. (3) Renunciation (v. 33). We must be prepared to count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus our Lord, and to count our pride but dross. As a matter of fact, Jesus gives us back all that is right and beautiful to use for Him, but there must be a definite loosing hold on things, so far as a sense of our own proprietorship is concerned, and a placing of all in those pierced hands that He may have the ultimate disposal. Abjuring our ownership, we must be willing to act as his almoners and trustees. These are the qualities that give savour to life, making it sparkle and resist decay; but, remember, if we fail in these qualities, there is nothing which will make up for the loss. To lose these is to forfeit that for which we have been redeemed; and you cannot salt salt.

C.E. NOTES.

Rev. J. D. Lamont, president of the British Union, is amply fulfilling his presidential duties. In many cases he is addressing the aniversaries of societies, taking cheer and encouragement wherever he goes.

* * *

The members of the Peckham Rye Baptist Society pay for a pew in their church, and make it their business to see that it is filled at every service by people not in the habit of church-going. Moreover, they make special prayer that there may be conversions in the "Endeavour Pew."

* * *

In one of the neediest quarters of Leicester may be seen a cottage converted into a mission-room. A board outside announces it to be "Holy Trinity Endeavour Cottage," and the members of the Endeavour Society belonging to Holy Trinity Church carry on most of the meetings under the supervision of their vicar. Besides this they take it in turns to clean the mission-room and prepare it for the meetings.

* * *

The Church of England Union of Christian Endeavour is now an accomplished fact. Rev. F. J. Horsefield is the first president, Rev. T. Hindel, of Bethnal Green, vice-president. Mr. J. E. Messenger, of the Regent St. Polytechnic, is the secretary. Members of the Church of England who have already proved the value of C.E., are very sanguine that this Union will result in the formation of many hundreds of new societies in the Established Church during the ensuing year.

International S.S. Lesson.

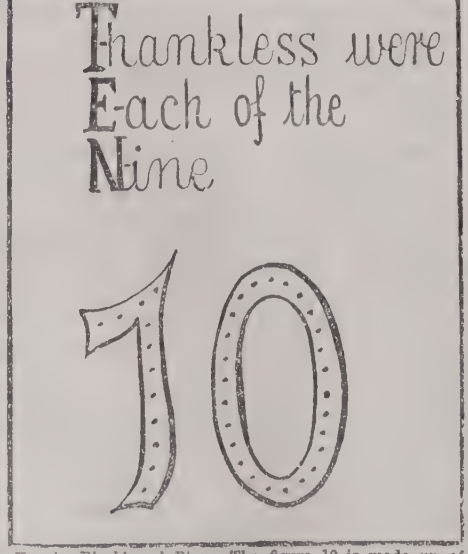
The Ten Lepers Cleansed (Luke xvii. 11-19).
Golden Text—"Be ye thankful" (Col. iii. 15).

Introduction.

THERE is a great deal about leprosy in the Bible, both in the Old and in the New Testament. It is taken often as a type of sin; the two are much alike in that both are—

1. Inherited (Rom. v. 19).
2. Contagious (Gen. vi. 12).
3. Loathsome (Isa. i. 6).
4. Fatal (James i. 15).

In Christ's time many were healed through faith, both from sin and from leprosy (Eph. ii. 8).



Key to Blackboard Plan.—The figure 10 is made up of 1 and 0. So with regard to these ten leprous men, one was registered in heaven for his thanksgiving, the others all counted for naught; nine were thankless.

The Disease.

Leprosy was a loathsome disease; read Lev. xiii., and see how the word "unclean" always goes with it. It was the leper's cry (Lev. xiii. 45). This is indeed a true type of sin, though we may shrink from thinking so; sin is a horrible disease, which affects the whole soul, and in God's holy sight the word "unclean" must be applied (Isa. vi. 5: xxxv. 8; 2 Cor. vi. 17).

(12). The men stood "afar off," it was the rule for the leper; it is so with sin. The prodigal went "afar off" (Luke xv. 13). Peter followed "afar off," and he fell (Mark xiv. 54; Eph. ii. 17). Sin always keeps a long distance between God and a soul. Look at the story of Naaman (2 Kings v. i). So if sin is the reality of which leprosy is the type, then we are all lepers; but, thank God, we can all be healed and cleansed. (See Jer. xvii. 9; Rom. iii. 10-12; Rom. iii. 23.)

The Cure.

(12) Came to Jesus, met Him. (13) Spoke to Him, made a request; He listened, He answered, He healed, (14) and they were all cleansed. Taking leprosy as sin again, we ask, "How can we be cured?" Come to Jesus (John vi. 37). Remember what the name of "Jesus" means. "He shall save from sin" (Matt. i. 21), and the other name, (13) "Master," means our willingness to serve and obey. The lepers made a request, it was granted; they were cleansed (14) and healed (15) (Ps. li. 2, 7, 10; Ps. xli. 4).

Thankfulness and Thanklessness.

(15) One returned to Jesus,
One gave thanks,
One glorified God,
One worshipped,

only one out of ten, and he, a despised down-trodden Samaritan; not despised by Jesus, for Jesus saw his heart, and this man's heart was right. How sad is ingratitude; we forget God notices. Have we ever thanked Him for his unspeakable gift? (2 Cor. ix. 15.)

God loves to be thanked (Psa. cxlvii. 7; ciii. 1, 2; Eph. v. 20; 1 Thess. v. 18; 1 Cor. xv. 57).

Jesus set us the example of thankfulness (Mark viii. 6; Matt. xxvi. 27, &c.).

Mr. Sankey's Movements.

THE Scottish tour of Mr. Ira D. Sankey continues to arouse deep interest. Describing Mr. Sankey's recent visit to Stirling, a correspondent writes: "An afternoon meeting was held in the Albert Hall, which was filled in every part. Mr. Sankey gave an address on 'Singing through Egypt and Palestine,' and sang several solos. At the evening meeting the same hall was crowded with a deeply-interested audience. Many were unable to find admittance. At this meeting Mr. Sankey spoke on 'Sacred Song and Story,' illustrated by incidents from past associations with the late Mr. Moody, and by solos of old hymns and new. At the afternoon meeting about 1,500 or 1,600 were present; at the evening meeting fully 1,800. Mr. Sankey's presence and voice recalled tender and precious memories of spiritual blessing."

Subsequent to the meetings at Glasgow, to which reference was made in our last issue, Mr. Sankey proceeded to Doune, Perthshire. The great cotton mills of Sir John Muir at Deanston were closed for half an hour during the afternoon to give the 400 or 500 operatives an opportunity of hearing Mr. Sankey sing some well-known sacred solos. Sir John Muir introduced Mr. Sankey to his working people in a few kindly words. In the evening Mr. Sankey gave his service of Sacred Song and Story to a crowded congregation in the Free Church at Doune.

Much interest is being taken by Mr. Sankey's friends in Scotland in his proposed training school for Gospel singers. After visiting Belfast, Mr. Sankey will return to London for the Bible Society's meeting at St. James' Hall, on November 15.

The Kensit Crusade.

A PROTESTANT DEMONSTRATION was recently held at Exeter Hall, to celebrate the success which has attended the efforts of the Wickliffe Preachers during the year. There was a fair attendance, and Mr. Kensit was received with enthusiasm. He described the past year as an eventful one. It had seen the revival of Protestant feeling all over the country—a shaking among the dry bones. 300 members of the new Parliament intended to support the Church Discipline Bill, in order to put a stop to Popish practices.

With reference to the protests which he had made, Mr. Kensit claimed that his action should not have been necessary; it was scandalous that a layman should have to do what the Bishops ought to do.

It is proposed to present Mr. Kensit with a testimonial, to take the form of a contribution to the Wickliffe Preachers' Fund. Miss Gertrude Mansbridge, 32, Birchington Road, West Hampstead, N.W., will be glad to hear of friends interested in the movement.

The Churches.

 The Editor will be glad to receive "post-card" notes for this page, of* SPIRITUAL PROGRESS AND EFFORT in the Churches. They must be prompt, reliable, and NOT TRIVIALITIES; and be accompanied by sender's name and address.

Church of England.

Rev. W. Millington, vicar of St. Paul's, Southport, has been appointed rector of Cottingham, near Leicester, in succession to the late Canon Yates. Mr. Millington has been vicar of St. Paul's for twenty-seven years, and has done a good work on sound Evangelical lines.

It is understood that the vacancy on the Simeon Trust—the largest Evangelical Church patronage body—has been filled up by the appointment thereto of Rev. John Barton, formerly vicar of Charles Simeon's Church at Cambridge. The other trustees are Archdeacon Richardson, Professor Moule, Canon Girdlestone, and Prebendary Eardley-Wilmot.

Satisfaction will be felt at the appointment of Rev. W. Hay M. H. Aitken to the vacant Canonry of Norwich Cathedral. Mr. Aitken's services to the Church in connection with the work of parochial missions have been unique. His preferment comes from the Lord Chancellor, who a few years ago offered Mr. Aitken a Canonry at Gloucester, but one which was to him financially impossible. Canon Aitken is now conducting a mission at St. John's, Hoxton, concluding November 20.

Congregational.

Dr. Mackennal, speaking on the work of the Manchester and Salford Congregational Mission Board, said that but for the work taken over by the Board the mission churches of to-day would have sunk. As it is there is a splendid and growing work done by them.

Rev. Dr. Barrett has appealed to Princes Street Church, Norwich, on behalf of the Norfolk Union and the country Churches. The income of the Norfolk Union has steadily diminished, but Dr. Barrett feels assured that Congregationalists will not see the scanty stipends of the village pastors reduced.

The new church at Long Lane, Blackheath, Birmingham, has been opened. Rev. T. G. Vinson, Chairman of the Worcestershire Congregational Union, presided over a public meeting, at which addresses were delivered by Revs. D. Macfadyen and E. D. Bainbridge. The new building accommodates 250 people, and will cost over £400.

Congregationalists celebrated on Sunday last the completion of the first year of their Twentieth Century Thanksgiving Fund. The report read in the churches was of the most encouraging character, showing that the promises within the last five months have increased by £64,000, and that the total now realizes £518,648. In the young people's department the plans adopted for the instruction of youth in Congregational Church History and Principles have been so helpful that an even more extensive programme is in preparation for the coming year, and arrangements have been made to celebrate the first year of the new century by demonstrations at all places of historic interest to Congregationalists.

Baptist.

Anniversary meetings were recently held at Clarendon Chapel, Camberwell New Road (Pastor Tait). Sergeant-Major Grey preached, and at a public meeting a number of local ministers and friends spoke words of hearty encouragement. The reports which were given told of marked progress.

A Century Fund meeting has been held at Ebenezer Church, Ripley Street, Bradford. Rev. J. W. Ewing set forth the claims of the Fund. A deacon, a working man, told how, before six o'clock each morning, he walked miles to work and saved the tram fares for the Fund. £56 12s. is the total amount promised by this church up to date, and there is more to follow.

Speaking last week at a Baptist Missionary Society Auxiliary meeting at Manchester, Mr. Samuel Smith said it is no sign of failure that we see such things as are happening in China. Both missionaries and converts there have shown a victorious faith, and have given to the world a great exhibition of its reality. Rev. Dr. Maclaren, who also spoke, said that England has been placed where England stands, that English people may carry the message of the Master to the ends of the earth. We are, however, told that "one religion is as good as another." But it is not a question between two men's opinions; it is a question between men's opinion and God's revelation.

The Village Pastors' Conference, which has come to be an annual function at Abbey Road Church, St. John's Wood (Rev. H. E. Stone), was held recently. Among the subjects dealt with were, "Mission work, with special reference to Simultaneous Missions," "Modern Literature and its Effect from a Village Standpoint," and "Can our Churches be guided as to the Choice of Pastors?" The Pastors were the guests of the Church. At the tea table a brief address was given by Rev. John Thomas, of Liverpool, who said he thought the town churches might set their ministers free to go on apostolic tours to the villages, and spend a little of their time encouraging the small churches.

Methodist.

The Committee of the Liverpool Mission have, at considerable cost, taken Hengler's Circus for Sunday services during the six winter months.

Last week the cash receipts for the Twentieth Century Fund of the Wesleyan Connexion averaged more than 1,000 guineas per day. Over £370,000 has actually been paid over to the treasurer.

A "Dairyman's Daughter Memorial Chapel" has been erected at Hale Common, Ventnor Circuit (Rev. John Dymond). Thirty pounds is still needed in order to obtain the Connexional grant. The building adjoins the cottage in which the woman made famous by Legh Richmond lived and died.

The mid-week services for business men, which have been so successfully carried on in Manchester and Bradford, under the direction of the Wesleyan Methodist Church, are now to form a feature of Liverpool city life. The Liverpool Council of Evangelical Free Churches has arranged for a series of services on Thursdays, at noon, in the Welsh Church, Crossball Street. These are preparatory to the simultaneous mission.

Plans have been accepted for the rebuilding of the Wesleyan Centenary Hall in Bishopsgate Street, E.C. The work of reconstruction will be proceeded with as soon as suitable arrangements can be made for the various departments now housed in the building. Provision has already been made for the Wesleyan Missionary Society in Coleman Street. The cost of rebuilding will be about £70,000.

Under the presidency of Mr. Stephen Gee, a representative gathering of the United Methodist Free Churches was held last week in the Memorial Hall, to consider church extension in London. A report submitted by Rev. Henry Mann showed that in connection with the Twentieth Century movement of the denomination, which had been supported with unparalleled generosity, new work has been commenced in ten cases, and that the following amounts have been promised conditionally: Willesden, £1,500; Shernhall Street, £1,000; Streatham, £1,000; East Ham, £1,000; Ilford, £1,000; Clapham, £500; Plaistow, £500; Southend-on-Sea, £500.

Presbyterian.

A site for a permanent church in connection with Caversham Road Church, Reading (Rev. David Annal), together with a donation of £1,000 to the building fund, has been given by Mr. McIlroy, a local elder.

As a preparation for the simultaneous mission, Yorkshire Presbytery has recommended a time to be set apart in each church for a deepening of the spiritual life of its members. Meetings have been held at Ellesmere Road, Sheffield (Rev. A. Aldridge), conducted by Dr. Hibberd, of London. Bible readings were given in the afternoons at 3 o'clock, and services were given in the evenings at 8 p.m. Only small numbers were the rule of the afternoon, but the evening meetings were well attended, and at all there was a conspicuous feeling of the presence of the Holy Spirit. The services closed with many waiting upon God.

Society of Friends.

Charles D. Terrell writes of his work in France:—"The reading room at La Pallice has been constantly used during the summer by English sailors, some of whom have expressed their appreciation of it. Our greatest need at present is a similar room at La Rochelle, which I could also use as a centre for work, temperance as well as Gospel, amongst the French sailors and fishermen."

Gospel meetings have been held in the meeting house at Deptford by John Reeves and Ernest C. Fry, with the co-operation and assistance of local friends. The building is admirably situated for Christian work, being in the busy High Street itself, in the heart of a crowded and needy district; but the poverty of the people around appears to have made them callous to religious influences. The attendances at the meetings, compared with the numbers that usually come together, have been good, while there has been manifest power and blessing.

Fallen Asleep.

Rev. JOHN BRAND, minister of Downfield U.P. Church, Dundee.—SIR JOHN COWAN, of Beeslack, Midlothian, a prominent public man, and an elder of the Free Church.—Rev. J. A. CARR, LL.D., vicar of Whitechurch, County Dublin, and Canon of Christ Church Cathedral, aged sixty-five. Canon Carr enjoyed a considerable reputation as a writer on theological and historical subjects.—Rev. W. PONSFORD, late rector of Stanford, Hythe, Kent, age sixty-seven.—On November 4, Mrs. CHISHOLM, wife of the Lord Provost of Glasgow. Mrs. Chisholm's illness was short, and her decease unlooked for. She caught cold when attending one of the gatherings in connection with the recent Church Union.

About Books.

All Nations is the title of an illustrated monthly magazine, designed to assist missionary life and work in all the Churches. (1d. Marshall Brothers.)

Messrs. Partridge & Co. have issued a readable little biography, Remarkable Incidents in the Life of John Maynard. (1s.) The subject of the book has for some years been known as a writer on Scripture doctrine and Christian experience.

Bagster's Gem Edition of Mendelssohn's St. Paul (paper 6d., cloth 1s.) is a neat little book. As with other oratorios in the same series, we have here the words and music, vocal score with piano accompaniment. The printing is remarkably distinct.

Mr. Joseph S. Davidson, Jewish missionary, has issued in booklet form a revised translation of the Aramaic sections of Daniel and Ezra. In parallel columns he gives an English version and a rendering into Biblical Hebrew. The work is based on that of John Leusden, as issued in 1685. (3d. J. S. Davidson, 5, Aden Terrace, Green Lanes, N.)

The Trials of Thomas Doubting, by Mr. Samuel Levermore, the well-known evangelist, is now issued in book form, after appearing as a serial in Gospel News. The work is not helped by some denominational comparisons; but the experiences of a timid seeker after truth are graphically portrayed, and the directness and earnestness of the writer will win sympathy. (6d. Bateman, 27, Paternoster Square.)

In a lengthy poem, entitled The Twentieth Century, J. Rutter makes a general survey of modern thought and ideas, and gives some critical comments in caustic style. Many will occasionally disagree with the opinions that are set forth, and deprecate the form of expression, but respect will be accorded to the writer's obvious earnestness in the advocacy of Evangelicalism. (3s. 6d. T. Burleigh.)

The Chorus of Creation: or Varied Chants of the Great Hymn of Nature, is a choice booklet in which the praise of God is sung by many poets. The selections were made by the late Dr. J. R. Macduff, who tells us in a beautiful introduction that Psa. xix. suggested the compilation. Every other page is devoted to an engraving, the work of G. H. Edwards. The booklet will make a welcome Christmas "card." (2s. 6d. Hodder & Stoughton).

A choice little work by the late Bishop Ryle has been issued from Drummond's Tract Depôt, Stirling, with the title Assurance: Being thoughts on 2 Tim. iv. 6-8. There is much precious teaching in these pages, not only from the pen of the author himself, but gathered by him, and presented in copious notes, from the writings of English Divines of the seventeenth century and since. (1s. and 1s. 6d., according to binding.)

Pulpit Talks to Young People, by Rev. H. Elwyn Thomas, of Newport, Mon. (1s. 6d. net. H. R. Allenson), is a volume of plain words. Having attributed to Mr. Archibald Brown the statement that "amusements are of the devil," without giving chapter and verse, he takes up a very impracticable position on the subject; and in one of his talks holds that it is the duty of the church to reform the stage! Several of the addresses exhibit a tendency to exaggeration.

The November issue of China's Millions (1d. Morgan & Scott) contains numerous items relating to the painful experiences of missionaries during the deplorable revolt of the Boxers. Much light is thrown on the real cause of the rising, and its effect upon missionary life and service. Particulars are given of Rev. A. R. Saunder's flight from P'ing-yao to Han-kow, and Mr. C. Howard Bird's escape from Siang-ch'eng to Tai-ho. Mr. A. Argento tells a heartrending story, under the title, "In Perils by the Heathen."

Dr. Joseph Parker's Studies in Texts: for Family, Church, and School, is a series of volumes which includes some of the best expository work of the renowned London preacher. Six in number, these handy little books are a mine of suggestion to ministers, and a rich repository of stimulus and help for thoughtful Christian people. The concluding volume of the series, just issued, contains an index of texts treated in the six volumes, from which it would appear that, in all, some three hundred passages of Holy Scripture have been dealt with. The brief "Phases of Texts" are as useful as the more substantial expositions, while the "Illustrative Addresses" are a feature of great worth. In the latest volume we welcome Dr. Parker's striking address on "Gambling." A present of this series would afford many hard worked preachers material for a fresh start in their labours. (3s. 6d. each volume. Horace Marshall & Son.)

Ealing Convention.

THIS annual assembly of believers, held from October 8 to 12,* was marked by much solemnity and power. At the opening service in St. John's Church, a large number partook of the Lord's Supper. The sermon was preached by Rev. H. G. Thwaites, from Phil. iii. 8. The apostle gives his personal experience, weighing his losses and gains in giving up Judaism and taking Christ. Gain is the keynote of the epistle. Some would say that he, or Martyn, or Keith-Falconer gave up too much, but he argues that in this world the gain far outweighs the losses, and in the next it is supreme.

The following day Rev. J. Summerhayes spoke of the necessity for Christians opening their hearts more fully to the influence of the Holy Spirit, that they may be prompted to use with devotion and earnestness the grace they have received. Rev. J. G. Train referred to two calls to service. In Ex. iii. 11 is recorded the objection raised by Moses; and in Judges vi., Gideon, a man of faith, is characterized by diffidence. Rev. C. G. Moore spoke, from Heb. x. 19, of the privilege of continual access to God through the priesthood of Jesus. In the evening, the same speaker showed, from Phil. ii. 13, how God is willing to come into our hearts and bodies, working in us, not as tools and passive, but things that we may choose to his glory.

On Wednesday Mr. Summerhayes took as his subject God's inestimable gift of Christ to us as our redemption from sin and death. Mr. Thwaites asked why we lived so much below the gloriously high standard before us; and Dr. Monro Gibson enlarged upon the secret of power for the Christian.

Mr. Summerhayes spoke, on Thursday, of Christ as the gift of God, our never-failing Shepherd, and the Captain of our salvation. Dr. Barnes dwelt upon the deep mysteries of the indwelling Christ. As the Father sent Him, so He sends us. Christ lives in us to reveal Himself to the world. Rev. H. B. Macartney based some thoughtful and practical remarks on John xvii., the Gospel of Friendship and Sonship.

On the closing day (Friday) Rev. A. C. Rogers gave an account of work among Romanists in Galway, and Rev. J. Wilkinson spoke of efforts among the Jews. Rev. W. C. Taylor followed with an interesting sketch of missionary efforts in China, and related pathetic instances of the intense longing of the people for light and teaching.

Evangelization.—A farewell meeting for Rev. Patrick R. Mackay, secretary of the Anglo-Indian Evangelization Society, and Mr. Reginald Studd, who are sailing for India next week, will be held in Exeter (lower) Hall, on Thursday, 15th inst., at 3.30 p.m. Mr. Mackay has been doing deputation work with much success during the past six months, awakening fresh interest in the work of the Society. Mr. R. Studd accompanies Mr. Mackay as an hon. worker of the Society, and will conduct evangelistic work in Ceylon and India, and intends joining his brother, Mr. C. T. Studd, who has been doing excellent work for the Society in several places in India, and at present has charge of the Union Church at Ootacamund.

Portsmouth.—A visit to this town on a recent Lord's Day enables us to say that some of God's people there are drawing very near to Him and receiving blessing. Quite a spirit of revival is manifested at the Soldiers' Institute. Mr. Hogben, of the Welcome Mission, and Rev. Watkin Davies, of the Congregational Church opposite, arranged united prayer meetings all last week in preparation for a coming mission. Mr. Hogben is the founder of the One-by-One Working Band, a very valuable institution. In all the above places that Gospel is preached which is the power of God unto salvation. On Monday night a praise meeting in connection with the Band was held at the Welcome, when letters telling of ninety conversions in answer to prayer were read. Mr. Hogben has addressed a timely "Greeting and Warning" to the troops returning home, and desires the fellowship of God's people in sending out 100,000 to be distributed through the agency of the South African General Mission.

FOUR LETTERS

The Deimel Fabric Company,
London, E.C.

Please publish the enclosed three letters in the advertising columns of The Christian. Of the many words of approval which have come to me in my endeavours to free mankind from the pernicious habit of wearing enfeebling flannels, I value none higher than these. Although I have no special permission from the writers to publish their letters, yet I feel that a good word from good men in behalf of a good cause will not be out of place in the columns of The Christian.

Sincerely yours,
HENRY L. DEIMEL, M.D.

Mr. IRA D. SANKEY writes:

I wish to say to any of my friends in Great Britain that I have been wearing the Dr. Deimel Underwear for the last three years constantly, and it has been not only a comfort every day since I bought it, but it has been the means of preventing me from taking cold, as I was constantly doing when I wore flannel or woollen underwear.

I wish to recommend the Dr. Deimel Linen-Mesh as the coming underwear of the world.

IRA D. SANKEY.

Rev. F. B. MEYER, B.A., writes:

Ever since my attention was called to the Linen-Mesh Garments, as manufactured by the Deimel Fabric Company, I have looked on them as the purest, cleanliest, healthiest, and most comfortable kind of underclothing.

F. B. MEYER.

Rev. G. CAMPBELL MORGAN writes:

I have now been wearing your Deimel Linen-Mesh for the past eighteen months, with conspicuous success as to comfort and health. I look upon it as being the finest underwear I have ever discovered for everyone.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN.

A Booklet, with Sample Pieces of the Fabric, will be mailed free to anybody addressing

A Week's Sacrifice for the Sake of Others.

FOLLOWING the course adopted at this time of the year, during the past six years, I am inviting friends and lovers of little children all over the world to join in one week of self-sacrifice and generous devotion to the cause of Waif and Stray Children. The week selected is that beginning Monday, November 12, and ending Monday, November 19. I am naturally very anxious that all the readers of The Christian should know of our work, and have the subject brought prominently before them, in order that if they are so disposed they may be able to arrange plans and preparations, with a view to participate in this effort, which will unite Christian people in all the Churches far and wide in one purpose of loving, Christ-like charity.

It may, however, be asked, What is really meant by a SELF-DENIAL WEEK? How is its object to be attained? And how is the Self-Denial carried out?

With a view to answer these questions, I may perhaps be pardoned for venturing upon an explanation of this system, which is now becoming generally familiar and is being widely adopted. Let me then briefly say, that this sustained effort of Self-Denial continued over one week represents an endeavour to assist still further the work of Christ among the Destitute Childhood of our Nation, beyond the measure of our ordinary gifts, to an extent, and in ways, which would be impossible without the exercise of some personal self-sacrifice, whatever form that self-sacrifice may take.

I am gratefully conscious that the majority of my friends are assisting me with their means up to the limit of their ability and, in some cases, even "beyond their power." I make no further apology, however, for asking Christian people generally to prayerfully consider, with a view to its adoption, the suggestion of setting apart this one week for special self-denying effort to assist the work of Christ in my hands. For no cause like the cause of the destitute is self-denial more appropriate! For to the self-denial of to-day, as to the fast of old, the Lord's words by the mouth of His prophet still apply: "Is not this the fast that I have chosen? Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry, and that thou bring the poor that are cast out to thy house? when thou seest the naked that thou cover him?"

Every one can help in this special effort! It only needs a conviction that this is Christ's way, and all Christians can walk in it. Very wonderful and loving and ingenious are many of the deeds of self-abnegation which are recorded in my chronicles. It is as surprising as it is beautiful to discover how varied are the means and the methods of help. Such items as the following recur again and again with delightful frequency: "My week's pocket money." "Result of one hour's work a day for the Waifs." "Travelling third class instead of first." "A gold ring given up for the children." "No sugar." "Price of an overcoat saved by making the old one last a little longer." "Instead of a pleasure trip." "Giving up our holiday." "The children's sweets for a week." "A shilling in the pound on five days' takings over the counter." "An invalid's thank-offering for a week without pain." "Collected from friends and visitors." "A day's wages: all I can afford." "Three dolls dressed in the early mornings." "Earned by carrying water." "A cook's perquisites." "Twenty pairs of stockings from a Self-Denial Working Party." "Half-a-crown for digging the garden." "Six books from a little girl's library." "£50 saved from luxuries." "Result of a drawing-room meeting." And so on. Everybody has his or her opportunity! You too, my friend, may find your opportunity in one of the following ways:—

Can you collect money in Self-Denial Week? I will gladly send you a Collecting Box or a Collecting Card. Please write for one of these, saying which you prefer.

Can you give me a Drawing-Room Meeting during the week? It is not so difficult as it may sound to arrange such a meeting, then to invite all your friends to hear a little informal talk or address about the work of the Homes, to read perhaps a few particulars that would interest the audience, and to take a collection. If asked beforehand, I would try to provide a Deputation Secretary, who would tell your friends something about our operations, although I could not promise this in every instance.

Can you promote a Sale of Work for the children? A few friends with a little careful pre-arrangement can do wonders by a sale. £50 has come to the Homes from such a source before now, to the downright astonishment of the promoters.

Can (or rather will) you give up a portion of your time in Self-Denial Week to the cause of the Waifs? You might go round with a Collecting Card; you might distribute some of our literature; you might do some definitely profitable work (such as knitting stockings, making garments, &c., &c.); you might organise a meeting for one of our Deputation Secretaries; you might establish a working party or an "Apron Guild," or found a branch of the "Young Helpers' League"; you might write a letter in favour of the Homes to your local newspaper and so help to leaven public feeling in their favour. Indeed, opportunities for personal service are limitless.

Will you abstain from some luxury or pleasure for the week and give the result to the children? Plainer fare, fewer "extras" in the way of expenditure, reduced railway or tram or cab travelling, a few cigars the less: such things as these may suggest many more.

Will you reduce expenditure on necessaries for the week? Food and clothing are items which probably all could diminish without hurting themselves, and there are numerous articles on the border line between necessities and luxuries which could be rigorously abstained from for one week without anyone being thereby a penny the worse, while the children would be a great many pennies the better.

Yes, but "is it worth while?" Well, figures here will come to our assistance.

Last year, that is in 1899, Self-Denial Week realised for the children in the Homes no less a sum than £3,271 2s. 3d.—surely a result of Christian sacrifice as splendid as it is encouraging! This amount is very nearly sufficient to feed all my rescued flock for a whole month, or to defray the cost of 204 Boys and Girls for a whole year, and to outfit and to send out to Canada no fewer than 327 emigrants! Is it nothing to have made this possible?

Now, will not the readers of The Christian, one and all, old and young, prayerfully consider this matter, and when resolved upon, religiously set apart this week for the assistance of the great family which has been entrusted by our common Father to me on behalf of the whole Christian Church?

But, perhaps, a perusal of some of the letters which are now in my hand as I write would be a most powerful incentive to emulation in the direction indicated by them. The various plans adopted by my friends display an ingenuity which commands my admiration, while the spirit which characterised most of their efforts is a subject for which I devoutly thank God, and which fills me with a fresh encouragement. I quote from the mass of correspondence a few letters which I trust may prove an effectual stimulus to my readers, and withal not unwelcome reading.

Here is one which gave me great pleasure as I read it. It runs: "I am delighted to tell you we had a very happy and blessed time in the presence of the Lord, and it was, when we pleaded the cause of the little ones, after much prayer and expectation, the most memorable time we have ever spent together as teachers and scholars." My friend here refers to a Sunday-school effort made in a very poor parish in Norwich. "We had," he continues, "some heart-touching cases of real self-denial amongst our dear boys and girls. One lad gave up all his earnings by errands, amounting to one shilling in penny-pieces. And another, a dear girl, not at all well-to-do, put in my hand half-a-crown." With this was enclosed another letter containing £1, as a thank-offering for answered prayer, expressing the conviction that the thank-offering could be devoted to no better cause. What a scope for giving would "answered prayer" afford every child of God who knows the use and value of prayer!

Another dear friend, whose ménage is reduced to the lowest possible limits, yet spares £1 as an expression of gratitude for a thousand mercies which demand irresistibly a grateful recognition. "All I am, and all I have, would not be sufficient for a thank-offering," is the comment of this soul in contemplation of these God-given mercies.

Four shillings came to me with another collector's card as the result of an effort by "a bedridden cripple and little girl partly blind"—God bless all such for their unselfish devotion to the cause of outcast childhood.

One more letter I will quote, because it contains a good suggestion as to a method of raising money and also provides us a searchlight by which we may look into our hearts. "We placed 1s.," says this friend, "to your cause whenever we spoke unkindly or unjustly; 5s. from my daughter and £1 15s. from myself." Alas! few are so honest in their judgment of themselves as these two. I would like the revenue for one year that would accrue from penny fines for such misdemeanours at the tea-tables of the British Isles, though, alas, that such a plan could give promise of so great a harvest! Let such a plan, however, be adopted for next Self-Denial Week, and I am assured the salutary restraint practised for one week would have a telling effect upon the character for the whole year following.

If from any reason it appears that you can do none of the things indicated above, will you not give an extra or special donation from your own purse, which but for the Self-Denial Week you would not think of sending to the treasury of my Orphan and Waif Children?

Above all, will you pray for the Homes and the children, especially during Self-Denial Week? That is the best gift, which I earnestly covet, for all other gifts will assuredly follow in its train!

I earnestly commend this effort to the prayerful attention of Christian friends everywhere.

Thos. J. Barnardo.

An Invitation to City Folk.

Have you yet visited the new City Branch of Dr. Barnardo's Homes? It is situated at 158, Aldersgate Street, E.C., within three minutes' walk of Aldersgate Street Station on the Underground Railway, on the same side of the way, but nearer to the City. Two trades, tin-smithing and brush-making, are being carried on daily in the windows by a number of boys from the Stepney Home. A stock of articles of the boys' manufacture, and also of all the Publications of the Homes, is also kept for inspection and purchase. Donations for the Homes, and subscriptions for the National Waifs' Magazine, Young Helpers' League Magazine, and Bubbles, will be received and acknowledged, and full information about the Institutions will be supplied by the Manager.

18 to 26, Stepney Causeway, London, E.

Personalia.

The address of Mr. John Lampard, of the Balaghat Mission, who is in England for a few weeks before resuming his work among the Gonds, is 114, Clapton Common, London, N.E.

Rev. Dr. A. T. Pierson expects to sail for America on December 1, and is, therefore, unable to accept any of the invitations which he has received asking him to take services in connection with the forthcoming simultaneous mission.

Dr. F. W. Baedeker writes to us:—"I am once more on my way to the Continent of Europe, first attending the annual conference in connection with the colportage at Lichtenthal, Baden-Baden; thence I have the promise of open prisons in and near Wiesbaden and Frankfurt. My intention is to visit once more Russia, north and south, and I shall value the prayers of God's children for this, as my days are passing, that strength may be given, and that I may have singleness of purpose in my journeyings. I hope yet to have the entrance into prisons in Russia, as hitherto."

Requests for Prayer.

For blessing on the preaching of the Gospel, at Ealing, by Mr. Galletly (Evangelization Society), Nov. 16 to Dec. 2, that many may hear the Word and be converted.

For the monthly meetings at Ipswich for the deepening of spiritual life, Nov. 15. Speaker, Rev. H. B. Macartney, M.A.

For blessing on a mission being conducted at Winchester by Mr. William Day, also on services to be conducted by the same evangelist at Bermondsey, Nov. 18-30.

Sopley, Winkton.—In order to meet the needs of this village in Hants, a dilapidated school has been acquired by Mr. Charles Button, renovated and furnished for use as a mission hall. The opening service was held on Wednesday of last week. The assembly was drawn from several villages in the locality, and was addressed by Mr. Ransome Wallis, of Epsom.

The Bible in Victoria.—We are glad to learn the leaders of the various Churches have been authorized by a Royal Commission to prepare Bible Lessons for use in schools, a strong feeling having set in against the secularization of the educational system. It illustrates the attitude of Rome towards the Word of God, despite the frequent assertions the authorities wish to favour Bible study, that the Romanists refused to take any part in the movement.

Rosslyn Rest, Brentwood, Essex.—The above home was opened in 1892 by Blanche, Countess of Rosslyn, and is intended for London working girls needing rest and change of air. It is chiefly supported by Lady Rosslyn and other subscribers; the girls, when able, pay a small sum weekly. The summer holidays being over, Lady Rosslyn is willing to open the house for Christian workers needing rest, during the winter months, 10s. per week, or £1, including a private sitting-room. It is hoped that many will take advantage of this kind proposal. Full particulars on application to the matron.

Temperance in Birmingham.—The seventeenth annual gathering of the Gospel Temperance Mission was recently held in the Temperance Institute, Corporation Street, Birmingham. Mr. Barrow Cadbury presided, and among those supporting him were Mrs. Richard Cadbury, Mr. William A. Cadbury, Revs. J. Odell, J. J. Ellis, and J. C. Whitaker. Reports upon the work of the Mission were read by Mr. F. H. Butcher (general secretary). The pledges taken during the past year totalled 2,062. The lady members of the staff made 21,609 visits, and Mr. Gaule, the police-court missionary, dealt with 2,297 cases in the lock-up. Over £1,300 was deposited in the savings fund. An address was given by Alderman Hart, who expressed his belief that the temperance movement had been the great handmaid of Christian work, for the chief hindrance to the reception of the Gospel was the terrible and destroying influence of strong drink. Constant indulgence—he would not use the word "use" or "abuse"—in strong drink was the greatest enemy to the prosperity of our people.

Notes & Comments

IN regard to the Special Offer made to our readers on page 6, we have been asked if any time limit is in force. No. Any reader who fulfils the conditions will receive the splendid Two-Version Bible there described, and subscriptions may date from any week. We hope a large number will take advantage of this opportunity.

"Sceptics and the Bible," the lecture which Dr. Munhall delivered with such effect at Exeter Hall, and Aldersgate Y.M.C.A., is now ready, in pamphlet form. It is specially suited for distribution, not only among those who are questioning the truth and authority of the Inspired Word, but also for the instruction of young Christians, and, indeed, for all. (One penny. Morgan & Scott.)

May we request our kind American readers to exercise care in stamping their communications to us? The postage to England is five cents per half ounce, but we frequently have to pay from 5d. to as much as 1s. 3d. excess on delivery of understamped letters.

The American Presidential election has come and gone, and Mr. McKinley has been re-elected to office by an overwhelming majority. With insignificant exceptions, the contest was carried on without serious disturbances of any kind, and Mr. Bryan sent a message of magnanimous congratulation on Mr. McKinley's success. One of the incidental aspects of the campaign of great encouragement was the entire defeat of the Tammany interest in New York, where the lobbyists threatened a serious riot; and it is thought that at the next municipal contest this party will be defeated, and the power of that unholy confederation of vested interests and political chicanery will be broken. If so, it would be a happy augury for the future, not only of New York, but of America as a whole.

A very interesting and important movement is taking place in America which might with advantage be followed in this country. We refer to the establishment of Bible schools and Bible colleges in the great centres of learning in the different States. Some of these have already been founded, with ample endowments for carrying on the work, and excellent teaching is being given in them. The interest evoked by Professor White's Biblical Lectures in London a little while ago showed that such teaching was thoroughly appreciated. There is unquestionably a great opportunity here for those of our rich men who are interested in the extension of Bible knowledge among the educated classes to confer a lasting boon on the country. We cannot know too much about the Book which is at the foundation of all our greatness as a nation, and of our salvation as individuals. Yet, as a matter of fact, the Bible is too often crowded out of all notice by the pressure of secular studies.

The meeting of the French Assembly will doubtless be productive of very grave results, for it cannot be anticipated that the action threatened by the President of the Republic in his famous Toulouse address can be taken without very fierce and unscrupulous opposition on the part of the Jesuits and their friends and allies. The President asserted that the religious orders in France had replaced the monasteries in a wider area, that they possessed £40,000,000 worth of landed property in the country, with a larger amount in personalty, and that they had exercised a baneful influence upon education. As therefore "the Church" had become an inimical rival to the State, training in State schools would in future be considered "a proof of elementary loyalty," and would be made an essential qualification for official employment; and the Government would limit the acquisition of property by the Orders, and probably would deal with that already acquired. Naturally the whole power of Rome will be employed to prevent legislation of this kind, and it will indeed be well for France if those forces can be defeated.

It is very gratifying to hear, through an authority so disinterested as Mrs. Stuart, a niece of Mr. W. P. Schreiner, an ex-Premier of Cape Colony, that the serious charges made against the conduct of British soldiers towards the non-combatant population are unsustained. She pays a glowing, unstinted tribute to the sobriety, the kindness, and the propriety of the soldiers' attitude toward the Dutch women. Not only were they and their young families fed and sheltered by the British Army, but they were treated with unfailing respect. After the battle of Belmont, an aged Boer, who had fifteen refugee women under his protection in his farmhouse, said that though the British forces were encamped on his land, the soldiers throughout treated the women with respect, and "acted as gentlemen." "Though they often came to see our lassies, nothing"—this was his testimony—"nothing has ever been said or done to make any of my women-folk blush." Considering the sudden relaxation of morals which is apt to occur during a campaign, this testimony is eloquent, and in every way grateful to our ears. This makes Lord Roberts' warning, not to tempt our soldiers on their return, all the more timely.

Rev. J. G. Gregson writes from Pretoria:—

> The work of Mr. and Mrs. Osborne-Howe is deserving of sympathy and support, and if possible, I know they would like to erect a good soldiers' home as a record of their "Camp Soldiers' Homes," which have done good service during the war. I should think there is money, love, and sympathy sufficient in England to give practical effect to this excellent idea of a permanent Soldiers' Home for our soldiers who will garrison the Orange River Colony and also the Transvaal.

Sir Robert Giffen has stated recently that the total population of Europe and of the nations of European origin, excluding the subjects of the British Empire, now exceeds 500,000,000, as compared with 170,000,000 a century ago. The increase is being continued at a rate which he characterizes as "prodigious." In the view of such a fact, how heavy is the responsibility imposed upon us by the Divine command to preach the Gospel to every creature, for, although most of these people are classed as civilized, millions of them undoubtedly are living without God and without hope in the world.

The article in the current Nineteenth Century, by the late Professor Max Müller, on the Religions of China, is certain to attract considerable attention, because of the distinguished position held by the writer. On this account, we regret that Dr. Müller committed himself to certain opinions about missionary methods in China which are contrary to fact, but which, nevertheless, will be eagerly seized upon by the numerous class of people always ready for some new argument against missions. We are glad to follow any writer when he confines himself to statements of fact, but a very clear distinction must be drawn between them and mere personal opinions. Dr. Müller was never a great friend of missions, and he has evidently allowed his personal prejudices to influence his article. He objects to sending out unmarried lady missionaries, because of the results in giving a wrong impression of their character to the Chinese. But incontrovertible facts prove that Dr. Müller is wrong—unmarried ladies have accomplished an immense amount of good, despite the views held amongst the Chinese upon the subject of marriage.

Australian papers just to hand give an account of some remarkable performances by the Romish Church in Sydney. At the opening of the new Catholic Cathedral, dedicated to the Virgin, the chief officials of the place were present to represent the State, amongst them being Earl Beauchamp, the Governor, the Chief Justice, and the Governor of Queensland. The Romish Archbishop, who preached the sermon, had not the courage to declare in the presence of his audience what the papers of the next day reported him to have said. It appears that the reporters were supplied with printed copies of the sermon before it was delivered, and they were requested to print it verbatim. But the wily Archbishop suppressed, in the preached sermon, the following obnoxious passages which appeared in print on the following morning:—

> Amongst Protestants the most effectual means of sanctification have disappeared. . . . The leaders and founders of Protestantism—Luther, Calvin, and Zwingli—were notorious for their vices. . . . Protestantism has desecrated the home, polluted the nuptial bed, lowered the dignity of womanhood, devastated the school, and stopped the progress of science, &c.

It is a pretty comedy—or, more accurately, a tragedy—when the pretended followers of the Apostles take to virulent lying of this kind.

A recent paper in The Guardian, in regard to the falling off in the attendance of men at church, attributes the fact to the "deep-seated indifference to religion and religious things" which characterizes so much of our modern life. It is, however, a matter for serious consideration whether the decay of preaching, and the substitution of sacramental theories and claims for the proclamation of pardon and peace in Christ's finished work, are not largely responsible for the deplorable condition of things. Wherever Jesus is lifted up, in sincerity and in truth, the speaker's heart being aglow with love of God and man, thither men still will go. At the same time, Rev. F. B. Meyer's suggestion that representative working-men should be invited to meet the Free Church Councils throughout the country, in order to ascertain whether "stones of misunderstanding," which now keep numbers of working-men away from public worship, cannot be removed, is worthy of adoption, and might be very profitable in results.

Vows, whether of chastity, poverty, or obedience to men, are essentially opposed to the liberty of the Gospel, and are in defiance of the command of our Lord :

Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time, Thou shalt not forswear thyself, but shalt perform unto the Lord thine oaths; but I say unto you, Swear not at all (Matt. v. 33, 34).

This is repeated by the apostle James (v. 12) :

But above all things, my brethren, swear not, neither by heaven, neither by earth, neither by any other oath.

Because we are not our own, but are the purchased possession of our redeeming God, we have no right to bind ourselves with vows. We are the Lord's freedmen. "Lord, what will Thou have me to do?" is the constant inquiry of those who walk in the Spirit. "Whither the Spirit was to go the living creatures went; thither was their spirit to go." They could not have obeyed like flashes of lightning if they had been fettered by self-made vows. See Ezek. i.

The question, "Has the stage helped public morality?" was recently discussed at the Whitefriars Club with some curious but very suggestive results. The chairman, who was a clergyman, said he was not at all alarmed at the number of plays to which a careful parent is unable to take his daughters, because many men read books which they keep under lock and key, and "we cannot have a strong drama if authors are to write for a young lady of fifteen"—an altogether amazing position to take up. On the other hand, critics like Mr. Clement Scott, Mr. William Archer, and Mr. Shorter were conspicuously severe in their criticisms of the plays that are popular at West End theatres just now. These gentlemen know the theatre through and through, and their strongly-expressed opinions are bound to carry weight with all fair-minded people. The great reform constantly prophesied by the friends of theatres is still coming, but has not come as yet. Nor do we believe it ever will.

In a speech delivered last week at Clifton, Lady Henry Somerset put her finger upon one of the great weaknesses of our social system. Alluding to the cases of those drunkards who continually appear in the police courts, she said the usual method was to send them to prison for a short time and then send them into the world again without anything to prevent them from taking up the same life once more. The present system punishes but it does not cure drunkenness. Her ladyship then referred to her own Farm Colony Scheme, under which everything is done to break off connection with the former fatal conditions of life. Instead of confining people within certain circumscribed areas, the drink victims are treated to fresh air, and field, and farm life. Besides this, of course, moral and Christian influence is brought to bear upon them. Drunkenness is treated at the colony both as a sin and a disease. After six years' work, it is gratifying to learn that 65 per cent. of those who have been through the homes are standing well.

The Inebriates Act is a great advance upon former things, but more is yet demanded, and Lady Henry has opened up the way for new methods. When all is said, however, on the question of cure, we still have to grapple with the iniquitous system which manufactures drunkards.

The recent meeting of the Charity Organization Society to consider the question of the terrible increase of inebriety among women, adds one more testimony to those which have already been given as to the growth of drunkenness, due, in numberless instances, to the facilities which have been afforded by the issue of grocers' licences. It is only too painfully evident that early legislation in regard to the growing evil is urgently required, and also the amendment in several directions of the existing Act dealing with habitual drunkards. These needs were strongly emphasized by several of the speakers, including Mr. T. P. Whittaker, M.P., at the Brighton Conference of the National Union of Women Workers, Mr. Whittaker stating that the Registrar-General's returns showed that the deaths of women from intemperance had increased 150 per cent. in proportion to the population during the last twenty-five years. Never, perhaps, was it more incumbent upon Christian reformers to band themselves together for combined action against that which Mrs. Henry Kingsley has aptly termed a "great and bloated interest."

Lord Rosebery's wise and practical advice to avoid electing men to public offices who have an "axe of their own to grind," has been well acted upon in Manchester in regard to the mayor elect, who has resigned his aldermanic dignity and his future mayoralty in view of certain outside interests. This action forms a striking object-lesson to the whole country of the importance of having men at the head of our public bodies who are free from the taint of jobbery and private gain.

In his address last week to the students of New College, Canon Driver urged that the principles of the "Higher Criticism" should be gradually instilled into the minds of children so that

When they reach an age at which their powers are matured, the principal conclusions reached by scholars on the subject of the Old Testament should be gradually and judiciously placed before them.

These "conclusions" are, in many cases however, not conclusions at all, but mere hypotheses, and surely it is premature that these should be taught to children. We agree with Canon Driver that "young men should not be sent into the world with untenable ideas about the Bible," and admit that criticism has done service in clearing away difficulties from the Book. But when it is a question, say, of the 110th Psalm, upon the authorship of which our Lord made so much to turn, it would be, in our judgment, high treason to teach the unproved hypothesis of certain critics—that the psalm is neither Davidic nor Messianic. In their anxiety to prevent youths from becoming infidels by teaching them "rational" views about the Bible, critical teachers must beware lest they overreach themselves and produce the very result they profess to be so anxious to avoid.

The selection of Miss Alice Gore as pastor of a mission church at Stockton-on-Tees is not a step in a new and unknown direction, as she simply takes the place of Mrs. Goddard, who for nearly twenty years had charge of the congregation. With much experience as a preacher of the Gospel, and in all kinds of Christian work, Miss Gore may trustfully look forward to a blessing upon her labours. A similar course might be followed with advantage in some of our larger villages and other places in which it is difficult to provide sufficient remuneration for a pastor with a family to maintain.

Deprecating that lowering of our national ideals which has inevitably followed close upon the war fever, a thoughtful writer says :—

It is a terrible thing that an influential journal should teach its readers that the spilling of blood, and the delight in spilling it, will insure them some virtues, at any rate. The lust of blood, like other lusts, unmans man. Did the shows of Rome render Romans of the Empire more or less manly than Romans of the Republic? . . . And the new journalism, with its "picturesque" writing, its ghastly incidents of war, its impassioned accounts of "grand bayonet charges," has made the daily paper a sort of gladiatorial show in words. . . . There is now a boys' war paper, with the most ferocious representations of these horrors.

Certainly the extension of the empire may be dearly purchased at the cost of degeneration at home, and it is perhaps now more than ever desirable that we should cry to God to save our nation from the far-reaching evils of war.

The growth of juvenile criminality in London and other large cities is calling forth numerous suggestions for dealing with the evil. No one has a greater right to speak upon the subject than Rev. J. W. Horsley, who for so many years was famous as a prison chaplain. In a lecture delivered last week he advocated two reforms which certainly touch the centre of the matter. One was the necessity of making the condition of the rustic better, so that he shall not "suicidally rush to overcrowded towns;" and the other was the decentralization of industry which would enable the housing problem to be dealt with by scattering congested populations.

It is quite certain that the fearful herding together of great masses of people in already overcrowded cities is one fruitful cause of the criminality amongst us. It is unnatural for men and women to live in conditions worse than those which surround some cattle; and what is unnatural soon becomes positively criminal.

Why, then, do youths and maidens leave the beauties of the country for the repulsive life of city slums? With many, no doubt, it is a question of excitement; they prefer to be with crowds. But with others it is a question of necessity. Work fails them in the country, and they are compelled to seek towns and factory life, where the germs of crime soon develop. One thing which seems to be inevitable is, the country must once more be resorted to. Village life must be made worthy of the best youths and maidens, so that they may remain in the country and work. The Swiss have solved this problem; there is no reason why England should not solve it too. We have plenty of land. It is simply a question of occupying it to the best advantage all round.

We notice many of the Free Church Councils that are undertaking the united Mission in February next, are raising guarantee funds in advance, so that no collections may be taken at the mission services. It would be well if this could be done in every case. It is a serious drawback to evangelism when non-churchgoers are asked for money at meetings which are specially designed to bring the Gospel to them. If the Churches are undertaking the work of evangelizing those who at present are outside religious influences, it seems to follow as a matter of course that they should also pay the necessary expenses. Mr. Moody showed his practical wisdom in forbidding collections at his mission services. There is no need to fear that this will pauperize the people: when they become Christians, they will gladly offer of their substance to the Lord.

Elisha, the Prophet of Vision.

IV.—The Empty Ditches (2 Kings iii.).

By Rev. F. S. WEBSTER, M.A.*

THE second chapter closes with two striking incidents. The first, Elisha's first public act, seems typical of his whole ministry. All the natural charms of Jericho, one of the fairest sites in the East, were spoilt by the unsatisfactory character of the water. The water was naught, and the ground was barren because of it. Elisha healed the spring and restored prosperity to the city. We wonder that Elijah had not been approached for this. Perhaps they were afraid of the scathing rebuke which would be hurled against them for the defiance of God shown in the rebuilding of the city. And this had been the work of a Bethelite.

The second incident was at Bethel, and seems at first sight a strange contrast to Elisha's whole career, and to the spirit of the Bible. But this view is superficial. Here, as everywhere else, "the ways of the Lord are right," whatever they may seem. Bethel was the headquarters of idolatry in Samaria. Here Jeroboam had placed one of his golden calves. In Hosea the place is called Bethaven, the House of Folly, so utterly had it ceased to be the House of God. Here was carried out the first and only attack upon the authority of Elisha. A deliberate attempt was made to discredit him publicly as an impostor, who would fain play the part of a second Elijah.

Elisha first looked upon the mocking crowd as though by a loving earnest reproof he would win them to a better mind. Then, moved by God, he uttered a solemn curse upon them. Two she bears came out of a neighbouring wood, and forty-two young people out of the crowd were torn by them. The word "children" in v. 24 differs from that rendered "little children" in v. 23, and means young men from fourteen years to 30 years. It is used, for example, of Solomon when he came to the throne, and of Jeremiah when he entered upon his prophetic office. The judgment was swift and terrible; apparently all the elder and responsible ones in the crowd were torn

(NOT NECESSARILY KILLED).

After this, Elisha retired to the solitude of Carmel, for such an experience was very trying to his gentle nature. But, before long, he was called to public action, to prove himself in very deed as Elijah had been "the chariot of Israel and the horsemen thereof," for he was used to save three kings and their armies from a terrible lingering death through thirst.

Moab had rebelled against Israel. For when Israel ceased to rely upon God, it soon lost its dominion over the surrounding heathen. Jehoram, the younger of Ahab's sons, had come to the throne. He seems to have been sobered a little by the sudden death of his brother (who fell through a lattice window), and to have made a slight attempt at reformation.

But his repentance was only skin-deep, and he proved to be one of the most worthless of the kings of Israel, possessing all his father's faults without any of his mother's strength. Jehoram was anxious, however, to put down this revolt, and having gathered his own army invites Jehoshaphat to join with him. Jehoshaphat most weakly consents. The prophet Jehu's rebuke after the battle of Ramoth Gilead, "Shouldest thou help the ungodly, and love them that hate the Lord?" was ignored, and once more he enters into partnership with the son of Ahab.

The kings take counsel as to their route. The direct way to Moab was across the Jordan, but they elect to compass the Dead Sea and march through Edom. No perfectly satisfactory reason for this choice could be found until recent years. But in 1868 the Moabite Stone was discovered by Mr. Klein, a C.M.S. missionary. With great difficulty, after it had been broken into fragments by the Arabs to prevent it falling into Christian hands, the greater part of this stone was secured and translated by twelve of the greatest Oriental scholars. It was an inscription by this very King Mesha who led this revolt, and we learn from it that the towns on the borders of Moab, to the north of the Dead Sea, had been stoutly fortified. This explains the route chosen. God be praised that at a time, when unscientific criticism is daring to assail the accuracy and authenticity of the inspired Word, that every word of Holy Scripture is indeed true.

THE VERY STONES ARE BEARING WITNESS

But their route, chosen by human foresight alone, landed them in a serious difficulty. There was no water. The soldiers suffered so intensely from the burning sun and the choking sand, that their thirst became intolerable and their strength was utterly exhausted. Jehoram, tortured by an uneasy conscience, takes a most gloomy view of the situation. "Alas! that the Lord hath called these three kings together to deliver them into the hand of Moab." Yes, to the ungodly the time of sore trouble always seems the time of Divine vengeance, for they know what they deserve. Jehoshaphat, however, turns instinctively to God for help. Though he felt that he deserved chastisement, he knew that God was a present help in every time of trouble. So he asks for a prophet of Jehovah. Now, there was a man of God even in the household of King Jehoram, a "lily among thorns" indeed. And he knew that Elisha was near by, and was not afraid to confess his intimacy with him. So, in their extremity, the before the prophet of the Lord. Elisha receives them with all the courage and noble independence that characterized Elijah. "Get thee to the prophets of thy father, and to the prophets of thy mother." He knew the king was not seeking the Lord; he only wanted water. There was sound reasoning in the rebuke.

He who never prays in fair weather must expect to have his sincerity doubted when he prays in the raging tempest. If the prophets of Baal fail in the great crisis of life, they are altogether vain. The king's answer was not well chosen. He repeated his parrot cry, "The Lord hath called these three kings together to deliver them into the hand of Moab." There was no contrition or repentance here. He comforted himself with the insurance that he was not alone in his misfortune, though his conscience told him that he was chiefly responsible for it. No wonder the world likes to get Christians to join them in their ungodly frivolities and excesses. It is such a sop to the uneasy conscience, if some real servant of God is involved in any judgment that may follow. No doubt Jehoram thought that the presence of Jehoshaphat should have been an a guarantee of God's favour and blessing. Well, it was a great help. The world little knows how much it owes to the presence of the godly people in any city or community. It was this that decided Elisha. "Were it not," he said, "that I regard the presence of Jehoshaphat, I would not look toward thee nor see thee." Then he called for a minstrel. It needs quiet nerves and a still heart to hear the voice of God. The sight of this shallow, self-satisfied, hypocritical king had for the moment blurred the prophet's vision. His righteous resentment had interfered with his spiritual perceptions. So a minstrel came, and the music acted as cooling medicine to the prophet's heated spirits. Excitement is fatal to communion. We must "be sober unto prayer," or we shall not pray "in the Spirit." Social intercourse and innocent recreation are of real value, but when they are prolonged to such an hour, and are of such an intoxicating character that the soul is unfitted for evening worship, they are most injurious. We cannot always get a minstrel to play us back into the spirit of communion. Let us be very careful, then, not to allow ourselves to be excited out of it needlessly.

But with the restored calm there came the Vision and the Voice, and a way of deliverance for Israel. The tired soldiers were set to work to fill the valley with ditches. And burdensome and fruitless as the labour seemed, it was done, and deep channels were cut for the Divine supply. With the morning sacrifice, for all blessing is through Calvary, the water came from the land of Edom, and all these ditches were filled; the army was saved, the worn-out, tired soldiers became new men. The Moabites, rushing as they thought to the spoil, were driven back in confusion. Their land was destroyed; the stones, gathered out with so much care and heaped at the ends of the fields, were scattered upon the grass by the attacking army, according to the word of the Lord. But there was to be for Israel. The sequel to the story, as given in Scripture, is not very clear. The King of Moab, having failed in a last desperate attempt to break through to Edom, offers his son as a burnt-offering to Moloch. With what result? "There was great indignation against Israel; and they departed from him and returned into their own land." The Moabite Stone says nothing about their previous reverses, but records the great triumph of Mesha, King of Moab, in driving back the Israelitish invaders. Clearly the people were so indignant, that they rallied to another onslaught, and drove the three armies out of their land. So there are only two men who come out of this story with any honour: Elisha, the man of God, who spoke God's truth fearlessly even before kings, and the anonymous servant of King Jehoram, who was not ashamed to own his intimacy with the prophet. "Them that honour Me," saith God, "I will honour."

Hints to Mission Workers.—2.

By Rev. ALBERT SWIFT.*

HELPING SEEKING SOULS.

THE convicted sinner has arrived at a place where two ways meet. It is a crisis in his life. On the one side is the broad highway upon which he has thus far been travelling, and which opens up inviting vistas for the further journey; on the other is "a strait and narrow way," with a "wicket gate" at the point of entrance. But that way leads to Christ, and Life, and Heaven. How important that the sinner be properly encouraged and instructed, in order that he may indeed enter upon the "path of life."

The way of salvation is so simple that many seekers stumble over its very simplicity. On the other hand, apparently for the same reason, many Christians have altogether neglected to give any study to the matter, and they are absolutely incompetent to lead a soul to Christ, or point out the way to the Cross. This is not as it ought to be! Every Christian should be prepared intelligently to do this work.

Qualifications.—There are certain necessary qualifications, all of which, however, may be readily acquired by the devout disciples of Jesus.

(1) Christlike Compassion.—The Pharisee can never help the sinner. There must be a sympathy and love that is felt. The voice and manner will manifest its presence, and helpful influence is largely conditioned thereon.

(2) A Prayerful Spirit.—If there is any work calling for the spirit of humility and dependence, it is this. Not only for the Christian's sake, but for the sinner's also, this is true. "Mr. —— converted me," said a poor woman some time ago. The good brother had very likely tried to do his best, but his personality rather than Christ's loomed up largest in the woman's mind. The worker's business is not to save, but to lead the sinner to the Saviour. His own heart must therefore be going out to Christ in earnest sympathetic prayer for the seeking one beside him.

(3) An Anointing of the Holy Ghost is indispensable. It is the Christian's supreme equipment for work. With the Holy Spirit, wonders have been accomplished by persons otherwise very indifferently equipped; while apart from the Holy Spirit nothing is ever done. The fact, however, that this is the supreme equipment, does not lessen responsibility for the development of other qualifications named.

* Copyright. This chapter, with one to follow, will shortly be issued in the form of a booklet, entitled The Mission-Worker's Handbook. (Morgan & Scott.)

Conditions.—If conditions are necessarily straitened, and the environment other than helpful, God will surely give special help to the Christian trying to do this work under such difficult circumstances. Nevertheless it is our duty to seek the most helpful conditions for the work. Pastors and evangelists have various methods. Some request the penitents to sign cards intimating their desire to become Christians. The intention is, doubtless, to visit them at their homes, and do the needed personal work there. When there are many convicted, however, this takes time, and something may occur to discourage the new desire. There is nothing like "striking while the iron is hot."

Where there are vestries behind the pulpit, the inquiry room, in the writer's opinion, is the better method. It is a witness for Christ, and it affords opportunity for thorough personal dealing.

RULES FOR THE INQUIRY ROOM.

The following "rules" may be observed with advantage:—

1. Keep the room as quiet as possible; talk softly, remembering that others are engaged in the same work as yourself. To this end avoid singing.
2. Be thorough with every case. In order that you may be so, prepare for your work. You can no more succeed in the inquiry room without preparation than in the pulpit. Be very plain and clear in all you say.
3. Be courteous and sympathetic. Don't attempt to argue. It is your business to show the way to Christ. Stick to the point.
4. Deal with one case at a time; and, if you are not satisfied with it, ask some more experienced worker to take your place. As far as practicable, speak with persons of your own age, or younger, and your own sex.
5. Don't hurry! Let the inquirer have time for quiet thought and prayer. In the meantime you cannot be better employed than in praying for him.
6. When you are satisfied that the seeker has found peace, fill up one of the cards provided for the purpose, being careful to obtain all the particulars asked for. At the close hand them to the secretary in charge of the room.
7. Unless compelled to leave, keep the inquirers in the room, in order that they may be spoken to collectively before again joining the congregation.
8. If there are no cases for you to deal with, deal with God in prayer. Conversation while the work is going on is most harmful, and cannot be allowed.
9. Come armed with your own Bible and pencil, and so avoid running about to borrow.

Rule 2 urges preparation! Rule 9 advises using your own Bible! It is safe to say that the worker who does prepare will be armed with his own Bible. The Word of God is the "Sword of the Spirit"—the weapon God puts into our hands with which to do the work. Experience may be helpful in illustrating God's Word; but every seeker after Christ should be brought direct to the Word itself. Quotations may not be recognised—hence it is better to let the inquirer read for himself. This will be made more simple by carefully underlining passages apt to be used. Different coloured inks will still further help. Use black for passages on sin and conviction; blue or green for repentance; crimson or red for faith. An index to these passages can be written on the fly-leaf of the Bible.

CONVICTION.

As a rule, persons entering an inquiry room are genuinely under conviction. And yet it must not be assumed that such is the case. Workers will do well to begin at the beginning. See that they are personally and thoroughly convicted of sin. The general admission that we are "all sinners" is not enough. Sometimes the plea is urged that "I have not been so very bad." Use Rom. iii. 22 (last clause 23): then turn to Matt. xxii. 35-39. Ask if this commandment has been kept. If not, since this is the great commandment, the penitent must have been guilty of the greatest sin. "They that are whole need not a physician, but they that are sick." The fact of sickness must be thoroughly impressed upon the heart and mind before the need of the Good Physician is recognised. On the other hand, the burden of sin may lead to a doubting of God's willingness to save. Then show God's love and mercy. Useful passages will be given in the concluding section.

REPENTANCE.

Repentance does not consist in much weeping, nor can its presence be judged by any outward manifestation of strong feeling. These things depend largely upon temperament and the nervous constitution of the persons in question. There may be much weeping or there may not; but it is safe to say where there is real conviction, there will be strong feeling, although it will not be expressed with the same demonstration in every case.

Again, repentance is not merely sorrow. People may be profoundly sorry for their sin, and still be unwilling to give it up. Or, their sorrow may be caused by a realization of the fact that, if they are to be saved, they must part with some things and habits very dear to them. This will not suffice. Sorrow in repentance includes a new view of sin, in which the sinner begins to hate the thing that has alienated him from God. But repentance not only includes this sorrow leading up to a purpose to forsake—it also includes the act of forsaking, in FULL AND UNCONDITIONAL SURRENDER.

Workers must insist on thoroughness at this point. It often happens that sinners are under deep conviction and in great distress, but cannot make any progress toward conscious pardon because there is some one thing they are unwilling to give up. It may seem to be but a small matter; but Christ's demand is for unconditional surrender. The writer remembers a lady who, through two weeks of special services, earnestly prayed for salvation, but was unwilling to go forward into the inquiry room. She stood up; she publicly announced her desire for pardon; she had good Christian people praying in her pew at the rear of the Church; she did, and the people did, all in their power, apart from her entering into the inquiry room, but she was not saved. The last night of the meetings came, and she resolved that she must be saved; and, as all other efforts had failed, she would go forward. But she did not reach the inquiry room. She had hardly stepped into the aisle on her way there, when the new light in her face told the story of "the great transaction done." She had been

DICTATING TERMS TO GOD.

There was but the one thing she would not do, and salvation was an impossibility for her until she surrendered at that point also. The inquiry room is not an essential to salvation unless we make it such by an unwillingness to go there. It is always a great help, however.

Thorough repentance means an absolute submission. God commands repentance, and it is by his Spirit and grace that we are led to repent. Godly sorrow may need to be illustrated. Confession to God may require urging. In some cases restitution must be insisted upon. The forsaking of sin and full surrender must be followed by confession "of Christ as Lord."

Depend much upon the guiding of the Holy Spirit, in finding out just what you need to do and to say. In some instances it may be necessary to request another to take up the work. Sinners will often be more candid with one than with another. For instance, a man in mature life may hesitate to unburden his heart to a youth. A woman will generally talk more freely to one of her own sex. The young, however, should not hold back. Let them seek to observe Rule 4. There is work for all to do.

Mr. Sankey's New Scheme.

In relation to the matter of the Training School for Gospel singers, I would say, it is not my purpose to put up any buildings, but rather to take buildings for short periods in different sections of the U.S., calling together the Christian singers for a convention, of, say, ten days, in each place, giving them such points and suggestions as I may be able after my forty years of Sacred Song Service. By repeating these conventions from year to year, I trust I will find a few men who can sing well enough to devote their time, like myself, to this line of Christian service. I can, in this way, cover a large part of my own country, and if successful, shall hope to return again to Great Britain, and try and find some Gospel singers here.

If any of your readers should be led to give me a good start as suggested, I shall be very glad, and shall hope that such help will prove a good investment for the cause of Christ.

Mr. Sankey's Movements.

Describing Mr. Ira D. Sankey's visit to Carlisle, a correspondent writes: "After an interval of twenty-seven years, Mr. Sankey visited Carlisle again last week, and addressed two crowded meetings in the Presbyterian Church, Fisher Street (Rev. J. Christie's). Great interest was shown in anticipation of this visit, inasmuch as Carlisle was the third town visited by the American Evangelists when they first came to England, the order being York, Newcastle, Carlisle. It was also in Fisher Street Church that Moody and Sankey conducted their week's mission, and, although a new and handsome church has now taken the place of that in which they sang and spoke, the memories of locality, service, and fellowship

ACTED AS AN INSPIRATION.

Mr. Henry Carr, Mr. Sankey's host in 1873, occupied the chair in the afternoon, and Mr. Christie at night. The afternoon subject was, 'Singing through Egypt and Palestine,' and that at a later hour, 'The Service of Sacred Song and Story.' The audience was greatly pleased with seeing and hearing the sweet singer. The general opinion seemed to be that while the lapse of upwards of a quarter of a century had not to any considerable extent unstrung Mr. Sankey's lyre, his large and ripened experience as a devout Christian worker had greatly enriched his spirit and increased his power for doing good."

Mr. Sankey's visit to Belfast aroused general interest, and the two gatherings held in the Grosvenor Hall were attended by large and representative audiences. At the first meeting, held on November 6, Mr. Robert Anderson presided. Rev. Henry Montgomery engaged in prayer, and then Mr. Sankey gave an address, interspersed with Gospel solos. In the course of his remarks, Mr. Sankey expressed his delight at again visiting Belfast, one of the most interesting places Mr. Moody and he visited on their journey through the land so many years ago. A quarter of a century has rolled away since then, but he said that he could never forget the happy days spent in Belfast, preaching and singing the Gospel. He had met many men since his arrival in the city who were brought in in those early days, and who have become

PROMINENT IN CHRISTIAN SERVICE.

Mr. Sankey also referred to his proposed school for Gospel singers, to which he intends to devote the remaining years of his life.

At the second meeting, held on the following day, Professor Whitla presided. Rev. J. B. Wylie led in prayer, and the chairman introduced Mr. Sankey in cordial terms, saying that wherever the Gospel goes, there will the singer-evangelist be beloved.

Mr. Sankey, in the course of his address, again spoke of the first visit of Mr. Moody and himself to Great Britain, and the reception they met with in Belfast. It was at York they had really made their first beginning, and not at Liverpool. The people there at first came to hear them reluctantly; but before more than two or three nights were spent in preaching and singing the Gospel, they had

MANY ANXIOUS INQUIRERS.

Someone has written that their visit to Liverpool was a failure; but they only remained one night there, and therefore had no chance of being a failure. Mr. Moody never had a failure until he fell before that great audience in Kansas City with his heart worn out in God's service.

During the evening Mr. Sankey sang "Jesus of Nazareth Passeth By," and some other favourite solos. He also, with Mr. Vance and Miss Paxton, sang "My Jesus, I love Thee." Dr. Crawford Johnson subsequently engaged in prayer, and the choir rendered, "God be with you till we meet again," thus concluding a gathering that was most profitable as well as enthusiastic.

Mr. Sankey has been taking a few days' rest since returning to London. He is to sing to-night (November 15) at the Bible Society's meeting at St. James' Hall.

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, November 18. Jeremiah xi.

THIS and the following two chapters belong to the earlier ministry of Jeremiah, when he still dwelt in his native home of Anathoth. He refers to the covenant which had been lately renewed by Josiah (2 Kings xxii. and xxiii), and quotes largely from the Book of Deuteronomy, which had been recently read in the hearing of the people. To that covenant the prophet reverently gives his endorsement (5). His Amen reminds us of Him who is God's Amen, and in whom all the promises of God are ratified for ever.

The constant relapse of Israel to idolatry was in part due to the licentious rites associated with such worship. They were seduced from their allegiance to Jehovah by the fascination of passion; and herein we are reminded of the many times that we have been beguiled into sinful thoughts and imaginings, in spite of God's earnest solicitations and protestation: "Rising early and protesting." And so long as the soul is wedded to its evil ways, it is impervious to the entrance of God's light of love. "There is a sin unto death," says the beloved Apostle, "I do not say that he should pray for it"—which is closely akin to the solemn prohibition of v. 14.

The people of Anathoth resented the prophet's words, and conspired to take his life, as in after days Nazareth rose against our Lord. And as in Isa. liii. 7, so here in verse 19. The contrast between the Old Covenant and the New is very apparent, however, in the different response of the sufferer. Jeremiah, however good, was far removed from the spirit of Him who reviled not again, and has taught us to pray for our enemies (20).

MONDAY, November 19. Jeremiah xii.

The problem of moral evil and of the prosperity of the wicked has always pressed very heavily on the hearts of God's people. How often has the pious and persecuted soul asked why the wicked should prosper, and they should be happy who dealt treacherously. Amid the trials of his life at Anathoth, Jeremiah grievously felt thus, and the iron entered into his soul. But he did not realize that he was to be a prophet to the world, that his experiences and teachings were to be preserved for all time, for the encouragement and consolation of myriads. It was necessary, therefore, that he should drink deeply of the cup, and be baptized with the baptism whereof all partake.

It is perfectly legitimate to talk with God of his judgments. He says Himself, "Come now, let us reason together." There is nothing that God more respects than when the soul of his servant enters into the secret place, as Abraham when he pleaded for Sodom, and talks with Him as man with his friend. But there is one proposition, which must be taken for granted, that God is righteous. "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" "Righteous art Thou, O Lord!"

To the fainting soul of his servant, the Spirit of God draws nigh. It is as though the Divine Being expostulated thus: "What, so soon tired! Has thy faith failed thee already! Art thou wearied with running against footmen! God gives us the lesser trials first, before He leads us out to combat the great billows in mid-ocean. But amid all the darkness which hangs heavily on the prophet's sight, there is a rift of blessed light. The story of his people was destined to become big with blessing, for themselves and the world (16). Wait, troubled soul, to see the end of the Lord.

TUESDAY, November 20. Jeremiah xiii.

This parable of the girdle may really have been transacted. By some such striking symbol enacted before the people, their attention must have been powerfully arrested. Or, it may be that this is only a vivid style of presentation. Whichever it is, the chief idea is the intimacy of relationship between the chosen people and their God (11). Oh that He would cause us to cleave unto Him. At the same time, the degradation of the best is to the worst, and nothing more strikingly sets forth the condition to which those may sink who have abused the highest possibilities, than the condition of this marred and profitless girdle. Capernaum would not be as she is to-day, unless she had been lifted to heaven in privilege. O my soul, beware! Since thou art capable of God's best and highest, thou art also liable to the weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth.

The people answered the prophet very rudely and roughly. They mocked at his words (12). But Jeremiah wept bitterly over their obduracy and pride. He saw the inevitable doom to which the young king, Jehoiachim, the queen mother, and the whole land were drifting. These are the tears that we may all covet. We have shed tears of proud mortification, of vexation, of hot temper, of disappointment and chagrin, but God give us to shed tears for the sins, and woes, and doom of a lost world.

Jerusalem is apostrophised, and asked where the beautiful flock of sister and daughter towns was which had gathered under her lead. Ah, they were destroyed, and their people were in captivity. Their destruction had come from those who had been allies and friends (21, R.V.); and their sin was so deeply-seated and inveterate, that such a fate was inevitable—there was no hope of reformation (23). What a terrible thing sin is. Of how many of our sorrows and disasters it is the cause. Cleanse Thou me, O God, from secret faults!

WEDNESDAY, November 21. Jeremiah xiv.

At this time a terrible drought had visited Jerusalem and Judæa. It was so acute that the highest families were affected by it; the husbandman could not till the hard earth, nor hope for a harvest if he did so. A striking illustration of the effect of that drought is given in the picture of the wild asses. How vividly this narrative befits the present state of the churches of our land!

Let us plead with God for revival. He is in the midst of us, but his Spirit is grieved, his power is limited, He cannot do what He would. Truly our backslidings are many, and we have sinned. But there is one argument which must prevail:—"Do thou it for thy Name's sake." God must be consistent with Himself, with his promises, and purposes, and his own own character. Therefore so perpetually in the Bible, his servants, whose mouths are shut while they consider the sin around them, wax eloquent when they remind God about his character and prestige (Psa. lxxix. 9; cix. 21).

How tenderly the true shepherd of men pleads for men! As here the prophet says, "They have been misled, they know no better" (13). What a glimpse we have in these pathetic intercessions of Him who ever lives to remember us before the throne of God!

THURSDAY, November 22. Jeremiah xv.

This is a very precious chapter, especially in its disclosures of the prophet's reasonings with God about his own inner experiences. In the earlier part, there is a renewal of the threatenings of punishment, which were powerless to stay Jerusalem in her mad career. It is an awful thing, when God says, "I am weary with repenting;" yet we may drive Him to say it by our incessant relapses. Then He scatters us as chaff, and destruction befalls us at noon, i.e., when we least expect (9).

The life of constant opposition to his people was full of labour and sorrow to the gentle disposition of the prophet. He had not acted in any such way as to merit the hatred with which he was beset, and yet the detestation with which men hate the usurer was meted out to him in full measure. But for those who do God's work, there is a Divine safeguard and reward. God will deliver them for good, and cause their enemies to come as suppliants to them, acknowledging that God is with them (11). Yes, it were easier to break the northern iron or steel, the toughest and strongest of metals, than to overcome the barriers with which God surrounds those who believe in Him.

When passing through times like these, be sure that God does not forget (15); be much in prayer; feed on God's words (16); maintain before your mind the glorious fact of your identification with the Son of God. He cannot, never, no never, be to you as waters that fail. Ponder, above all, the precious promise of verse 19. It is specially helpful to backsliders. Come back, even now, in this hour. Put away the evil for ever from your life, and stand before God as his chosen servant to become as his very mouth. (Compare the first chapter.) Oh, how infinitely blessed is such an exchange!

FRIDAY, November 23. Jeremiah xvi.

"The time is short," said the Apostle, "let those that have wives be as though they had none . . . for the fashion of this world passeth away." He spoke when the fall of Jerusalem was imminent; so Jeremiah wrote when the whole monarchy and State seemed on the verge of dissolution. These words are not to be taken literally now, except by those who are called to the performance of very special duty. But their spirit is always applicable. We must cultivate the pilgrim spirit, and not allow ourselves to be caught and entangled with the things of this life, that we may please Him.

Again, there is the gleam of light on the far horizon, the return of God's chosen people from captivity. That blessed hope made the prophet's heart glad, as he seemed to see God's great army of fishers and hunters scouring the world to discover the scattered Jews. So all Israel shall at last be saved, and their recovery will mean the salvation of the world. God's purpose must stand, and the oath which He sware to Abraham. Then also the Gentiles shall be brought in (19). Those are the times of restitution, which God promised by all his holy prophets.

Again, the refrain of the prophet's love and trust breaks in with sweetness and pathos. Jehovah was his strength, his fortress, and his refuge in the day of his affliction. Wouldst thou know Him in these blessed aspects of his character? Reach forth the hand of thy appropriating faith. Be not content to pray, but take, take continuously, take gladly, take in ever-increasing measure. It is not enough to drop the letters of prayer into God's post-boxes; we must often go to our own letter-box to seek for, and open his letters to us. Days of affliction will come to every prophet, because he is before his time, but they are not without blessing, if they compel us to realise God.

SATURDAY, November 24. Jeremiah xvii.

O servant of the living God, be careful not to trust in man, nor make flesh thine arm; and that thou mayest be kept from so fatal a mistake, see to it that thy heart does not secretly depart from the Lord. Trust in Him; hope in Him; thrust out the roots of thy life to the living waters of his plenitude; so shalt thou be uncareful in the year of drought, and thou shalt not cease from yielding fruit.

But, oh, beware of thine heart, it is so deceitful, so desperately wicked. The old sins, which had hidden their heads, revive after long years. Old temptations, which seemed to have lost their fascination, again attempt to ensnare. Thou wilt be tempted to trust in thy wealth, in men's good opinions, in the momentum of thy career; but if thou dost, thou wilt inevitably repent of it, and be ashamed. To turn aside from God, to any other cistern of comfort or help, is suicidal. All such are written in the dust, i.e., their name is forgotten, as the characters which children scratch in the sand.

It is a perpetual comfort to recall the irresistibleness of our designation to God's service. It is well when a man can say, "I did not hasten to be a pastor, an evangelist, a teacher; but God thrust me into his vineyard." Then, surely, we may throw back all the responsibility on Him, who, knowing all our weakness and imperfection, nevertheless chose us. He must have calculated the full weight of his enterprise before He took it in hand.

Let thy heart ever keep its Sabbath. Let no burdens come in. Cast thy burdens on the Lord, and let his peace stand as a sentry-angel, keeping thy heart and mind. Then the Prince of the kings of the earth shall come to thee, and take up his abode in the palace of thy soul. What dignity, and royalty, are the portion of the soul that knows no anxious care!

Revival Among Kanakas.

I HEAR of a remarkable work of God going on just now among the Kanakas in Queensland. The centre is at Bundaberg, about 150 miles north of Brisbane, and is extending with power in the sugar plantations. Fully 200 are awaiting baptism, as the result of the preaching of the Gospel. Large numbers have been saved.

As an illustration of the remarkable character of this work of God, I heard of one man who, in his cruel heathenism, had caused the death of two of his fellows. Now he is in a new world, sharing God's new life, a wonder and an amazement to those who know him. "Tell me more of the Book, more about Jesus!" he said. Hour after hour passed on and day after day, the Spirit of the Lord being as rivers of living water in this Kanaka's new and risen life. Yes, he was and is sharing the resurrection life of the blessed Son of God.

Shortly after this, he came to one of the Christian teachers whom the Lord is using there, and said—"I want to know more about the Lord Jesus. I have saved money. I give three months or four, so long as my money last.

YOU TEACH ME, I LEARN.

When money gone, I engage again and go work on the plantation. Then come to you again, and then, when ready, go back to my own people (the Kanakas in the New Hebrides) and tell them about the grace and love of Jesus."
